NEW YORK -- Despite repeated warnings from law enforcement officials, offshore Internet gambling companies have continued to advertise heavily in the United States.

Giant billboards in Manhattan, some several stories high, brazenly advertise Internet gambling sites like Sportsbook.com, now based in Antigua.

Promotions for BetUS, a Canadian and Costa Rican company that takes wagers on American sports, run regularly on the Howard Stern Show on Sirius Satellite Radio. Fantasy football magazines on sale at newsstands are packed with ads for online bookies and casinos.

The advertisements _ which the companies insist are legal _ have helped attract millions of customers to online gambling, and may have left the impression that both the ads and online wagering are legal.

They are not, said Paul Larrabee, a spokesman for New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

"Gaming and bookmaking are not legal in New York, so anyone who markets to a New Yorker may be in violation of New York state law," Larrabee said. "We have done case after case after case involving instances where an act that is illegal in New York is marketed to New Yorkers."

Actual prosecutions of advertisers for promoting gambling are rare, however, and media companies accepting the ads insist they are breaking no law.

That position sometimes hangs on a looser interpretation of gambling laws.

ESPN, for example, runs ads for online poker sites during its broadcasts of the Word Series of Poker, but says it does so only for Web pages that don't actually process bets.

"We only accept advertising for educational, learn-to-play, for-free sites," said ESPN spokeswoman Keri Potts.

Many of these so-called "educational" sites, however, are simply companion pages to full-fledged gambling operations, easily reachable with a few mouse clicks or by changing the last few characters of a Web address from ".net" to ".com."

Potts said it wasn't up to ESPN to investigate those affiliations.

"Is it really for us to be regulating how they operate their businesses?" she said.

The Justice Department has taken a different view. In 2003 it warned that publishers and broadcasters who advertise gambling sites could be prosecuted for aiding and abetting a crime.

A year later, federal authorities pressured the parent company of the Discovery Channel into forfeiting $6 million in advertising money that had come from online poker sites.

A similar arrangement was reached in January with the Sporting News, which agreed to pay a $4.2 million fine and run $3 million worth of public service announcements to resolve claims that it ran ads promoting illegal Internet gambling.

Despite those settlements, Internet gambling lawyer Lawrence G. Walters said there is uncertainty over whether running advertisements for an offshore gambling concern is illegal.

"They scare these people to death and tell them they are going to prosecute them criminally if they don't cooperate ... but I'm looking forward to the day that someone decides to fight this," he said.

The situation was muddied further on Friday when President Bush signed legislation aimed at prohibiting the credit card and electronic fund transactions U.S. players often use to settle online wagers.

Some foreign online gambling outfits said immediately after the legislation was signed that they would stop doing business with American customers.

"The real question is, 'Are any of the online gambling Web sites going to bother advertising anymore?" given the change in U.S. law, Walters said.

Sportingbet PLC, a British Internet gambling company that had hung billboards throughout Manhattan bearing the image of actress Nikki Cox and the slogan "Everybody Bets," sold its site Sportsbook.com to a company in Antigua on Friday for $1.

The action came just weeks after the company's chairman was arrested at a New York airport after customs officials discovered he was wanted on online gambling charges in Louisiana.

New York Gov. George Pataki ultimately decided that state law didn't allow the executive to be extradited and he was allowed to fly home to London.

DOJ_NMG_0081492

Spokesmen for several online gambling services declined to be interviewed about their advertising campaigns, but maintained that their offshore services are either legal or beyond the reach of U.S. law.

That argument was rejected by Christopher P. Blank, executive assistant district attorney for the Brooklyn DA's rackets division.

"If you're sitting in Costa Rica with your staff, and you're accepting bets from New York, you're gambling in New York," he said.

AP, October 15, 2006

NEW YORK — If you don't like what your favorite Internet search engine or e-commerce site does with information it collects about you, your options are limited to living with it or logging off.

Major search engines, for instance, all keep records of your searches for weeks, months or even years, often tied to your computer's Internet address or more. Retailers, meanwhile, generally presume the right to send marketing e-mails.

Although online companies have become better at disclosing data practices, privacy advocates say the services' stated policies generally don't give consumers real choice.

"None of them have gotten to the point of giving a lot of controls in users' hands," said Ari Schwartz, deputy director of the technology watchdog group Center for Democracy and Technology. Privacy policies "are about notice ... not about control."

Recent developments - from companies losing laptops containing sensitive data to Time Warner Inc.'s AOL releasing customers' search terms - have again turned the spotlight on Internet privacy.

But the push for stronger federal protections is countered by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' desire to require Internet providers preserve customer records to help prosecutors fight child pornography. Officials have released few details, though they say any proposal would keep the data in company hands until the government seeks a subpoena or other lawful process.

Federal law already limits how personal financial and health care data may be used, but U.S. privacy laws are generally considered weak compared with Europe and Canada.

Industry groups have stepped in with guidelines that go beyond legal requirements.

One group, Truste, requires member companies such as AOL and Yahoo Inc. give consumers a way to decline sharing personally identifiable information with outside parties. Companies also must disclose any use of tracking technology and specify personal information collected and how it is used.

"The fact that we don't license every person on the Internet gives consumers (the ability) to shop around," said John Tomaszewski, Truste's vice president for legal, policy and compliance. "We've got folks out there engaging in a higher standard than what is normally required."

Some companies go even further.

E-Loan Inc. customers worried about safeguards when datas get outsourced to India can choose to have loan applications processed domestically, though loans in such cases would take two additional days to close.

Mark Lefanowicz, E-Loan's president, said about 80 percent of customers have agreed to outsourcing, and he said choice pre-empted any backlash.

"They have the right to deal with us under their terms," he said. "If we just disclosed we used an overseas provider, for a lot of customers it's irritating to them."

Comcast Corp., meanwhile, gives customers a range of options on how long its servers keep e-mail, while a small search engine called Ixquick promises to purge data within 48 hours.

In other cases, companies have responded to backlash from customers. When Facebook recently allowed easier tracking of changes their friends make to personal profile pages, users threatened boycotts and forced the company to apologize and offer more privacy controls.

But such cases are rare. Consumers generally haven't demanded better privacy options the way they shop around for better prices or ease of use, said Carl Malamud, senior fellow at Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank.

"As a consumer I don't choose based on practices for privacy," he said. "I choose based on functionality."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

S.F. Police-conduct Plan Behind Schedule (SFC)

By Susan Sward, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, October 15, 2006

Eight months after Mayor Gavin Newsom vowed to ride "roughshod" over the Police Department to ensure adoption of a computerized system to track officers' use of force and other conduct, the plan has yet to be submitted to the Police Commission for a vote.

In a February interview, after The Chronicle reported on use of force by San Francisco officers, Newsom said he wanted such a system adopted by the end of the year and added the move was "in the best interest of the department in terms of public confidence and a kind of respect we are hoping to build again ..."

Since then, negotiations over the system's details have not led to a formal agreement by the participants, which include the department, the American Civil Liberties Union and the Police Officers Association.

The proposal, which involves complex technology, has yet to be put out to bid, and the department -- rather than talking about having the system in place by year's end as the mayor pledged -- is now saying it plans to have a pilot program operating before the year is over.

Deputy Police Chief Charles Keohane said the proposed tracking system will soon be presented to the department's command staff and then will be forwarded to the Police Officers Association, which has "meet and confer" rights on any such change.

"The Police Department has been saying it has been working tirelessly on this system for years, but so far it hasn't happened," said Commissioner Joe Veronese. "I'd like to see it materialize into an effective policy soon."

Deputy Chief Keohane said the department is moving "at light speed" -- far faster than some other departments attempting to build similar tracking systems -- and he added he hoped the complete system could be up and running by March.

He added the department is drafting the proposal to put the system out to bid and plans to present the proposed system to the Police Commission soon. In previous meetings, commissioners have voiced strong support for this sort of the system, which was first advocated three years ago by critics, including the city controller's office.

Newsom said in an interview he was "pleased with the progress that has been made and that we will have a pilot by the end of the year. We are within 90 days of an expectation of something that usually takes three to five years in other cities. While all of us would like to have seen it yesterday, one deals with the reality of process in San Francisco on anything that deals with technology."

Mark Schlosberg, police practices policy director for the ACLU's Northern California branch, said he has been meeting with the department on the tracking system's details and "we're very close."

The position of the officers' union on the new regulation that will define the tracking system is not known. Keohane said, "The negotiations with the POA are down to the nitty-gritty, and hopefully, all the differences will be ironed out."

A series of articles in The Chronicle in February reported that about 100 San Francisco officers were responsible for a quarter of the incidents of force logged by the 2,100-officer department from 1996-2004, and that in recent years San Francisco officers had more force allegations filed against them than those in San Jose, Oakland, San Diego and Seattle combined.

The series also found that the department did not have an effective, computerized system for tracking the performance of officers and often failed to intervene with officers who reported using force much more than their peers.

Implementation of the tracking system is one of two major reforms that national and local experts say San Francisco must undertake to improve local policing. The second involves strengthening the Police Commission, which oversees the department.

Tracking system crucial

Law enforcement experts view a computerized tracking system -- which can offer an up-to-date, comprehensive look at an officer's record with a few keystrokes -- as a crucial move that other cities already have embraced.

Police practices experts also say, however, that departments that want to improve officer performance and identify those who need counseling must go beyond that computerization step and change the way they manage officers on the streets.

Such deep, fundamental change is difficult for many departments to achieve, they say. Instead, change often comes because of a scandal or a lawsuit.

"I believe departments are generally incapable of reforming themselves," said Duke University law Professor Erwin Chemerinsky, who wrote a report on the Los Angeles Police Department after its Rampart scandal in the late 1990s, in which officers stole drugs and beat and framed citizens.

"Reform usually involves major change, including changing the culture of a department," Chemerinsky said, "and I think it is very difficult to do from within ... absent a major scandal or significant change in personnel."

Police Chief Heather Fong has repeatedly said the department is pressing forward on the tracking system. She also said earlier this year that its officers "are very restrained in when and how they use force" and use it only when "they must resist the force that is being used against them."

Early intervention

More than two decades ago, law enforcement agencies began building systems capable of identifying officers with problematic performance, especially excessive use of force.

Departments used a variety of methods to intervene, including counseling and retraining, with the goal of dealing with an officer's problems before discipline became necessary.

The trend toward tracking systems was fueled by a growing awareness that a relatively small group of officers in each agency is typically responsible for a disproportionate amount of the force used on citizens.

The thinking was that if those officers could be identified, counseled, retrained or removed from the street, departments could reduce the use of unnecessary force, citizen complaints and costly lawsuits.

In the mid-1980s, San Francisco began requiring officers to report when they used force on citizens. In the mid-'90s, it also started tracking citizen complaints against individual officers.

Neither system was computerized so that supervisors could perform speedy checks on an officer's record, seeing which officers were logging the most force or quickly comparing citizen complaints with use-of-force logs.

Tracking for promotions

While many departments use tracking systems to warn of problem behavior by officers, the Justice Department says more are expanding their systems to follow positive indicators of officers' behavior -- such as arrests made or commendations -- that may identify those worthy of promotions.

In Pittsburgh, for example, the police department uses its system as a broad management tool, not just to watch for misconduct by its 866 officers.

"Officers know people pay attention to what's in there," said Pittsburgh police Cmdr. Linda Barone, speaking of the tracking system. "If they want to be promoted or go to specialized units, if there is nothing in the system that says you have been working at all, it has been told to them: 'Don't bother.' "

In 1997, Pittsburgh entered into a consent decree with the Justice Department to improve its tracking of officer performance and to take other modernizing steps. Today, it has a comprehensive early intervention system: It requires sergeants to log onto the computer every day and monitor their officers' behavior.

Samuel Walker, one of the nation's top experts on police tracking systems, emphasized that management in a department has to be totally committed to making a system work. "Somebody has to make these things happen," Walker said. "If no one really takes the lead, these reforms won't happen, and unprofessional conduct will continue."

Good results reported

In some cities, Walker and others report, both use-of-force incidents and citizen complaints decreased following installation of an early intervention system.

San Francisco's department proposes monitoring a greatly expanded list of behavior in addition to citizen complaints, including use of force, officer-involved shootings and discharges, internal affairs and workplace discrimination complaints, civil suits and claims, on-duty accidents and vehicle pursuits.

Newsom's 2006-07 budget includes $575,000 for the intervention system's hardware, software and maintenance costs.

Fong told The Chronicle the new system "will afford essential feedback to those officers who may need guidance or additional training in their duties, provide timely and relevant information to supervisors, and raise the level of professionalism in our department."

Newsom said while there is some natural concern and resistance among police officers about the changes the system will require, he thinks ultimately everyone, including the rank and file, "benefits because it will allow us in an objective way to analyze data and treat everyone fairly. That builds public trust, and with public trust, comes a stronger department."

The Police Officers Association did not respond to a Chronicle request for comment on the system. In a recent newsletter to members, association President Gary Delagnes said: "An early intervention system that is fair to all parties and is not seen as much as a punitive tool as a monitoring tool should be implemented as soon as possible."

Police Commission

Another change that has been urged to improve oversight of San Francisco police officers involves the Police Commission.

For more than a decade, critics, including the San Francisco Bar Association, have said the commission should have its own staff to help it formulate policy.

By law, the commission has the power to fire officers or to impose any suspension longer than 10 days; it also sets the general orders that spell out department policy.

The seven-member commission -- composed of volunteers appointed by the mayor and Board of Supervisors -- now has only a sergeant and a clerk on staff. It relies on the department for reports on policy issues.

After persistent lobbying by police Commissioner Theresa Sparks, the 2006-07 city budget includes $50,000 for a hearing officer and an $89,000 performance auditor who will do commission work but remain a department -- not a commission -- employee.

"We need to look at whether our policies on use of force are strong enough," Sparks said. "But until we have staffing resources, we are for all practical purposes ceremonial."

In Los Angeles, the commission has had a staff of analysts focused on policy issues for more than a decade.

"The benefit of having the independent review and oversight is that the department knows there will be such a review" of anything it proposes, said Richard Tefank, executive director of the city's Board of Police Commissioners.

At a recent seminar co-chaired by former Police Chief Anthony Ribera and former chief and Mayor Frank Jordan, Schlosberg of the ACLU said additional commission staffing is a critical need.

"The Police Commission is overwhelmed by the issues on its plate," Schlosberg said.

Some witnesses at the seminar said the commissioners would not be so overwhelmed if they didn't have to conduct lengthy hearings on every officer who might deserve more than a 10-day suspension, the maximum that can now be imposed by the police chief.

Fong said in an interview after the seminar: "The chief should have authority to impose suspensions of 45 to 90 days when appropriate."

Difficult prospect

Often, change in a department must be imposed from outside.

After the 1991 Los Angeles police beating of motorist Rodney King, Congress passed a law allowing the Justice Department to file "pattern or practice" suits for violations of citizens' civil rights.

Since 1997, Justice has used that law to file several lawsuits against police agencies and then hammer out consent decrees to force change.

In some instances, private citizens have sued departments to produce change, winning court-enforced agreements.

In Oakland, the Police Department entered into a settlement in 2003 with 119 citizens who alleged that four officers known as "the Riders" had beaten or framed them. The settlement paid $10.5 million to the plaintiffs and their lawyers and committed the department to reforms expected to cost $10 million more by 2008.

The reforms include establishing a comprehensive system to track officer behavior and performance, an expanded and more accessible internal affairs bureau to investigate citizen complaints, more sergeants to supervise officers on the streets and changes in the field training program to prevent the assigning of problem officers to train new recruits.

Oakland has found one of the most difficult reforms to comply with has been the tracking system, which the department says it hopes to finish installing late in 2007 -- more than a year after it had hoped. Oakland Police Capt. Paul Figueroa estimates the cost of the system "could easily be $2.5 million to $3 million."

San Francisco has faced no such outside impetus, and city leaders historically have not pushed hard for police reform.

Major reform would be difficult to achieve, said John Keker, a prominent defense attorney who served as Police Commission president under Mayors Art Agnos and Willie Brown.

"San Francisco hasn't had a scandal as grievous as Rampart in L.A. or the Riders in Oakland," said Keker, "and there hasn't been an allegation of organized brutality here -- it's been random."

Without a major scandal, Keker said, very little can change because no mayor or police chief wants to tangle with the Police Officers Association, which "to some extent runs the department. So nothing happens."

The Police Officers Association did not respond to requests for comment.

Coushatta Residents Continue Dialogue After Controversial Bus Incident (SHREVET)

By Vickie Welborn

Shreveport (LA) Times, October 15, 2006

Second community forum draws smaller crowd

COUSHATTA "" A second community forum held Saturday in response to an August incident in which nine black children allege they were seated at the back of a school bus because of their race drew a much smaller but no less interested crowd.

About 50 people gathered in Springville Baptist Church, compared to the 200 or so that crowded inside Will of God Ministries in early September for the first public forum. Only a sprinkling of adults indicated Saturday they did not attend last month's session.

Not in attendance were the parents or the children at the center of issue that has gained worldwide attention. But they were represented by Patricia Wilson-Sessoms and her mother, Coushatta councilwoman Rosetta Wilson, both of whom are related to three of the children.

Sessoms said she wished more had attended Saturday, but she realizes there were many events going on in Coushatta and other communities that likely drew people away. Still, she's pleased that the community dialogue is continuing and she looks forward to the next step in the process that is being led by Carmelita Pope Freeman, southwest regional director of the Justice Department's Community Relations Service.

Within the next few weeks, Sessoms and others will build teams that will act as negotiators in a meeting with the school system's negotiators. "That will happen once we establish what we want changed," Sessoms said.

More than bus seating is drawing comments from the public. Hiring practices, teacher certification, discipline, pupil-teacher ratios, testing and much more have been listed as concerns when it comes to the Red River Parish school system.

But it was the bus situation that has gained the most attention. The nine children complained at the beginning of school in mid August that their white bus driver, Deloris Davis, made them give up their seats to the white children. After the children's mothers filed racial discrimination complaints with the school system, Davis made new seating assignments but still put the children at the rear of the bus on two seats.

Davis has denied through her attorney that her actions were racially motivated, saying instead that the seating arrangement was the result of the prior year's chart. But Davis was removed from her bus and ultimately requested retirement, which was granted Oct. 4, her 25th anniversary date.

Randy Jackson did not mention the bus situation when he stood before the crowd Saturday. Instead, Jackson called for change. He said many of the people in the school system were there when he left the area in 1981.

"A lot of them are trained to act they way they do," Jackson said, adding that he is prepared to leave Coushatta again with his children if change does not take place.

Substitute teacher Robin Owens focused on the lack of fairness in the school system. She cited incidents in which children are not treated equally in discipline matters.

The Rev. DaVince Taylor motivated the audience and drew applause when he challenged them to rally together as a community. He drew their attention to a Red River High football game of two weeks ago when the visiting team from Ferriday "" a town not much larger than Coushatta "" brought about 170 students "" 120 in the band and flag line and 50 football players.

"That was done with community involvement," Taylor charged. "Our children need us "» we've got to get actively involved."

NAACP District Vice President James Pannell, of Shreveport assured the crowd that the NAACP is monitoring the situation, but has agreed to take a back seat as the Justice Department continues to help the community work out its problems from within.

And work is what Pope-Freeman led the forum attendees in doing. She divided them into groups and tasked them with categorizing the wide range of concerns detailed in nine pages of raw data gathered from last month's meeting. Their work would be used during the negotiation process with school officials.

Sessoms said no one from the school system has been in contact with the children's mothers since the one and only meeting with Superintendent Kay Easley. "It may be because we're working through this process and they don't think they can."

The only acknowledgement school leaders have offered was at a September board meeting in which Easley simply stated, "We're working through the process."

The children, ranging in age from preschoolers to teenagers, are still riding the bus to which they were assigned after taken off of Davis' bus, Sessoms said. At least one is undergoing professional counseling.

"This was more than a back of the bus incident. They children were called names and mistreated. They were not allowed to talk back to the other kids that were calling them names. "» They had been getting teased, but I'm not sure if that is happening any more. They're doing fine now, I believe."

ENVIRONMENT:

Aid Is A Bumper Crop For Farmers (WP)

By Gilbert M. Gaul, Dan Morgan And Sarah Cohen, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

In the spring of 2000, Congress decided to do something about its costly and politically driven practice of giving farmers a disaster payment each time a storm damaged their crops.

The lawmakers voted to use $8 billion in new taxpayer subsidies to help farmers buy crop insurance to protect them against losses. The insurance would replace the disaster payments and reduce government costs.

But shortly after passing the Agricultural Risk Protection Act, Congress lost its fiscal will. One week before the presidential election, it passed a new $1.8 billion disaster bill to assist farmers hurt by bad weather. Two others followed in subsequent years, totaling more than $6 billion. Today, after a searing drought in the Plains, farm-state legislators are pushing for billions more in aid.

The result is that farmers often get paid twice by the government for the same disaster, once in subsidized insurance and then again in disaster assistance, a legal but controversial form of double-dipping, a Washington Post investigation found. Together, the programs have cost taxpayers nearly $24 billion since 2000.

The government pays billions to help farmers buy cheap federal insurance, billions more to private insurance companies to help run the program and billions more to cover the riskiest claims. And on top of all that, it spends billions on disaster payments.

"It should be one or the other," said Mark Orebaugh, a flinty 52-year-old who has suffered several years of bad crops in southwestern Kansas. "There should be a permanent disaster program or crop insurance that is enough to cover my losses."

Instead, there are essentially both.

"Everybody says the money is free, but we're all paying," said Charles Fisher, a central California farmer who helped oversee government disaster payments in his area for a dozen years. "Washington unbundles the money, opens the window and turns on the fan."

The money is blown all over the country, from New York to Nebraska to California, usually at election time, fanned by farm-state legislators.

A major share of the money goes to parched and flood-prone areas where farming is tenuous at best and "disasters" seem to happen every year, a review of thousands of records and interviews with dozens of farmers, economists, insurers and government regulators have found.

Farmers in Gaines County, a parched stretch of West Texas, collected nearly $66 million in the past five disaster bills. Cavalier County farmers in North Dakota, soaked by rain and floods, got $67 million. The money was in addition to $116 million that farmers in those two counties got in crop insurance payments.

Just four states forming a narrow swath in the middle of the country -- Texas, Kansas, South Dakota and North Dakota -- collected nearly four of every 10 dollars of the disaster aid handed out in the past decade, $3.8 billion in all, records show. Farmers in those states also collected $5.6 billion from crop insurance.

Those farmers have come to depend on both crop insurance and disaster payments, which together allow for covering up to 95 percent of the value of their crops. "Taxpayers are funding something good, the rural life," said Terry Aronson, a farmer in the flood-prone Devil's Lake area of North Dakota, who has received nearly $300,000 in disaster aid the past decade.

"No one wants to appear they are being chintzy with farmers," said Bruce L. Gardner, an agricultural economist at the University of Maryland and a former top USDA official. "In spite of all of these increases in subsidies, crop insurance really hasn't made a dent in the disaster payments."A Continuous Cycle

In the past 25 years, Congress has passed three major "reforms" of the federal crop insurance program in an effort to sign up more farmers and reduce their dependence on disaster aid. Instead, the result has been a continuous cycle in which Congress expands crop insurance only to turn around and hand out more disaster payments.

In 2000, then-House Agriculture Committee Chairman Larry Combest, a Republican representing West Texas, was instrumental in getting the most recent reform bill passed, which included the $8 billion in new premium subsidies. He cited the "countless billions" in disaster payments that were undermining crop insurance. In the Senate, Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) argued that expanded insurance would result in "less need" for disaster aid.

The government would now pick up an average of 60 percent of the cost of farmers' premiums. Farmers jumped at the cheaper insurance. Today, about 80 percent of all eligible cropland -- 240 million acres -- is insured at some level.

Yet only four months after the bill was passed, Congress authorized $1.8 billion in disaster aid. That was followed by $3.1 billion for 2001 and 2002 crop losses, and $3.5 billion covering 2003 and 2004. Still another $250 million was set aside after the 2005 hurricanes.

"In farm states, legislators have to appear they are doing something," said Art Barnaby, an agricultural economist at Kansas State University and an expert on crop insurance. "It can hurt them politically if they don't."

Combest, now a lobbyist representing agricultural interests, including crop insurance agents, declined to be interviewed. "I think I'll take a pass," he said. Roberts did not respond to requests for comment.

Disaster payments to farmers are a public record but, by law, the USDA keeps the names of recipients of crop insurance confidential. Thus there is no way to count how many farmers have collected both and in what amount. However, interviews with farmers and government officials indicate that farmers who get insurance payments also get most of the disaster money.

The USDA calculates how much to pay farmers in disaster money by first looking at how much they have received in crop insurance for losses. Farmers must show that they have lost at least 35 percent of their crop to qualify for a disaster payment. The maximum is $80,000. The total of their insurance payments, disaster aid and sales revenue from remaining crops is capped at 95 percent of what they would have earned if they had harvested and sold a full crop.Bountiful Harvests and Aid, Too

Tulare County in California is an example of a farming region where the use of crop insurance is extensive but farmers still draw millions in disaster relief. The county is part of the lush San Joaquin Valley, one of the largest and most productive agricultural regions in the world. The largely irrigated fields produce a bountiful harvest of oranges, lemons, olives, cotton and 150 other crops.

For 12 years, Charles Fisher, 73, helped to police the distribution of disaster payments to Tulare's farmers.

It wasn't the easiest task for Fisher, who chaired the local farmers' committee that approves disaster payments on behalf of the Tulare County branch of the federal Farm Service Agency. In one case, a nectarine grower sought help for weather damage after he had pulled down his own trees. Other farmers claimed to have suffered disasters when the weather was normal.

Fisher said he doesn't begrudge growers who have collected disaster aid, despite the cost to taxpayers. His own farm has gotten some. "Whether it's right or wrong, if they are offering it, you're foolish to turn it down," he said.

Tulare farmers have received a total of nearly $77 million in disaster payments since 1998. They have also netted $51.1 million in crop insurance. Yet the county harvest has been bountiful in most years, with agricultural sales reaching an all-time high of $4 billion in 2005.

The county hasn't suffered a true weather disaster since Christmas 1998, when it was hit with a freeze and torrential rains, according to local weather consultants and some farmers.

"Katrina is a disaster," said Tom Gruber, a local orange grower. "A hurricane in Florida is a disaster."

But very few Tulare farmers are rejected when they apply for disaster aid, records show. Of the 732 applications by orange growers for assistance in the past two disaster bills, only 33 were ruled ineligible -- less than 5 percent.

Don Laux, 78, of Porterville, is one of dozens of citrus growers who have gotten help.

Some of the orange trees on his 500-plus acres were planted in 1911 and have survived Tulare County weather for nearly a century. As do most citrus growers, Laux and his son Gary use wind machines, automatic irrigation systems, computerized weather stations and a private weather consultant to minimize their risks. They also take out crop insurance, which has paid them for losses. Still, Laux Land Co. has received $215,000 in disaster payments since 1998, according to USDA records.

"I think anyone could get along without it, but it would be a lot harder," Don Laux said. "Any little bit helps."

Last year, the Lauxes received $73,000 in disaster payments for losses on a portion of their 2004 crop of navels and Valencias. They based their claim on a warm spell that "hit the blooms" and caused some oranges to fall prematurely.

Most of their orchards came through okay, but when Don Laux checked with the packaging house that handled their oranges, he learned that yields per acre had fallen by up to 40 percent in some of their orchards. Armed with the records, the Lauxes filed for aid.

"We're not farming for the government, we're farming for ourselves," Gary Laux said. "We truly would like to make money growing crops. But there are a lot of influences out there we have no control over. It's nice to have a safety net."

Minutes of monthly Farm Service Agency meetings, obtained under the Freedom of Information Act, show that some Tulare growers have pushed the disaster program to the limit. In March 2004, for example, a grower sought a payment on 27.6 acres of nectarines he said he had grown three years earlier. After a field inspection and aerial photographs, the committee concluded that "there was no evidence of nectarines. The slides distinctly show pulled trees in bunches on the 27.6 acres."

A catfish farmer who put in a claim for fish lost because of heat "was unable to substantiate the viability of the operation." A field inspection found "a lack of evidence of fish or fish bones in the dried up ponds."

Both applications were rejected.'Everything but the Kitchen Sink'

Congressional sponsors of disaster legislation offer a variety of reasons for their bills. They say federally subsidized insurance doesn't cover all of a farmer's losses, and disaster aid fills the gaps. It helps to stabilize rural economies, which don't have many other options. And it offsets rising fuel and production costs while securing cheap food for Americans.

"Any suggestion that things are good in ag country does not meet the reality test," Rep. Jerry Moran (R-Kan.), chairman of a key House Agriculture subcommittee, observed in a floor speech last year. His office recently helped to coordinate a day of lobbying by farmers and agriculture groups pressing for billions in aid for the 2005 and 2006 crop years.

To get those costly disaster packages passed, their sponsors spread the money around. Recent disaster bills include millions for cottonseed producers and pecan and sugar beet growers; set-asides for farmers in Virginia and North Carolina; and $7.2 million for a transportation project benefiting a sugar grower's co-op in Hawaii. Since 1990, legislators have muscled through eight major disaster packages and several smaller provisions covering every year except the past two, including money for clams, oysters, shellfish, hay, sod, shrimp and lobster.

Many of the recent disaster packages have been shoehorned into large appropriations bills, including a military construction bill in 2004. That means legislators do not even get an opportunity to vote directly on the subsidies.

"The problem with ad hoc disaster programs is that in order to get them passed, they throw in everything but the kitchen sink," said Tom Buis, president of the National Farmers Union. The industry group favors overhauling the present system to make it more rigorous while still targeting farmers in need. "There's a lot of ways we can do this better. We need to start looking at the underlying cause of the problem, not just the symptoms."

Buis added that farmers don't expect to have all of their losses covered by disaster payments. "They're not being made whole now," he said. "What we have is a horrible public policy that needs to be fixed so we help farmers who truly have a need."

Among the ideas being considered by Buis and others is guaranteeing a portion of a farmer's income.

In recent months, lawmakers from the Plains states have pressed for billions more in disaster aid to cover the past two crop years, contending that farmers have been devastated by drought and rising costs. The Bush administration opposes the additional aid, noting that crops were at "record or near record" levels in 2005 and that millions would go to farmers who do not really need the money.

In a letter to Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) wrote that not all farmers have "had the good fortune to produce above average crops," adding that the $4 billion wouldn't "come close to making farmers whole."A Perennial Safety Net

Conrad's home state highlights how disaster aid has become a kind of perennial safety net for risk-prone farmers. North Dakota ranks second, behind only Texas, in total disaster aid, with almost $1 billion in the past decade. Its farmers have suffered floods and droughts, with many getting payments over and over.

Federal agricultural disasters have been declared five out of the past six years in Cavalier County, where farmers grow wheat and barley on flat, wind-blown fields in the northeastern corner of the state. None of the farmers' applications for aid for their 2003-2004 crops was turned down, records show. "There was no reason to turn any down," said Michele Schommer, who heads the local office of the Farm Service Agency. "The whole county was bad."

Although accounting for 2 percent of all farms in North Dakota, Cavalier County has received more than 7 percent of the state's disaster payments in the past decade. The average total of $113,000 per farm was more than double the state average and nearly 20 times the national average.

At 6,300 acres, Dettler Farms is among the biggest in Cavalier County. It has collected disaster payments each time they were available in the past decade -- $450,000 all together. The farm has also received insurance payments nearly every year, said Steve Dettler.

Last year "was the worst year ever," Dettler said. Rains came during the planting season in June. "You couldn't get into the fields."

Dettler and other farmers are counting on more help. In late August, Conrad staged a rally of 400 farmers in Bismarck supporting a multibillion-dollar aid package to help farmers and ranchers in the western part of the state, which has been beset by drought. He was joined by Gov. John Hoeven (R).

The drought has actually helped Cavalier County by drying out fields that had been flooded; farmers there are harvesting one of their best crops in a decade. But Dettler said he hopes there is a disaster program to cover his 2005 losses.

"We depend on it being there every other year," he said. "It's an election year, and everyone's involved this time."

Conrad said that "it's a key and legitimate question" to ask how much aid farmers should get. But he added, "We're in something extraordinary. Go to the Gulf Coast, they have 100 years' experience with hurricanes. We don't say, 'Enough' to Florida, or to California and earthquakes, wildfires and mudslides. As a matter of national policy, we help out areas that have natural disasters."How Much Risk to Bear?

How much risk should taxpayers expect American farmers to bear on their own?

Mark Orebaugh struggles with that question while sitting at the kitchen table in his modest home northwest of Dodge City, Kan. He has received hundreds of thousands of dollars in federal crop insurance in the last four years. An additional $116,000 has arrived in disaster payments.

Finally, after a long pause, he answers that he could tolerate up to a "20 percent" crop loss. "I don't think 20 percent is a disaster," he said. "I could probably handle that if you average out the good and bad years."

But Orebaugh is uncertain and looks to his banker, Leon Flax, for help. Flax, tall and dressed in blue jeans, has worked with Orebaugh and other farmers for years. "I don't know," he says, shaking his head. "Not this year. I don't think you could handle anything this year."

A late freeze hit some of Orebaugh's crops. Then the temperature soared to 100 degrees in June and remained there for weeks, baking his wheat, corn and grain sorghum. The claims adjuster has already been by once, and Orebaugh expects him back soon. He hopes to collect about $200,000 in crop insurance.

Like most Kansas farmers, Orebaugh is heavily insured. With the help of government subsidies, he has covered up to 75 percent of the yields on the 6,000 acres he owns or leases.

Orebaugh said the insurance alone is not enough. To begin with, it does not cover all of a farmer's losses. In addition, if a farmer suffers poor harvests in back-to-back years, his insurance policy, which is based on his average yield over four years, covers less. This is a major sore point in areas such as Kansas, which has been hard hit by droughts.

"I'm not sure what more we can do," said Rebecca Davies, a regional director for the crop insurance program in Topeka, Kan. "We have coverage [plans] of up to 85 percent. What more could you ask for? They still pass disaster programs."

Kansas farmers have received $421 million in disaster payments since 2001, among the highest payouts nationally. That is in addition to $1.3 billion in insurance payments to farmers and $680 million in federal subsides to help farmers pay their premiums.

For Orebaugh and most Kansas farmers, the federal insurance is "a good deal." In the past four years, he has paid $81,730 in premiums but collected $295,796 in claims-- or $3.62 for every $1 he put in. That's higher than the state average, but Orebaugh farms on the western side of Kansas where water is scarce and much of the farmland isn't irrigated.

"There's just no water," he said. "We probably should never have developed those [fields] when we did 30 years ago because the water table was declining."

Orebaugh's grandfather immigrated from Germany in 1901. "He crossed two of the most fertile valleys in the country, the Missouri and the Mississippi, and settled in western Kansas," Orebaugh said. "Why he ever landed in this godforsaken valley I don't know."

A drought has plagued much of western Kansas, including Ford County, where Orebaugh farms, since 2000. Orebaugh has had two good crop years out of the last six. "This year is going to be a wipeout," he said.

The good years help to average out the bad. "I use the money to pay back my loans," Orebaugh said. But he quickly adds that he rarely gets ahead. "That's why we need disaster assistance. It's the only way we can pay back our loans."

This year, Orebaugh took on an additional 1,000 acres in his operation and has higher costs and a bigger bank loan, about $230,000. "Talk about a case of bad timing," he said. Now, he is "praying" for another disaster bill.

"We don't like it any more than the taxpayers do. With disaster assistance, we're at the whims of the politicians," he said. "But we need something. I don't care what you name it.

"It's feast or famine here. Economically, does it make sense? Probably not. Philosophically, I don't know. Americans want cheap food, and they want it when they want it."

Too Big For Disaster Aid, Farmer Chooses To Divide And Conquer (WP)

By Gilbert M. Gaul, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

NASHVILLE, N.C. -- When Hurricane Floyd flooded his crops in 1999, causing millions in losses, Dale C. Bone didn't get a dime from the government.

DOJ_NMG_0081502

Bone was too big. His farming and packing business easily exceeded the government's cutoff of $2.5 million in annual gross income for federal disaster payments. "We were a lot larger than that," he recalled.

So following the hurricane, Bone got creative. Instead of continuing as a corporation, he restructured as a partnership with 13 different owners. That way, each partner could apply individually and fall below the government's income limit.

"We were forced to go into these partnerships to qualify," Bone said. "It's ridiculous. We should be able to get the payments regardless. It's the same people involved."

Soon, disaster aid was flowing to Bone's operations in eastern North Carolina, and it was all perfectly legal. Between 2001-2005, the Dale Bone Farms Partnership collected more than $4.7 million in federal disaster payments, records show. That made Bone, 63, one of the largest recipients of disaster aid in the nation. Still, he said, his losses exceed what he got in disaster aid.

Bone said the area was hit by a series of tropical storms and excessive rain. "Two thousand and four hurt the worst. We lost about 1,000 acres of sweet potatoes. We lost cucumbers with disease. Mildew was terrible. We've just had terrible weather."

Most of the payments Bone and his partners received came from the Noninsured Crop Disaster Assistance Program, or NAP, a little known federal plan for farmers whose crops do not qualify for federally subsidized insurance. Eligible crops include mushrooms, Christmas trees, ginseng, turf grass, sea grass and tropical fish. Bone said he qualified for cucumbers and sweet potatoes.

To apply for a NAP payment, growers must pay a $100 fee and meet certain deadlines. They have to lose at least half of their crop to a natural disaster, or be prevented from planting 35 percent of their intended acres. Growers get 55 percent of the average market price for losses.

Congress approved NAP in 1994 but expanded it in 2000. Since then, payments have grown sharply, topping $100 million each year and nearly $900 million since the program's inception. Unlike other disaster programs, NAP is fully funded and doesn't require annual legislation.

The Oak Ridge Fish Hatchery in Plant City, Fla., received $200,000 in NAP payments and $160,000 in regular disaster payments after two freezes killed tropical fish in some of its 400 open ponds a few years ago. "We have NAP because there's no crop insurance available for tropical fish," owner David Drawdy said. The firm, located halfway between Tampa and Orlando, sells to Wal-Mart and PETCO.

Steve Peterson, who oversees the NAP program, said fish hatcheries qualify as long as the fish are grown "in a controlled environment. We cover fingerlings, brood fish. We cover the food fish," he said.

For Dale Bone, who has retired from farming, the payments have ended. "I've sold my business," he said recently. "I'm down to zero. I'm out."

Most Farmers Skipping Subsidized Loans And Going For The Cash (WP)

By Gilbert M. Gaul And Sarah Cohen, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

There is an alternative to giving struggling farmers emergency disaster aid after every drought, hurricane and storm. Only farmers who cannot qualify for a commercial loan are eligible.

They can take out federally subsidized low-interest loans up to $500,000 for each disaster they experience. But the farmers tend to pass up the emergency loans in favor of the emergency cash.

For example, Nebraska farmers took out just nine emergency loans totaling about $389,000 between 2004-2006, records show. During roughly the same period, they collected more than $100 million in disaster payments.

"They don't want a loan," said R. Coke Gray II, head of the Farm Service Agency in Columbus County, N.C., where farmers have also gotten millions in disaster aid. "They want a disaster program because those are going to be dollars they don't have to borrow. If I was in their boat, I'd do it too."

Others say the farmers are just being smart.

"Farmers are very careful about taking on additional debt," said Brian Wolford, the top U.S. Department Agriculture official in Nebraska. "At the same time, I don't think any farmer counts on disaster aid because there are no guarantees."

Nationwide, use of the loans has declined sharply as disaster aid has increased. Farmers took out just 381 emergency loans in 2005, down from nearly 2,500 in 2000, records show.

The loans began in the late 1940s when the Farmers Home Administration began looking for a way to help farmers recover from natural disasters.

To qualify, farmers must be located in a county that has been declared a disaster by the secretary of agriculture. The declaration process is complicated and involves surveys, paperwork and meetings. Dozens of local, state and federal officials are involved, including two USDA employees who review applications and make recommendations to the secretary.

Each year, thousands of applications arrive in Washington. And so long as they meet the government's threshold that at least one crop or one farmer in a county suffered a loss of 30 percent or greater, they usually are approved.

"It is not a very high bar to clear," USDA Deputy Administrator John Johnson acknowledged in an e-mail to The Post.

Recently, as many as two of every three counties in the country have received declarations, prompting some to question the government's standard. "To me, we're not living in the Sahara," said Hunt Shipman, a former top USDA official. "So if we're having multiple years of disaster declarations, we may not have the right ruler to measure disasters."

Local officials, governors and farm state legislators campaign aggressively for the declarations, writing letters and making phone calls. Nebraska Gov. Dave Heineman made three requests this year on behalf of counties hurt by drought. He was joined by Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel, who wrote three separate letters to the USDA, according to a July press release issued by Hagel's office applauding a declaration covering 49 counties.

"Today's announcement is an important step to help farmers and ranchers . . .survive a difficult market and recover from damages caused by poor conditions," Hagel wrote.

Despite the effort, few farmers in Nebraska or elsewhere appear to want the loans that the disaster declarations enable.

Why do legislators go to all the trouble then? Hagel did not respond to requests for comment. Some USDA officials believe it is so legislators can put out press releases showing they are helping their farm constituents.

"There is also a public relations benefit for those officials who like to write letters requesting or supporting the designation," Johnson told The Post.

Still another reason is that the letters and disaster declarations attract public attention and help set the stage for disaster legislation that puts cash in the hands of farmers, some times years later.

"Probably the most important thing it does is it signals there is a greater need out there," Wolford said.

'Farming Your Insurance' (WP)

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

WHITEVILLE, N.C. -- Crop insurance helps to protect farmers against the vagaries of weather. But it can also alter the landscape of farming in a region, resulting in higher losses for taxpayers.

Consider the lowly sweet potato.

For years, it was excluded from federal crop insurance. But in the late 1990s, growers and legislators in North Carolina successfully lobbied federal officials for coverage. Soon, the number of acres planted with sweet potatoes was doubling and tripling, as were the claims filed by farmers.

In Columbus County, a low-lying area tucked away in the southern corner of the state, the number of sweet potato acres quadrupled after federal crop insurance was introduced in 1998. Almost immediately, losses also began mounting: $1.4 million in 1999, $2 million in 2000, $3.3 million in 2001. Between 1999 and 2005, sweet potato farmers paid $954,264 in premiums but collected nearly $15 million in federal insurance payments -- a return of almost $16 on every $1 in premiums.

On one level, it was a case of bad luck, growers said. Starting in 1999 with Hurricane Floyd, the county was hit with a series of storms that roared in off the coast and dumped buckets of rain on their fields during the fall harvest. A root crop, sweet potatoes are vulnerable to standing water and rot easily.

"We just seem to have had one storm after another," said Phil Gore, a crop insurance agent who also grew sweet potatoes until a few years ago.

But other growers and government officials said the large losses couldn't be explained by bad weather alone. They said some of the farmers who started growing sweet potatoes had never grown them before. Others planted in areas known to be wet. Still others didn't take care of their crops, saving money on fertilizers and other production costs, only to turn around and file insurance claims when their yields were poor -- a practice known as "farming your insurance."

"I heard some farmers plant in dark, wet soil," said Michael Shaw, a county extension agent. "Others were planting their bushes far apart, so when the adjuster came it looked like they had a bad yield."

"There was definitely a problem with the insurance," said R. Coke Gray II, a local USDA official. "Someone could go out and put nitrogen on their plants. That makes them nice and bushy . . . but produces no potatoes."

Crop insurance officials became so alarmed about the sweet potato losses that they hired a consultant. In October 2003, the consultant reported that the high losses could not be explained by weather alone and that the losses for sweet potatoes "were remarkably higher than those of other crops."

Several members of the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation, which sets policy for the insurance program, wanted to eliminate sweet potato insurance in Columbus County. After lobbying by the North Carolina congressional delegation, a revised insurance plan was introduced with higher premiums and stiff restrictions on the number of acres that farmers were allowed to plant. Growers also had to hire a "scout" to inspect their crops before harvest.

Most of the changes went into effect in 2005, with dramatic results. The number of insured acres of sweet potatoes in Columbus County plummeted to 1,548, from a high of about 6,000. The lower figure was nearly identical to the number of acres planted in 1997, the year before insurance became available. Losses also took a nosedive, to $109,265.

"After they revised the program, it wasn't as easy to collect," said George Wooten III, whose family has grown sweet potatoes here for decades. "It's almost like the guys who were in it before insurance stayed in it, and ones who weren't left."

In Cities, Healthful Living Through Fresher Shopping (WP)

By Amy Goldstein, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

PHILADELPHIA -- When Larry Lawrence drops into ShopRite, he steers his shopping cart to the towering mounds of produce. "It is like I am being drawn," he said, "by the peaches and the plums and the bananas."

Lawrence, 57, has been eating more fruits and vegetables, and fresh fish, too, since the sprawling store opened five blocks from his house in Eastwick, an industrial swath of southwest Philadelphia that was chosen in the 1950s as the nation's largest urban renewal project. Now, Eastwick is one of the first sites of a new strategy for social change: a government campaign to bring supermarkets stocked with healthful food into neglected inner-city neighborhoods to improve public health.

The Pennsylvania Fresh Food Financing Initiative, leveraging $30 million in state money with $90 million in private funds, is the most ambitious of a spate of state and local projects around the country. They represent a different model for public nutrition programs, which have relied since the 1960s on federal subsidies, such as food stamps and WIC.

Healthful food is scarce in many inner-city neighborhoods, where much of the food comes from corner markets and greasy takeout places. Instead of subsidizing shoppers, the projects shift the emphasis to the private sector, offering coaching and financial inducements for grocers to go into areas they shunned for decades.

These initiatives grow out of new research exploring the relationship among proximity to fresh food, the nation's obesity epidemic and diseases such as diabetes that are affected by diet. "We tried to make the connection between grocery stores and public health," said R. Duane Perry, executive director of the Food Trust, a nonprofit group that, in a pioneering 2002 study, produced maps showing that low-income neighborhoods of Philadelphia with few or no supermarkets had high death rates from diet-related diseases.

A study in Chicago, released three months ago, measured the distance from every city block to the nearest grocery store and fast-food restaurant. It found that people in what it called Chicago's "food deserts" died early in greater numbers and had more diabetes, obesity and high blood pressure.

Such public health discoveries -- combined with an older view of supermarkets as tools of economic development -- have been spurring new policies around the country.

In the District, a mayor's commission on nutrition in July issued a study by a nonprofit group, D.C. Hunger Solutions, showing that obesity is highest in the city's two wards east of the Anacostia River, where poverty is greatest and access to grocery stores is worst. The D.C. government has worked to attract a Giant supermarket that opened last year in Columbia Heights and one being built in Congress Heights, but those efforts began years ago more out of a desire to revitalize the neighborhoods than to improve residents' eating habits.

Baltimore created a Supermarket Initiative in 2002 that has used city economic development funds to attract 19 stores so far. The California legislature passed a bill in August designed to give low-income residents discounts to buy fruits and vegetables -- and help mom-and-pop stores carry more fresh food.

Chicago's planning department held a "grocers' expo" in February for executives from supermarket chains across the Midwest, who were handed a book touting 50 spots in Chicago where stores are needed, plus financial incentives the city could offer. And the National Conference of State Legislators just brought lawmakers to Philadelphia from Louisiana, New Mexico and Michigan to learn how they might replicate the food-financing initiative.

Here in Philadelphia, the initiative's first two years have yielded a central lesson: Despite the fervor of politicians, civic groups, bankers and several grocers, creating successful supermarkets in poor city neighborhoods is hard. It is daunting to train workers, maintain security -- even to acquire enough land.

"The money, to be honest with you, was the easy part," said state Rep. Dwight Evans (D), the initiative's main political patron. "The toughest part is to make this work."

The Rev. Leon Sullivan, the renowned civil rights leader, developed Progress Plaza in North Philadelphia nearly 40 years ago as an example of black empowerment. For its first three decades, the shopping center was anchored by a series of grocery stores. The last one closed eight years ago, and now the only food available is Popeyes fried chicken. Nearby drugstores have added shelves of canned food and chips, but not produce.

Helen Love, 86, a widow and retired inspector for an electronics plant, is one of many original residents in the nearby townhouses of Yorktown, the model neighborhood for black residents that went up in the 1960s. Now, she and a friend, Marvella Lattimore, take turns every other week driving each other to a supermarket half an hour away. Love parks in a handicapped spot and is so tired when she gets home that, she said, "that's usually it for the day."

Across the street, Israel Edward, 74, who has stopped driving because of poor eyesight, takes the bus to Reading Terminal Market in Center City. "I only bring what my two arms can carry," he said. Next door, Doris Turner, 85, gets to a large grocery store about every two months, when a grandson in the National Guard can take her.

Evans, the legislator, lived near Yorktown as a young boy and remembers shopping at Best Market with his aunt Rosie. He remembers the race riots of 1964 along the street the supermarket was on, with nickels all over the ground from parking meters the looters had broken. And he remembers, in the few years after the violence, the disinvestment by white merchants.

So when the Food Trust's director brought him the maps of grocery stores and death rates, he understood their importance. As minority chairman of the Pennsylvania House Appropriations Committee, he has put $10 million in the state budget for the food initiative each of the past three years, requiring three times as much in private financing. The Food Trust helps with applications. The Reinvestment Fund, a nonprofit financing institution, has secured money from banks, screens applicants and awards the grants. The money can be used for marketing studies, land acquisition, environmental cleanup, city permits, construction, and help with worker training and store security.

So far, the fund has given grants for nine stores in Philadelphia and five elsewhere in the state. Most are for large, new supermarkets, but a few are helping corner stores expand or buy refrigeration equipment to carry more fresh food.

Not all succeed. A Shop 'N Bag opened in West Philadelphia in late 2004 and closed a year later -- a casualty of an inexperienced owner and delays in housing redevelopment that was to have generated customers, according to Evans and the Food Trust's Perry. And there have been snags. Fresh Grocer, which is to return a supermarket, at last, to Progress Plaza, was to have its opening this fall, but that will be delayed at least until late in 2007 -- the result of complications with permits and with renovations of the rest of the shopping center.

In an industry with typical profit margins of 1 to 2 percent, inner-city neighborhoods are "a far more complicated place to build your business," with higher costs and less demand for profitable luxury foods, said Jeffrey Brown, president of Brown's Super Stores, which owns the ShopRite in Eastwick. The store, near the Philadelphia airport, opened two years ago with help from a $5 million tax refund for capital investment and a $250,000 grant to train workers.

Brown's strategy here has been to align the business more closely with the neighbors than he does at his suburban stores. Before opening, he invited civic and religious leaders to lunch to talk over what they expected from the store. Working from scratch, his employees make sweet-potato pies and cakes, down-home potato salad, seafood cakes, and 100 other recipes catering to local tastes that he could not buy wholesale.

Brown conferred with the imams at local mosques about what foods meet Muslim residents' halal requirements. He has brought in a Western Union outlet for the neighborhood's Caribbean immigrants to wire remittances.

A community job bank has funneled 90 percent of the store's workers, many from families where steady jobs are unfamiliar, Brown said. He invited Maggie Powell, longtime president of the Eastwick Project Area Committee, to help teach new hires how to comport themselves at work. And when Powell's 39-year-old son was fatally shot in June, store managers took food trays to her house at no charge for three days.

In turn, Powell and local politicians helped to lobby the local utility company, Peco, after Brown was told the power could not be turned on in time for the store's grand opening. It was. Other problems prove harder to solve. When a manager catches a shoplifter, Brown said, the police say they are too busy with violent crime to come.

The store lost money in its first year, Brown said, but had a profit of close to 1 percent in its second.

The effect ShopRite and the other stores are having on nutrition is less well understood. Recent research, for example, that included rural, suburban and urban areas of a few states showed that black residents -- but not white ones -- had somewhat more healthful diets if they could buy fresh food nearby. A few months ago, Stephen Matthews, a sociologist at Pennsylvania State University, began a rigorous study in Philadelphia on whether the arrival of a supermarket changes the amount of fruits and vegetables people eat.

On a recent afternoon, Larry Lawrence, stopping in on his way home from work as a counselor for troubled boys, said: "I'm glad they moved in. There are two or three guys, all day long, putting out fresh stuff. Bananas. Strawberries."

Not all shoppers are attracted by the produce. "It's the sweet-potato cake. They don't have that at any other store," said Toinette Alexander.

Still, Brown, said, "we are doing $40,000, $50,000, $60,000 a week in fruits and vegetables. That is more fruits and vegetables than was happening before."

Medicare Slammed For Not Improving Lab-quality Rules (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 15, 2006

Some scientists and consumer health groups are angry that the U.S. Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) has decided not to write new rules designed to improve the quality of laboratories that perform genetic testing, keeping in place current guidelines.

"We're very disappointed," said Rick Borchelt, spokesman for the Genetics and Public Policy Center. "After years of saying they were going to do this, they did a complete about-face ... with no justification. We're mystified."

Late last month, the Genetics and Public Policy Center -- along with the Genetic Alliance and the Public Citizen Health Research Group -- filed a petition with CMS demanding the agency create a "genetic testing specialty" under the provisions of the Clinical Laboratories Improvement Amendments (CLIA) of 1988, which CMS administers.

The groups argued that additional regulation was necessary to ensure high-quality genetic test results, which they say are now used to diagnose more than 900 diseases.

"Making sure that laboratories can accurately and reliably perform genetic tests is a fundamental requirement for the success of genetic medicine, and a fundamental obligation of CMS," said Kathy Hudson, director of the Genetics and Public Policy Center.

"In 2000, CMS thought the creation of rulemaking with CLIA was a good idea," said Catherine D. O'Connell, a senior scientist with Tetracore Inc., a biotechnology research and development firm in Rockville. Until just a few months ago, she and others said, CMS said new rules to strengthen and ensure the quality of genetic labs should be under CLIA.

But now CMS says it "will focus on beefed-up oversight of genetic testing labs under current rules," Miss O'Connell said.

CMS recently informed an advisory panel that oversees CLIA that it has "scrapped the rulemaking effort," even though work to establish "specialty requirements for genetic testing" had been under way for years.

In an e-mail, CMS confirmed it has decided "there will not be a CLIA genetic testing standard" and offered a half-dozen explanations.

Key among them, CMS said, is that a "CLIA regulation would not resolve the problem that these tests are not currently FDA-approved, and, therefore, not clinically validated."

Besides, CMS said, it has no data indicating genetic testing labs "have any more problems than labs doing other kinds of testing."

Furthermore, the federal agency said, it is still not clear how such rules would address a host of sensitive moral issues, such as when doctors use tests that could show a patient is suffering from an incurable disease predict how long that patient will live.

CLIA standards "would not fix ethical, legal and social issues associated with genetic testing," CMS said.

What's more, CMS said, the genetic testing field is "so dynamic, it would be impossible to write prescriptive standards for these tests that would not go out of date before they are published."

Meanwhile, the Food and Drug Administration (FDA), which says it wants to take over the regulation of genetic testing, has been sending letters to clinical labs that do such testing. The letters warn the labs that they are violating federal law by providing these "unapproved medical devices (tests)" to clinicians, said Richard A. Samp, chief counsel of the Washington Legal Foundation. The labs were told they can "either submit voluntarily to FDA regulations" or stop providing the tests, he said.

The public interest law firm recently filed a citizen petition with the FDA, calling on the agency to cease its efforts to enforce its "medical device" regulations.

An FDA spokeswoman said the agency has fully explained why it thinks it should be regulating genetic tests in congressional hearings.

Citing Heavenly Injunctions To Fight Earthly Warming (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

WYANDOTTE, Mich. — To find St. Elizabeth Roman Catholic Church in this working class suburb south of Detroit, look toward the roofline, for the windmill. Not a big windmill, it is a spare steel structure maybe nine feet high, perched atop the rectory of the church and facing northeast into the winds that come off Lake Erie.

Yet the windmill, two solar panels on the roof, another atop the front porch and a solar water heating system above the garage are the pride of the Rev. Charles Morris, St. Elizabeth's priest.

Over the last five years, Father Morris has sharply reduced his small parish's energy use and emissions of carbon dioxide, the compound most scientists believe has led to global warming, and he has organized other congregations across Michigan to do the same.

"We're all part of God's creation," Father Morris said. "If someone like me doesn't speak about its care, who will? The changes we've made here, that's a form of preaching."

Over the last year, religious activism on global warming has won much attention. Last February, 86 evangelical Christian leaders backed an initiative to combat global warming, a move that broke the evangelical movement's broad silence on the issue but exposed stark divisions.

In October, 4,000 congregations of various faiths will show films on global warming, including "An Inconvenient Truth." [On Oct. 8, Christian, Muslim, Jewish and Buddhist leaders met in Philadelphia to discuss global warming.]

At ground level, clergy members and lay people have been working to increase awareness of global warming and to reduce their own greenhouse gas emissions. Many, like Father Morris, were active for years before the issue attracted wider concern. Encounters in their own lives awakened them to global warming, they said. But their faith and the imperatives they see in their Scriptures compelled them to act, they said.

"If you do worship the Creator, you take care of his creation," said Greg Wickersham, a high school teacher and a member of the environmental ministry at Intown Community Church in Atlanta, which is affiliated with the theologically conservative Presbyterian Church in America.

"If we are made in his image, we should mirror his image in our dominion over the Earth," Mr. Wickersham said. "He is creative and sustaining, not destructive."

Father Morris is the executive director of the 124-member Michigan Interfaith Power and Light, the state affiliate of Interfaith Power and Light, the religious association that organized the screenings of the global warming films.

The Michigan organization's representatives speak to local congregations about global warming and ways to counteract it. They arrange for "energy audits," so people can learn how to reduce consumption without sacrificing comfort. Changes include replacing regular light bulbs with long-life fluorescent ones and more ambitious projects like installing solar panels.

In 2005 and the first three quarters of 2006 combined, energy-saving efforts by the group's members have prevented the release into the atmosphere of 14,130 tons of carbon dioxide, according to Enerficiency, an energy consulting firm. Investments in new technology are projected to save the group's congregations nearly $2 million "over the life of the new products," Enerficiency said.

St. Elizabeth itself has reduced its peak energy demand by 60 percent over the last five years and has reduced its annual energy bills by $20,000, Father Morris said.

Father Morris's interest in the environment was nurtured as he roamed farmland next to his childhood home in southern Ohio, times, he said, when he had "an experience of the divine."

His readings and his degree in urban planning sharpened his awareness of global warming. And his faith buttresses his activism, he said. He notes that the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops has urged greater care of the environment. He cites Biblical passages, like Genesis 2:15, that call upon humans to care for God's creation.

Father Morris has found allies in poor urban churches and well-to-do mosques and synagogues in the suburbs. Rabbi Daniel Nevins of Adat Shalom Synagogue in Farmington Hills, a northwest suburb of Detroit, draws inspiration from many of the Bible passages Father Morris cites. Rabbi Nevins focuses much of his efforts on bringing environmental concerns into some of the worship at Adat Shalom.

At Yom Kippur, as part of a ritual when Jews admit their sins before God, Rabbi Nevins added a passage he wrote about the "sin of destroying God's creation." As Jews celebrate the Sukkot holiday and sleep in temporary structures meant to evoke those that Jews lived in during their 40 years in the desert, they are also meant to see the beauty of nature and the fragility of their own existence, Rabbi Nevins said.

Still, it is slow going, he said. The sprawling Conservative synagogue has replaced many of its windows and lights and instituted a large recycling program, but Rabbi Nevins wants to do more. "There's not an active resistance, but people give lip service to environmental ideas and don't change their lifestyle," he said.

Many clergy members run into resistance stemming from theology, economics or politics. The Rev. Gerald Durley of Providence Baptist Church in Atlanta, a largely African-American congregation, said that parishioners often thought of global warming as a distant issue, while problems like crime or the spread of AIDS must be tackled now.

Mr. Durley said he reminded them that in the early 1980's, many blacks dismissed AIDS as a remote issue, too, one that affected only gay white men.

Despite the February statement by prominent evangelicals about global warming, many in the pews remain unconvinced, often because they see it as an issue of the political left.

"When I give talks on environmental stewardship at Christian colleges, I have students look me in the eye and ask, 'Is global warming real?' " said Dave Mahan, associate director of the Au Sable Institute of Environmental Studies, a Christian environmental education organization headquartered in Grand Rapids, Mich. “I answer that God wants us to lead a stewardly life whether or not there is global warming.”

The Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, a Catholic religious order for women, used an opportunity to renovate their 73-year-old mother house in Monroe, Mich., to create a model of sustainable energy and water use.

The 376,000-square-foot building is heated and cooled by geothermal power, provided by some 240 wells dug on the order’s property. Water from sinks and showers, or “gray water,” is fed into a natural filtration and treatment system in a series of ponds and then recycled for use in toilets. Some lawns have been given over to natural meadows to reduce watering and mowing. Insulation is made of recycled materials. The building now saves $200,000 annually in energy costs.

Some neighbors find the shaggy meadows unsightly. The city had to be persuaded to allow the gray water scheme. But the order, the average age of whose members at the mother house is 86, is also asked regularly to advise other groups, religious and secular, on building energy efficient facilities.

“We are recreating the monastery of old, where people come to learn how to live into the next century,” said Sister Janet Ryan, a member of the order’s leadership council. “Our dream is that the mother house serves as something of an ecological lab. For a bunch of elderly women, we have a huge agenda.”

Cartel Figure Lashes Out (DMN)

Ex-informant held by U.S. says drug corruption is rampant

A former informant whose participation in drug-related murders in Mexico caused turmoil in the U.S. agency that paid him says that there were more killings than reported and that drug corruption extends into the U.S. and Mexican governments.

In sworn testimony and in response to questions submitted through his attorney, Guillérmo Eduardo Ramírez Peyro, the man known as "Lalo," provided new details about his work as a drug cartel operative and as a U.S. government informant, and he claimed to have personal knowledge of extensive government corruption.

Juárez story archive: Drugs, death and scandal

Mr. Ramírez also lashed out at his former U.S. employers, saying they are turning their backs on him after he helped them apprehend dozens of drug traffickers.

"With the names I provided they were able to arrest more than 50 people, and they took millions of dollars from drug proceeds from U.S. streets," he said. "In spite of that, I'm jailed here without any protection and without any guarantee that I will stay in the United States."

Mr. Ramírez, 35, is being held by the U.S. government at an undisclosed location in the Midwest, fighting deportation to Mexico, where he insists he faces "certain death."

U.S. authorities characterize him as a renegade informant whose independent actions led, in part, to the August 2004 killing of an El Paso man, Abraham Guzmán, outside a hamburger restaurant in that border city.

Mr. Ramírez made his remarks in a written response to questions submitted through his attorney, Jodi Goodwin. He had agreed to speak with reporters from The Dallas Morning News, which first reported about his role in the cartel killings in March 2004; the Mexico city weekly magazine Proceso; the London Observer; and Narco News, an Internet blog, but prison officials transferred him hours before the scheduled interview.

He apparently was moved at the request of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the agency he served as an informant for four years, Ms. Goodwin said.

Implicating officers

DOJ_NMG_0081510

Mr. Ramírez, in confidential memos to ICE, had described how he infiltrated Mexico's powerful Juárez drug cartel and on two occasions witnessed cartel-ordered assassinations and supervised disposal of the victims, including a U.S. citizen. The bodies were found in January 2004 buried in the yard of a Juárez home.

In his latest comments, Mr. Ramírez said the killings usually were carried out by night-shift Mexican police officers working for the cartel and using the nickname "La Linea," or The Line.

"Not all the victims were assassinated at the same house," Mr. Ramírez said. "Some were left on the streets. They would kill people all the time, people who were not buried in [the same house], but in other homes too." He said there were "many more" killings but did not elaborate.

Mr. Ramírez insists he played no direct role in any killing, but critics of his role with ICE have said he was not just a spectator, as agency officials have said.

Reports in The News about his role in the cartel killings rocked the El Paso office of ICE, where four special agents were investigated and two supervisors were transferred. ICE is part of the Department of Homeland Security.

"The U.S. government is afraid of Lalo's mouth," said Ms. Goodwin, "afraid that Lalo will tell the whole story, which will say that every step he took, every move he made, was with the full knowledge of his ICE handlers."

Mr. Ramírez says he would like to be placed in a witness protection program or sent to Europe.

On Aug. 5, 2005, a U.S. immigration judge granted his petition to stay, agreeing that he would face danger in Mexico. The U.S. government, which initially concurred, appealed that decision and now wants him deported. An appeals court overturned the judge's ruling, and Ms. Goodwin is now appealing that decision.

"Am I angry at the U.S. government?" Mr. Ramírez wrote. "No. I'm sad, hurt that after everything I did for ICE they now want to deport me back to Mexico to face a certain death."

ICE officials had no comment. Spokeswoman Leticia Zamarripa said The News' request for comment "was going through the normal review process" and no immediate response was available.

The agency's relationship with Mr. Ramírez was part of an ambitious undercover investigation aimed at snaring Vicente Carrillo Fuentes, then reputedly Latin America's most powerful drug lord.

Misconduct allegations

Critics of the operation have asked whether ICE agents could have prevented some of the killings across the border, and exactly what and when the U.S. attorney's office knew about the killings.

Questions have been raised specifically about the roles of Johnny Sutton, the U.S. attorney in San Antonio, and Juanita Fielden, assistant U.S. attorney in El Paso.

Sandalio González, former Drug Enforcement Administration agent in charge in El Paso, says Mr. Sutton ignored allegations of misconduct by ICE and Ms. Fielden that Mr. González outlined in a lengthy memo to the U.S. attorney's office and the ICE chief in El Paso. He says Mr. Sutton instead used his office to retaliate against Mr. González, who later retired.

"They were not interested in investigating the allegations in my letter; they were more interested in jamming me for writing the letter," Mr. González said.

Mr. Gonzalez made his allegations against Mr. Sutton and Ms. Fielden through the Merit System Protection Board in 2004. The News obtained the document containing his allegation through a Freedom of Information Act request.

Calls to Mr. Sutton's office in San Antonio were not returned. Ms. Fielden's office referred questions to Mr. Sutton.

Two years ago, ICE ordered an internal investigation to restore confidence in the El Paso office. Its findings remain confidential, but top supervisors Patricia Kramer and Giovanni Gaudioso were transferred to Washington. Two other agents were temporarily suspended, and Mr. Ramírez's main handler, Raul Bencomo, remains on administrative leave.

According to court affidavits, the agents said they were not told of the killings beforehand.

"What's clear is, Lalo will haunt us for a long, long time," said an ICE official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Right-hand man

Guillérmo Eduardo Ramírez Peyro is a native of Mexico City and a former highway police officer in the southern state of Guerrero. In the late 1990s, he turned to the drug trade, developing schemes to help smuggle cocaine into the United States. In 2000, he started working as a U.S.-paid drug informant. He says that he earned $224,650 over a four-year period and that ICE still owes him $200,000 for various cases.

For an agency eager to bring down Mr. Carrillo Fuentes, Lalo was a major find. He was the right-hand man of Heriberto Santillán Tabares, considered a top operative in the Juárez cartel.

Among the scores of traffickers he helped bust was Mr. Santillán, who was sentenced to 25 years in prison in a plea bargain with U.S. prosecutors. In the deal, murder charges against Mr. Santillán were dropped.

Mr. Ramírez said he played the role of drug trafficker to help the U.S. government dismantle the cartel. He said he was in constant contact with his American overseers, talking to them three or four times a day. He said he occasionally briefed other U.S. agencies, including the FBI, the DEA and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

El Paso FBI spokeswoman Andrea Simmons said, "We don't confirm or deny whether we talk with certain people or whether we had any briefings with those people." ATF did not return calls seeking comment.

Mr. González said DEA agents met with the informant for briefings but were not told of his role in the killings.

Mr. Ramírez also alleged, in the responses through his lawyer, that some U.S. Customs inspectors and some members of the DEA had links to the drug cartel.

He said he turned over to his minders recordings of conversations in which Mr. Santillán talked about connections between the cartel and the "three letter" agency – which he took as a reference to the DEA – and the fact that "Vicente Carrillo Fuentes had absolutely no worries about the DEA."

David Monnette, DEA spokesman in El Paso, said: "We hold our workforce to the highest ethical standard, and we regard the ethical performance of duty as our first priority. We take very seriously any allegation of misconduct, abuse of position, or criminal action, and we continue to ensure the fair and impartial administration of justice and uphold the integrity and reputation of our outstanding workforce."

Mr. Sandalio, the former El Paso DEA chief, said: "That's entirely possible that the cartel had a hook in DEA. I'm not going to sit here and tell you there is no corruption in our government. Obviously there is."

'They knew everything'

Regarding the Abraham Guzmán case, Mr. Ramírez denied that he engaged in any freelancing that would have resulted in that slaying. He said that while he was in protective custody in San Antonio, his supervisor, Mr. Bencomo, implied that he should return to the border to help on a case involving a corrupt customs inspector. He said he was told the agency needed him to collect $25,000 owed to the inspector. Mr. Ramírez said he instead sent Mr. Guzmán, who was shot to death.

"They knew everything," he said. "For them to say I acted on my own is false."

Mr. Bencomo's attorney, Mary Stillinger, rejected that version of events. "That is absolutely not true," she said. "Agent Bencomo had no idea he [Lalo] was coming to El Paso. He was specifically told not to do that."

In his written responses, Mr. Ramírez also rejected assertions Ms. Fielden made in an affidavit that it was only in late January 2004 that she knew the extent of the informant's role in slayings in Juárez. And he said that far from telling him to stop participating in such criminal activity, his ICE handlers had only one request: that he not tape any future killings. He said he had used hidden microphones to record cartel activities.

The former U.S. informant also impugned authorities in Mexico, saying he worked with corrupt local, state and federal officials, as well as members of the military.

"The Mexican government, the police, the military," he said. "They are the cartel."

In a sworn statement dated Aug. 11 and filed in federal court in Bloomington, Minn., Mr. Ramírez said he was told that the office of the Mexican president had an arrangement with a cartel. He said that Mr. Santillán "explained to me that President [Vicente] Fox took the position to arrange, consult with, the cartel from Juárez. ... He was going to attack the enemy cartels, being from Tijuana and from the Gulf, and then the cartel from Juárez would be operating ... without the government being ... on top of them."

Mr. Ramírez said he personally made arrangements with Colombian drug traffickers to transport drugs with the help of the Mexican navy and federal agents

The Mexican government flatly denied the allegations.

DOJ_NMG_0081512

"Obviously there is no substance to what this man is saying," said Ricardo Cabrera, assistant to the government's top organized crime investigator, José Luis Santiago Vasconcelos. "We have been lauded by the U.S. government for our continuous fight against all drug cartels. This person is saying these things, making allegations of corruption, to save his case and fight deportation to Mexico."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigrant Convict Data Sought Information Should Be Public, Cox Says (AJC)

By Rebecca Carr, Cox Washington Bureau

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 15, 2006

Washington — A federal court of appeals hears oral arguments Tuesday in a case that has broad implications in the debate over illegal immigration and the public's right to know about illegal immigrant convicts who have not been deported as required by law.

Cox Newspapers is asserting in its appeal that the Justice Department should release the names, birthdates and identity numbers of illegal immigrants who have served prison time for serious crimes, including child molestation, manslaughter, drug dealing and drunken driving.

Cox, which includes The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, revealed in a published report four years ago that hundreds of felons were never picked up in Georgia by immigration officials after serving their sentences.

The Justice Department says that it has turned over some of the information requested by Cox under the Freedom of Information Act, which requires federal agencies to disclose government records to the public. The department gave Cox information about the illegal immigrants, including convicts' native country, date taken into custody and date of release, according to legal briefs filed in federal court.

But divulging personally identifiable information such as their full name, date of birth, alien registration number and FBI number would invade the privacy of convicted illegal immigrants and serve no public interest, Justice Department lawyers wrote in legal briefs.

The case raises the question of whether illegal immigrants should be granted the same privacy protections that citizens and legal residents have in the Freedom of Information Act.

The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that privacy protections extend to personally identifying information and they encompass criminal convictions that are a matter of public record, Justice Department lawyers wrote in a legal brief.

The release of additional information would permit the public to connect the records with individuals, the Justice Department argued, creating a clearly unwarranted invasion of their privacy. One of the department's main arguments against disclosure is the possibility of error — that a person would be wrongly identified as an illegal immigrant.

The lawsuit was filed by the Washington bureau of Cox Newspapers, one of the nation's largest publishing companies with 17 daily and 25 weekly newspapers.

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon issued a summary judgment ruling on Sept. 27, 2005, in favor of the Justice Department's decision to turn down Cox's request for personal information about the illegal immigrant convicts.

In that decision, Leon wrote that the privacy interest of the convicted illegal immigrants "far outweighs the public interest that might be served from disclosing this information."

Cox is appealing that decision in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, saying that the public has the right to know if the government has been derelict in its duty to deport convicts who are here illegally. The public also has the right to know if the convicts have repeated their crimes, according to Cox lawyers Jonathan D. Hart and Michael Kovaka.

The Cox lawyers argue that the lower court failed to identify the harm that would come from disclosing the names of the convicted felons who evaded deportation.

"Established notions of privacy confirm that criminals generally have no legitimate privacy interest in limiting public knowledge of their crimes," Hart and Kovaka wrote in a legal brief filed with the court.

Hart and Kovaka argue that criminal convictions are already a matter of public record.

Illegal immigrants do not have the same privacy rights as citizens and legal residents, Hart and Kovaka wrote. Indeed, the lawyers wrote, Congress specifically excluded undocumented aliens from the protections in the Privacy Act.

The case is important to the public because the information contained in the government database reveals that federal immigration officials are failing to properly execute the law, Kovaka said in an interview.

"At the very least this is an egregious inability of the government to fulfill its own obligations under the law and it is endangering the public," Kovaka said.

Cox's quest for information about illegal immigrants goes back four years.

On Dec. 15, 2002, the Cox Washington Bureau published an article in The Journal-Constitution that revealed that 20 percent of the illegal immigrants who had been incarcerated in Georgia's prison system were set free instead of being deported as required by federal law after serving their time.

At least eight of the criminals were convicted of molesting children, others for dealing drugs and robbery.

The Cox Washington Bureau filed a request for records under the Freedom of Information Act on Sept. 12, 2003, seeking records from the Justice Department about the State Criminal Alien Assistance Program.

The program keeps data on illegal immigrants in the prison system to reimburse states and localities for the costs related to the incarceration of illegal immigrants.

The Border Dividing Arizona (NYT)

By Joseph Lelyveld

When House Republicans calculated that their best bet for saving their majority was to run this fall as if illegal immigration and border security were the most urgent issues facing the country — bigger by far than that great unmentionable, Iraq — they were finally speaking the language of a Republican state legislator from Mesa, Ariz., named Russell Pearce. The Arizonan was there before Tom Tancredo, the Colorado congressman who talks of making a run for the White House on the issue; there before even Lou Dobbs and Rush Limbaugh if not Pat Buchanan. A fast-talking former cop, Pearce went into electoral politics only after it became clear that he wouldn't soon be able to realize his dream of becoming sheriff of Maricopa County, the area around Phoenix where more than half of Arizona lives. As a lawmaker, Pearce hasn't just embraced the issue of illegal immigration as a tactic; for him it's a passion — his opponents say an obsession — "the root cause" of almost any other problem Arizona and the nation face. Talk about terrorists and high crime rates, he'll say the border is undefended. Are schools failing? They're being overwhelmed by "a population that don't put a high value to education." Are there a million people in Arizona without health care? "Yeah, they broke into the country illegally. They came into the country poor, they're gonna stay poor. You've imported them!"

Russell Pearce's single-mindedness has proved to be a force in Arizona, setting the political agenda, helping to make illegal immigration the single most important and contested issue in the state. "He's in the catbird seat," a Democratic officeholder conceded last spring. Pearce can point to nine bills on illegal aliens that he has helped drive to passage in the State Legislature: to authorize major expenditures of state money on border enforcement, normally a federal responsibility; to deprive "undocumented" residents of social services; to ban Spanish as a language of communication by state agencies and officials; to define being in the state illegally as "trespass," a misdemeanor on the first offense and a felony on the second; to empower the local police to enforce immigration law. But nine times, the Democratic governor, Janet Napolitano, has turned him back with vetoes on crisply asserted fiscal and constitutional grounds, urging him and his Republican supporters to stop playing "political games."

"Shame, shame, shame on those who continue to ignore the No. 1 issue facing America," Pearce fumed last month when I visited his office at the State Capitol in Phoenix, which displayed not one but two portraits of John Wayne. The anathema he pronounced was intended not just for his governor but also for the Republican president and the Republican sponsor of the immigration-reform bill the president had backed; in Pearce's terms, "the treacherous, treasonous bill" the Senate passed in March. It was known as the McCain-Kennedy bill, McCain being, of course, Arizona's senior senator and, it is presumed, a leading contender for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination. And it contained two provisions Russell Pearce could not abide: a path to citizenship for longtime residents who, after entering illegally, held steady employment, learned English and paid their taxes (plus fines to be levied for entering the country without a visa); and an opening for hundreds of thousands of temporary "guest workers" to come across legally for limited periods of work.

Was he saying that John McCain himself was "treacherous, treasonous?" I asked, interrupting Pearce's discourse in midflow.

"Yes, I am," he replied, not pausing for breath as he raced on.

In Arizona, it becomes evident, the battle over illegal immigration is, in one of its dimensions, a battle over the future of the Republican Party in the state and, because of McCain's ambitions, nationally as well. It also becomes evident that what anti-immigrant zealots call an "invasion" is taking place not in spite of federal policies but, at least in Arizona, partly because of them. For 12 years the Border Patrol has deliberately funneled the immigrant flow away from settled urban areas like El Paso and San Diego (and, later, small Arizona border communities like Douglas and Nogales) into the Arizona deserts, where intruders can be more easily spotted, tracked and apprehended by its officers, using everything at their disposal, from high-tech sensors and drones to helicopters, jeeps, floodlights and horses. The number of arrests in Arizona alone has been running at more than half a million a year (slightly more than California, Texas and New Mexico combined for three years running). The number of arrests is larger than the number of individuals who get caught, since many are stopped two or three times. By the same token, it is almost certainly smaller than the number who eventually make it past the patrols — by a factor of two, three or four, depending on who's doing the extrapolating in order to score what point. The average number of arrests on Arizona's 376-mile border works out to more than 1,400 a day over the last two years. An Arizona politician running on the border crisis can therefore safely assert, since no one really knows, that 5,000 or 6,000 illegal aliens cross into the state every night.

What cannot be disputed is that year after year, hundreds die in the desert, usually from hyperthermia (267 by the official count in fiscal year 2005, and 199 for almost the same period in 2006). Among the people who make themselves heard on radio talk shows and in Internet postings, there are some who argue that the intruders get what is coming to them. "Break the law, pay the price. And another one bites the dust!" said a posting by a reader reacting to another report of a death in the desert. After crosses were displayed at a small pro-immigrant rally in Phoenix on Labor Day to commemorate the dead, a talk-show host named Bruce Jacobs, who speaks about little besides the "invasion" on his drive-time program on the Phoenix station KFYI, objected furiously to the display, in an accent that betrayed his own distant origins, in Ronkonkoma, on Long Island. "Whites didn't kill these people, America didn't kill these people," he said, his voice rising. "They killed themselves!" He meant that they'd be alive if they had stayed where they belonged, instead of giving in to the siren call of gainful employment in the globalized economy promoted by the United States.

So there's enough raw feeling out there and enough raw reality — or so you'd think — to make a state that has become the main thoroughfare for illegal border traffic responsive to the electoral line of House Republicans. While there were probably enough votes in the House last spring to enact some version of McCain-Kennedy had it been brought to the floor, that would have taken an ad hoc bipartisan coalition of Democrats and moderate Republicans — something the current House leadership forbids, allowing bills to come to a vote only when "a majority of the majority" supports them. The majority of the majority, responding to what's called its "base," wants to seal the border and deny permanent residence — which they say would amount to "amnesty" — to the uncounted millions of "illegals" already in the country; estimates run from 8 million to 11 million to more than 20 million (roughly half of whom happen not to have crossed the border on foot but simply overstayed visas).

Surely a red state that has supported a Democrat only once in the last 14 presidential elections might rally to such a program. But then how come Governor Napolitano, who's up for re-election next month, was so obviously unfazed by a showy visit by the House Republican leadership, including Speaker Dennis Hastert, to the border last summer and two hearings that were staged in her state as a way of whipping up support for the caucus's position? "If they don't know about the border by now, they don't want to know," she told me dismissively, spreading out her hands with the palms up and mugging a humorous look that said something like, "Who do they think they're kidding?" Then, realizing that my recording device could not capture her look, she filled in the blank with a sound culminating in a loud laugh. "Pshaw," she said. "That's how I'd describe it. Pshaw!" What was needed from Congress was a workable reform, she said, not more posturing.

A former U.S. attorney and state attorney general — described by her opponents as well as her supporters as "smart" and "tough" — Napolitano has been dealing with immigration issues for a dozen years. Political photo ops by newcomers to the border don't impress her. For all the Republican efforts to nail her on immigration, it will be a huge upset if she's beaten. Does she know something the majority of the majority in Washington has yet to figure out?

And how come, if the issue of illegal immigration is the House majority's ticket to remaining in power, its own creature, the National Republican Campaign Committee, was spending money in the Republican primary held last month to defeat one of Russell Pearce's most conspicuous allies, a down-the-line, seal-the-border, anti-immigrant crusader named Randy Graf, in the one House race in Arizona in which a seat was clearly up for grabs? A self-proclaimed Minuteman, running in the Eighth Congressional District — a border district in the southeastern corner of the state, the very one that gave rise to the volunteer militia known as the Minuteman Project — Graf was leading in polls of likely primary voters. Yet the smart money in both parties seemed to be betting that a Graf victory would guarantee that the seat, Republican for the last 22 years, would swing Democratic. So while national parties normally steer clear of local primaries — and virtually never intervene in the other party's — out-of-state Republican money was flowing in the Eighth to a moderate with a "common sense" approach to immigration issues not unlike John McCain's, while national Democratic money, in a peculiar twist, was paying for ads portraying that same moderate as a wimp on illegals, in hopes of putting the supposedly beatable Randy Graf over the top in the other party's primary.

In talking tough on the border and on illegal immigration, Republican candidates can be said to be running against themselves. After all, they control the White House, along with both chambers of Congress, which so far this year have produced two irreconcilable pieces of legislation and therefore a stalemate. The cleavage in the party is between those who want to systematize the country's widening dependence on foreign labor (the Senate version) — to try to take the "illegal" out of illegal immigration — and those who want to slam the door (the House version). Every 10 years or so Washington is seized with the issue of immigration, and eventually a complicated, contradictory law is produced, making matters worse. After supposed reforms in 1986 and 1996, it became conspicuously harder for migrants to come and go on a seasonal basis; therefore they stayed and, at great hardship and cost, brought their families. The systematizers talk about the needs of a global economy while more and more alien workers, depending on forged Social Security cards and driver's licenses, get paid off the books by subcontractors. Taking a more populist stand, Republican door-slammers call for a crackdown on employers who have become addicted to cheap labor, just as union leaders once did before union jobs were shipped abroad.

In a border state like Arizona, this history is not unknown; the promise of reform and the promise of enforcement are each viewed with a certain amount of skepticism. Besides, red states are seldom red all over; often they have patches of blue, especially around large cities and universities. Arizona's Eighth is decidedly purple. It takes in much of Tucson, which is liberal by Phoenix standards, and runs to the edge of the University of Arizona campus. Republicans have a registration edge, but nearly one-third of its voters call themselves independent. Many in older generations can remember voting for Morris Udall, a venerated liberal Democrat. Also worth mentioning may be the fact that its 9,000 square miles all belonged to Mexico until the 1853 Gadsden Purchase established the border where it now stands.

Since 1984, the district has been represented by Jim Kolbe, a friend of John McCain and like McCain a U.S. Navy Vietnam vet. Kolbe has been considered a leader on Capitol Hill in fights for the North Atlantic Free Trade Agreement and programs to combat AIDS in Africa. Ever since a gay publication threatened to out him 10 years ago, the congressman has lived with a label: "the only openly gay Republican in Congress." (For an example of the spread of knowledge in the information age, type those words into Google; you're instantly informed you have 958,000 "results.") Arizona's Eighth faithfully re-elected Kolbe thereafter and, having come out, he was quietly forthright on issues touching on sex and sexual orientation, identifying himself as pro-choice and a supporter of same-sex marriage. Kolbe seemed invulnerable, but in the 2004 Republican primary he got a bad scare from Randy Graf, who, running to his right on immigration and border issues, pulled in nearly 43 percent of the vote.

Last year Kolbe announced he was stepping down. When I visited his office on Capitol Hill in June, he insisted that he could have beaten Randy Graf by a wider margin in a rematch. Graf and the immigration issue, Kolbe told me, hadn't driven him from politics. ("I want to get out while people are still urging me to stay," he said. "I want to get out while I can walk out and not be carried out of here.") Kolbe had already endorsed one of Graf's primary opponents, Steve Huffman. He would never support Graf, he vowed. If, despite his best efforts, his old opponent took the nomination, Congressman Kolbe said, it was "an absolute certainty, guaranteed" that the seat would go Democratic. The Eighth could never be won, he said, by a "know-nothing party person — anti-immigrant, anti-abortion, anti-stem-cell-research, anti-gay-rights, anti-everything, right down the line."

Randy Graf is anti all those things, but his disposition is sunny and easygoing in a Midwestern way. He informs you pleasantly that he was born in St. Vincent's Hospital in Green Bay, Wisc., two months before Vince Lombardi became head coach of the Packers. Obviously he does not view this as a non sequitur. (Only 30 percent of Arizonans were born in the state, so it's not unusual for a politician to have been born somewhere else. John McCain, son of a naval officer, was born in the Panama Canal Zone; the state's other senator, Jon Kyl, a Republican, in Nebraska; Janet Napolitano, in New York City, then raised in Albuquerque.) Graf, who is now 47, moved to Green Valley south of Tucson to take up a post as a golf pro when Jim Kolbe was in his first term in Congress. Green Valley has a median age of 72.2 and a population, though it is only 40 miles from the border, that is 96.6 percent "white non-Hispanic," according to a Web site for retirees looking for a place to settle. Eventually Green Valley sent Graf to the State Legislature. Though many of his supporters were also from the Midwest, they were not inclined to think of themselves as migrants.

Graf's political mantra was standard for a Reagan Republican when he was elected to the state House of Representatives in Phoenix in 2000. He talked about lowering taxes, downsizing government, lowering taxes, protecting the rights of gun owners and lowering taxes. The year 2000 actually set the high-tide mark for the flow of illegal aliens in what the Border Patrol calls its Tucson sector — already by then its busiest — encompassing an area of 90,000 square miles along 262 miles of border and including all of Graf's legislative district: the Border Patrol detained 616,346 aliens that year in the sector. As Graf tells it, it wasn't the numbers or the growing presence of the Border Patrol giving chase on highways between Green Valley and the border that drove him to seize on the issue. It was an epiphany one evening in a supermarket. He found himself, so he says, in line behind a grandmother, mother and daughter from a single Hispanic family — the daughter, eight months pregnant — all making their purchases with food stamps and uncomprehending when the sales clerk addressed them in English. He had no way of being sure they were here illegally, but for Graf it became a vision of a connection between taxes and illegal immigration that needed to be elevated to a cause.

Sept. 11, 2001, added a whole other layer to this parable. "We live in a different day and age in the post-9/11 world," Graf now says. "Ninety-nine percent of them may be coming to support their families, but 1 percent of four million is still an awful lot of people."

The argument that the border must be secured because of the threat of terrorism remains largely theoretical. The Border Patrol keeps a count on non-Mexicans it detains (O.T.M.'s, they're called, for "Other Than Mexican"). Mostly they're from Central America and farther south, but a trickle can be traced to what the Department of Homeland Security classes as "special interest" countries (a euphemism that refers mostly to countries in the Muslim crescent from North Africa to Pakistan). In the Tucson sector, just 15 such persons had been picked up by Sept. 10 in the fiscal year that was about to end — scarcely one a month, a total that could easily be exceeded in an afternoon at a busy airport receiving flights from those same places. (In all its sectors, on the northern as well as southern borders, the Border Patrol detained a total of 418 aliens from the "special interest" countries in a period of nearly a year. The argument that the influx includes gang members and other criminal elements stands up better. The more difficult crossing the border becomes, the more opportunities there are for the human traffickers known as coyotes, who promise to steer those heading north to safe houses or cars driven by accomplices or relatives, at prices ranging as high as $2,000 a head. The Border Patrol keeps tallies of those it catches who prove to have criminal records, once its computers recognize their fingerprints. In the Tucson sector, about 440 a month are picked up with records of burglary, assault or narcotics charges. Coyotes, when they are caught, face charges of "alien smuggling" under the U.S. Criminal Code.)

Randy Graf's second epiphany was also not driven by numbers. It came at the start of 2004, when he heard a Republican president speak feelingly of immigrant families from Mexico who "bring to America the values of faith in God, love of family, hard work and self-reliance." Citing his own experience as a border governor, George W. Bush said that the border needed to be secured but also that a broken immigration system had to be made "more compassionate and more humane." Congress should "increase the annual number of green cards that can lead to citizenship," the president said. This was not what Graf wanted to hear from the leader of his party. He had a snapshot of himself and the president hanging in his office at the State Capitol; he turned the picture upside down and left it hanging that way for a couple of days as a symbol of his protest. And he decided to run for Congress, in opposition to what the president was calling a comprehensive reform.

Graf isn't interested in reforming the system; he wants stricter enforcement of laws on the books — "zero tolerance" for illegal migrants, those trying to cross the border and those already here. If that takes putting the National Guard on the border in a military role and giving the local police the authority and resources to enforce immigration law, he's all for it. In 2004, Graf, Russell Pearce and Randy Pullen, a Republican national committeeman, were the prime shapers of Proposition 200, an Arizona state ballot initiative designed to limit the spending of government funds on services for anyone in the country illegally. Governor Napolitano and every single member of the Arizona Congressional delegation opposed it, yet it passed with 56 percent of the vote.

An "honest debate" is needed about "changing demographics," Graf argues. The mass border crossings are not just illegal; in their scale, they suggest that the cultural identity of his adopted state could change. "You can almost say that Los Angeles has been transformed already," he says, clinching his point with an example he seems to think will cause a shudder. A half million immigrants demonstrated there last spring. The mayor, a Latino himself, supported them. Graf saw that as a warning for Arizona.

One pillar of Graf's support has been in the retirement communities around Green Valley, where few residents seemed to wonder who built their houses or mowed their golf courses. Another was in frontier Cochise County, where the U.S. Army subdued the Apache chief Geronimo, where the shootout at the O.K. Corral occurred, where the Wobblies battled the copper bosses — and where, after all that history had been turned into lore for tourists, ranchers who graze their cattle on large tracts of scrub land leased from the state became infuriated by the constant incursions of illegal aliens in large numbers. In their desperate passage, the intruders cause regular livestock losses by snipping fences, by littering the desert with plastic bottles and other debris that can play havoc with the delicate insides of a ruminant and by now and then partaking of a calf, despite the risk that even a small roasting fire might betray their whereabouts. The Graf campaign got under way in the county in 2004 at about the same time as the Minuteman Project; inevitably, they formed an alliance — the candidate, having declared himself a Minuteman, receiving the endorsement of the movement's leader, Chris Simcox.

I'd encountered Minutemen at the Hispanic rally at the Capitol in Phoenix on Labor Day, which failed dismally to attract a respectable fraction of the estimated 150,000 who turned out on Phoenix's streets in May waving banners and signs that said, somos america or we are america. This time the signs of the counterdemonstrators were almost as conspicuous. you are central americans, we are north americans, you are trespassers, so — vacate — leave, a Minuteman placard demanded. what part of illegal don't you understand? asked another. I hadn't gotten far trying to chat with the people planted under those signs, so I asked Randy Graf to introduce me to a Minuteman. To my surprise, he managed to match me up with one from my part of the country, a former consultant on new product lines who once worked in Manhattan and last lived near Princeton, N.J., before retiring in Sonoita, where he now tended several head of longhorn cattle as a hobby.

No other houses or human activities are visible in the view through the picture windows of Gene Cafarelli's spacious high-ceilinged stucco home, exquisitely sited on a piece of what was once a 2,000-acre ranch, now divided into two dozen parcels for high-end dwellings like his, none of which are supposed to be visible from any other. What you see is not obviously different from what a Spanish conquistador passing this way in the 16th century might have seen — a long view across a rolling valley, usually dun-colored but now, in September, turned green by the heaviest rainy season in years, to the Whetstone Mountains shimmering at a distance. But when Cafarelli goes out at night, he packs a gun, something he never thought to do in New Jersey.

Although he has had no direct encounters with migrants, he senses their presence. Some of his neighbors have had their homes broken into while they were away; necessities like food and clothing were seized, tradable luxuries like TV's and laptops left behind. Elderly neighbors have heard Spanish outside their windows at night; the serene landscape is actually teeming. Cafarelli imagines that he was often at close quarters with illegal immigrants when he commuted to New York, but he didn't recognize the look. Now he thinks he would. If there's a problem of racism, it's the racism of the Mexican ruling classes, he thinks, cynically pleased as they are to export their poor in return for dollar remittances in the billions that the laborers then send home.

The Minuteman Project was in part symbolic, he acknowledged, a way of calling attention to the failure of government to secure the border. The volunteers have no power of detention; they can only call the Border Patrol when they spot intruders through their night-vision binoculars. (In fact, other citizen patrols have been known over the years to detain migrants at gunpoint.) Now, despite his 68 years, the semiretired consultant — tall, white-haired, bronzed — is in training with a new search-and-rescue team the Minutemen are forming. Humane Borders, a Tucson church group, trucks fresh water to stations it has planted in the desert along heavily traveled routes. The Border Patrol sends out its own rescue teams to treat dehydrated, footsore aliens. Even the Minutemen, known widely as vigilantes, have their kinder, gentler side, it seems. The day before, Cafarelli was on two four-hour training missions in the bush, returning just before midnight. Each man carried two gallons of water, one for himself, the other for anyone they might encounter. As it happened, they encountered no one.

"I've always admired people who combine intellectual activity with action," Cafarelli told me. In his mind, the Minutemen are patriots deserving of the description.

In the minds of other Arizonans, the Minutemen and the broader anti-immigration movement put at risk major sectors of the economy, which have long depended on a supply of migrants. Cochise growers, for instance, are often on the other side of the issue from its ranchers. I spoke to an onion farmer who said he expects to plant 100 acres next year instead of 200 because he didn't think he'd be able to hire enough harvesters. "They yak about securing the border, yak about 'no amnesty,'" the farmer said. "We need to secure the border, but we've got to have a guest-worker program." A builder I spoke to couldn't say enough about the work ethic of the migrants employed on his projects, primarily roofing or putting up drywall. "God, do I love my boys," he said. "Mind you, I don't know whether my boys are legals or not." He would not be surprised, the man admitted, to learn that 25 percent of them had given him bogus Social Security numbers.

Randy Graf, the former golf pro, wasn't the only self-described Minuteman running. Early in the year another offered himself as a Republican candidate against Governor Napolitano, running essentially a one-issue, tough-guy campaign on Arizona's responsibility — whatever the feds did or failed to do — to control its own southern border. Were it not for the fact that he bore Arizona's most potent political name, Don Goldwater — a real estate investor and nephew of the late senator — would have been described as a political nonentity: his campaign résumé mentioned that he'd been a delegate to one national convention, volunteered in some campaigns and served as a den leader for the Cub Scouts. Some active Republicans said they had never heard of him. But running basically on shoe leather, the illegals and the name — "A name you know, a name you can trust," his brochures said — the candidate, who proved to be a tireless campaigner, overcame a lack of funds and built a lead over the summer in polls on the Republican primary race.

Goldwater's most original promise was his pledge to empower the local police to detain illegal aliens and corral them in an encampment on the border — a "temporary tent city," he called it — where they could be put to work building fences and clearing the desert of the refuse they and those like them had scattered when they came across. When a Spanish news agency reported that Goldwater wanted to build a "concentration camp" for illegals, he demanded and got a retraction, but not before a statement had been put out in Washington by Senator McCain denouncing any plan for a concentration camp on the Arizona border.

I chatted with Goldwater in September outside a movie theater in the northernmost shopping mall on Scottsdale Road, where the desert and Scottsdale's newest housing tracts bump against one another. The theater was previewing a documentary called "The Border War," and a large audience of anti-immigrant stalwarts had turned out. I'd looked for evidence that his uncle had crusaded on the question of immigration, I told the candidate, and hadn't found any. Barry Goldwater, he said, always felt strongly about the rule of law. How was he feeling these days, I asked, about Senator McCain? "He knows he won't control the state party when Don Goldwater is elected governor," the candidate said with calm certitude. "He's facing a revolt by the grass roots."

Randy Graf endorsed Goldwater. So did Russell Pearce, one of several more prominent Republicans who'd flirted with the idea of taking on Janet Napolitano. ("I'd love to get in the ring with her," he said.) Another was Maricopa County's popular, showboating sheriff, Joe Arpaio, a former station chief in Mexico for the Drug Enforcement Administration who seems to enjoy the attention he gets when he hints he might run for higher office but then never does. (It was Arpaio who put up Arizona's first tent city in Phoenix, to house the county jail's overflow behind razor wire, making the point that there would be no limit to jail capacity in his jurisdiction. It has since become a photo op for presidential candidates, including George Bush in 2000 and Mitt Romney, the governor of Massachusetts, this year. Pearce, once Maricopa's chief deputy, says it was all his idea.) Most obvious as a potential candidate was Representative J.D. Hayworth, a late but fervent convert to the cause of sealing the border, who finally decided, he says, that in a time of national crisis it was more important that he hang on to his seniority in the House, for Arizona's sake.

Each said he thought Napolitano could be beaten. Each had a reason not to take her on. That left the little-known Goldwater facing off in the Republican primary against Len Munsil, a "movement conservative for 20 years," by his own description, whose dogged campaigning on pro-life, pro-abstinence, anti-pornography, anti-same-sex-marriage issues had won him a solid base among evangelicals. For Munsil — an able candidate but far to the right by Arizona standards — illegal immigration seemed at first to be an afterthought. But just after Labor Day, with less than two weeks to go to the primary, he proclaimed it his highest priority. As governor, he pledged, he would station the National Guard on the border, spend state money to put sensors and fences where the federal authorities had yet to put them and establish a new Arizona Border Patrol to back up the U.S. Border Patrol, which already has 3,300 officers in the state and stands to have more than 5,000 by 2008 under President Bush's promised expansion of the federal force.

Janet Napolitano watched the escalating arms race between the two far-right Republican gubernatorial candidates with wry humor and maybe a hint of disdain, from her office on top of a stubby tower that is built into the Arizona Capitol. She wondered where her opponents would find the cash to back up their costly promises. Would they raise taxes or cut programs and if so, which ones, she asked, offering a preview of her own campaign. Her way had been to proclaim, in August 2005, a state of emergency on the border and demand that Washington station Guard troops there and pay for them. She wrote to Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and, after a month, heard from a deputy who said it was a matter for the Department of Homeland Security. Then she sent a legal brief in the form of a letter jointly addressed to Rumsfeld and the secretary of Homeland Security, Michael Chertoff. All she got back was an answering legal brief from deputies with more citations of laws and policies, bland assurances of how seriously they'd considered her plea, how earnestly they recognized the problem, how deeply they intended to deliberate on it and how little they could do. Then in May everything changed: the president announced in an Oval Office speech that he was sending the Guard to the border to take on some of the Border Patrol's auxiliary duties. The next day he flew to Yuma and posed for pictures on the border with Janet Napolitano. Arizona newspapers reported that he'd embraced her plan. Republicans who'd geared up to fight Napolitano on border issues were less than pleased. Their president had made it possible for this Democrat to claim that progress was being made. (In the same way, she's even likely to benefit from the recent announcement that the Department of Homeland Security will be paying Boeing $67 million over the next eight months to develop a system combining radar, ground sensors, cameras and unmanned aircraft that will first be tested in Arizona.)

In fact, the number of border intruders actually started to come down over the summer. This may have had more to do with the heavy monsoon rains than with the National Guard. Napolitano herself suspects that some Mexicans have yet to figure out that the Guard is on the border to build roads, repair fences and set up observation posts, not to shoot border crossers. "I know people need a sense that laws are being enforced," she told me. "They get nervous and frustrated when they think it's out of control. And Arizonans got to the point where they believed — I believed — it was out of control." Those, she figures, who want to seal the border and bar immigrants, period, rather than "manage the border" won't vote for her anyway. Those who want a system that's less cruel, less chaotic are ready, she says, to consider realistic approaches.

So when Republicans accuse her of talking a good game and doing little or nothing, she'll retort, she says, "When are you going to call on Washington, D.C., to do their part?" Her idea of a workable system is more expansive than the bill the Senate passed. Like President Bush, she would go beyond a temporary "guest worker" program to a system that would allow for more visas and green cards for Mexican workers seeking permanent residence. The numbers would have to be adjusted to changing economic circumstances. Most important, there would have to be real penalties for American employers who hired illegals. Many such employers contribute to political campaigns, which may be why, year after year, Congress has withheld financing from agencies charged with making the sanctions it long ago enacted stick.

Napolitano presents herself as a problem-solver, not an ideologue. ("I think that's just so anachronistic," she remarked when I noted the absence of liberal rhetoric in her pronouncements.) Her tone is brisk, managerial; the language she uses is markedly cooler than the appeals to tradition and compassion found in Bush's several addresses on the subject. But she is prepared to ask, in response to Russell Pearce's complaints about the high costs of educating the huge number of Spanish-language children in Arizona schools, "whether we want to take a failed national immigration policy out on a child in school."

"I'm the governor of this state," Napolitano continued, a suggestion of heat now in her voice. "I've got, let's assume, 160,000 kids in school who speak Spanish. They need to read and write and speak English if they're going to succeed in school. And they've got to succeed in school if they're going to succeed in life. To me, if you don't deal with these issues forthrightly, you're well on your way to creating a permanent underclass."

Arizonans, she says, are not easily sold on simplistic solutions to the border crisis involving little besides expenditure on law enforcement and technology. Earl de Berge, a Phoenix pollster, offered some survey results from May that seemed to show that a "comprehensive" reform had its own appeal in the state: 73 percent said it should be made possible for migrant workers to enter and leave the country without breaking the law.

It's often argued that work-seeking Mexicans drawn to the border should instead find the line at a consulate where they can apply for a visa, then wait their turn. What's missing from the discussion is the realization that there basically is no such line for the sort of semi-skilled border-crossers I repeatedly encountered on roadsides from Tucson on south, forlornly waiting to be processed and taken away by ICE (the unusually apposite acronym, for an agency called Immigration and Customs Enforcement, is pronounced as one word). On State Highway 86, a road heading west from Tucson, for instance, there were 15 who'd just been hauled from two old Chevy Cavaliers that had their backseats removed and blocks of wood jammed into the springs so that the back of the car would ride unnaturally high, not betraying the weight of the human cargo inside, covered by blankets. For the Border Patrol a high-riding old car, in which only two passengers are visible, can be as much of a tip-off as one that sags. These were young men who said they'd come all the way from Chiapas in southern Mexico to find work.

Here's the data on legal immigration from Mexico: In fiscal year 2005, according to U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, a division of the Department of Homeland Security, 157,992 Mexicans were admitted to the United States on immigration visas, less than half the number that were caught entering the Tucson sector illegally in that same period but still about 14 percent of all immigrants who legally entered the United States that year. Of the Mexican total, 45 percent were immediate family members of persons who had already qualified for legal residence; another 40 percent were more distant relatives of legal U.S. residents, most of whom had to wait 15 years or more to have their papers processed, paying regular fees to government agencies to keep them pending. The remaining 15 percent were people who either got in on special visas for highly qualified immigrants with technical training and skills deemed to be desirable, or were among the small number officially sponsored by a prospective employer.

The men from Chiapas lined up next to the ICE bus had no such connections. Typical of the thousands bused back across the border every day, they may have had relatives in the United States. But it's highly unlikely that these relatives would have been legal residents. Therefore, if the migrants were determined to take the jobs that were undoubtedly waiting for them in Phoenix and points north, east and west, on construction and landscaping crews or in hotels, slaughterhouses or poultry factories, then the trek across the desert, scary and expensive as it was bound to be, would have been their only obvious and realistic way in.

Russell Pearce sees them, these newcomers, when he drives through the district he represents, which happens also to be the district where he grew up. They shape up early each morning in the city of Mesa at the major intersections along Broadway, an area that was the heart of the original Mormon settlement here. Sometimes Minutemen demonstrators show up with their placards and noisily chase them into sidestreets, hoping to embarrass the crew bosses and ordinary householders who come by in their pickups to engage them for a day or a few hours. Many of the migrants, it is presumed, are in transition, hoping to put aside enough cash to finance the next stage of their journey, which will take them to California or Illinois, Nebraska or North Carolina.

But some settle in Mesa. This is evident from the latest figures published by the Census Bureau in its American Community Survey. In 2005, Mesa — now the nation's 40th biggest city — was found to be 24 percent Hispanic, up from 19.7 percent only five years earlier. Its overall growth was 10 percent, more than half that growth obviously Hispanic, enough to give the City Council district around the Mormon Temple a Hispanic majority. (This could be read as a fulfillment of a panel in the frieze that goes around the temple, a panel said to depict "the Hispanic people. . .leaving their old homes and coming to join the people of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.")

But there are still no Latinos on the Mesa City Council and no discernible increase in the number of Latino voters. Kyle Jones, a Mormon in his second term representing the district, said he would have considered stepping aside for a highly capable Latina candidate who ran against him in the last election if he had thought she had a chance of winning. She came in third, finishing with only 18 percent of the vote, behind not only Jones but a Minuteman running to Jones's right and drawing votes from that portion of the community that is permanently riled by their newer neighbors' tendency to hold big parties in front yards instead of on more seemly rear patios, and to play loud, unfamiliar music in an unfamiliar language. Mesa is farther from the border than Cochise County. But since it's sometimes a destination, not a thoroughfare, resentments accumulate just as surely.

The gap between the demography of his district and its voter profile strongly suggests to Pearce that the new residents are virtually all illegal. In his lexicon, that makes them "felons." Overall, 7 or 8 percent of the state's population may fall into the category of those who crossed the border without going through any legal channel, accounting for at least one-fourth and possibly one-third of its Hispanic residents. Russell Pearce acknowledges that children born in this country to these migrants are entitled to citizenship under the 14th Amendment, but he thinks something should be done about that.

When Pearce puts the tax burden on Arizona citizens resulting from unauthorized immigrations at well over $2 billion, he's rolling together the citizen and noncitizen Spanish speakers in public schools. What's often missed in the public debate is the fact that individual immigrant families often are neither strictly "legal" or "illegal" but an ambiguous blend. The father may have a green card, the mother not; the older children may not be naturalized, while the younger are deemed citizens by birth. In such households, there's an abiding fear of doing anything that might call attention to the dubious status of some of its members. So a child who has been an outstanding student may be discouraged by her family from applying to college if her Social Security number, or even that of a sibling, won't stand up to scrutiny.

I met one evening in September with five young women and their mothers, residents of a remarkably rundown trailer park in western Mesa that looked as if it hadn't been refurbished since the Korean War. Meaning to encourage candor, I said I didn't need to know their last names. Lucy, a high-school senior whose English was easy and idiomatic, completely unaccented, did much of the talking. She already understood, she said, that the local community college would be beyond her reach. Her father had spent thousands on lawyers without seeming to bring the noncitizens in the family closer to legal residence. The obstacles seemed insurmountable.

"I don't want people to think we're, like, invading," Lucy said. "We're just trying to make, like, a better life."

The Republican races got a little crazy in the last days before the primary on Sept 12. Len Munsil, the movement conservative battling for the nomination for governor on the strength of his stand on family-values issues, found himself accused, in a "push poll" of uncertain origins, of having fathered an illegitimate child. This crusader for abstinence before marriage then had to confess that he and his wife had yielded to temptation and conceived the first of their eight children a month before their wedding. In the race for Jim Kolbe's seat, the congressman's designated successor, Steve Huffman, was "unendorsed" by The Tucson Weekly, which had backed him, for refusing to talk about a bungled undercover mission by a campaign aide caught snapping pictures through a window of a home occupied by an opponent's former wife.

Before the results were in, two Arizonas were put on display in events held in separate hotel ballrooms. The first was a dinner honoring Congressman Kolbe, which brought 600 persons connected to Tucson's business, political and cultural elites together in the ballroom of a resort in the foothills of the Catalina Mountains. These were people who prided themselves in their ability to work across party lines. The Democratic governor was there to lead the celebration, which included videotaped tributes by Condoleezza Rice, Bono and John McCain on big screens and a cycle of love songs rendered by a soprano, winding up with "Our Love Is Here to Stay," which she sang sitting knee to knee with the honoree. Kolbe seemed swept away but managed a response in which he bemoaned the rise of extreme partisanship in Congress and the decline of the art of compromise. He then thanked supporters, friends and relatives, ending with his partner, a Panamanian national, who half-rose from his seat next to Janet Napolitano to receive a round of applause that did not sound perfunctory.

The mood was decidedly more righteous and embattled in the smaller, second ballroom in a south Tucson hotel, where fewer than 200 of Randy Graf's supporters gathered on primary night for what they hoped would be a victory party. Testing the ability of the party to come together, I asked one of Graf's supporters whether he'd be able to back Huffman if his man lost. "I'd vote for any derelict off the street before I voted for him," the man said. An hour later the crowd was shouting: "Randy! Randy! Randy!" as their candidate claimed victory.

But there wasn't much evidence in the results of a groundswell of fresh anger over border issues strong enough to determine the outcome of the races in November. Don Goldwater, the one-issue candidate Graf and Russell Pearce had backed, was easily beaten by Len Munsil, who waited till the last days of the campaign to broaden his base by running a TV ad in which John McCain, the nemesis of anti-migrant diehards, called him "a man we can trust."

Even Graf's victory raised questions about his prospects, for his percentage of the vote was no greater than what he drew two years earlier. If the result was to be read as a referendum on immigration reform, it was hard to miss the fact that the combined vote for two runner-up candidates who supported a new guest-worker program — the Kolbe position all these years — amounted to slightly more than 50 percent among Eighth District Republicans. A portion of those voters were now likely to be tempted to defect to the Democratic nominee, Gabrielle Giffords, a vivacious former state senator, just 36 years old, who lines up with McCain and Napolitano to support a "viable guest-worker program that meets the needs of Arizona's economy." Of course she's also for "improved border security," more Border Patrol agents, more technology in the form of radar, sensors and drones. Arizona, she says, has paid a heavy price for Republican failures on the border. Like the governor, she aims to show that the immigration issue underscores the need for change in Washington; in other words, that the abiding anxiety about the border and illegal aliens can be made to work for Democrats. It may come as a surprise to tacticians in the Republican House caucus, but no candidate in red-state Arizona or anywhere else is calling for less border security.

Having battled his way to the nomination on the issue, Randy Graf's best shot now is to portray Gabrielle Giffords as a coddler of illegals, "an extreme liberal" (as she is described in a negative TV ad put up by the Minutemen) who yearns to hand out Social Security benefits to illegal aliens. (The ad even shows a check made out to "Illegal Alien.") Anything can happen in a campaign, but the first poll showed Giffords, the Democrat, with a commanding lead. Of course it's also possible that the Republicans will make little headway on the immigration issue in Arizona, or beyond, but still retain control of the House. In that case, the "majority of the majority" would be likely to continue to bar any vote on a version of the reform that passed the Senate. They'd do so out of an instinct not to cede power to moderates in their own ranks.

Randy Graf seemed to define the breach in the Republican Party when I asked him whether he'd seek Senator McCain's support. "I look forward to talking to John McCain," he said. "It will give me a good opportunity to talk about immigration with him." McCain had meant to withhold his endorsement from Graf but reversed himself for the sake of a Republican majority in the House and his own relations with his party in his home state. His endorsement was silent on Graf's anti-immigrant stand. And in fact, the senator had no plans to meet the candidate.

Straining The Stork With 300 Millionth (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 15, 2006

The U.S. Census Bureau says it expects the nation's population to reach 300 million on Tuesday, 39 years after the 200 million mark was reached and 91 years after the county's population hit 100 million.

The 300 millionth person will enter a country that's much different than it was in 1967, when Life magazine designated the birth of Robert "Bobby" Ken Woo Jr. as a population milestone, naming him the nation's 200-millionth resident.

"In 1970, immigrants constituted less than 5 percent of the U.S. population," said William Frey, a demographer at the University of Michigan and the Brookings Institution, adding that today, they are 12.1 percent.

When the population reached 200 million on Nov. 20, 1967, there was no accurate tally of Hispanics in the United States. The first effort to count them came in the 1970 census, which found a total U.S. population of 203 million and 9.6 million Hispanics. There are about 43 million Hispanics in the country today, according to the Census Bureau.

The United States "was not a melting pot" when the 200-millionth American arrived, Mr. Frey said. "But we're now becoming a new melting pot."

Carl Haub, a senior demographer with the Population Reference Bureau (PRB), agreed.

The American melting pot disappeared after the 1920s and did not return until well after the government "liberalized its immigration laws in 1965 and stopped discriminating against those from areas other than Europe."

The Hart-Celler Act of 1965 did away with national-origin quotas, in which 70 percent of all immigrant slots were given to natives of just three countries -- the United Kingdom, Ireland and Germany, according to the Center for Immigration Studies (CIS), an organization that opposes unbridled immigration.

In fact, sharp increases in immigration started in the mid-1980s and have continued since.

"The 1990s had the biggest increases in numbers of immigrants" of any of the previous six decades, Mr. Frey said.

Although the Census Bureau says the newest population milestone will be reached at about 7:45 a.m. Tuesday, it is "not going to make an attempt to identify the 300-millionth person," spokesman Robert Bernstein said. The bureau also did not identify the 100- millionth American, who was born in 1915.

He said there is no way to know whether the 300-millionth person will be a baby born in this country, an immigrant who arrives here by plane or an illegal alien who surreptitiously crosses the border from Mexico.

The Census Bureau based its estimate of when the U.S. population will reach 300 million on the expectation that the nation will register one birth every seven seconds and one death every 13 seconds, while net international migration is expected to add one person every 31 seconds. The result is an increase in the total population of one person every 11 seconds.

The United States will join China and India as the third country to be home to at least 300 million people.

For weeks, Mr. Frey has predicted that the "300-millionth person will be a Hispanic male born to immigrant parents in Los Angeles County on October 17."

Mr. Frey bases his prediction on the fact that Hispanics are driving the population increase the nation is experiencing.

Why Los Angeles County?

"Half of the growth in the United States is Hispanic, and Hispanics have made their greatest gains in Los Angeles County, California," he said.

Both he and Mr. Haub predicted the child will be male because, worldwide, the proportion of male births to female births is 5 percent higher.

However, Mr. Haub said the PRB thinks the 300-millionth person is "most likely to be a white non-Hispanic male," since non-Hispanic whites still constitute nearly 70 percent of the total U.S. population. That proportion is down from 83 percent in 1967.

"The U.S. population is growing by 2.8 million yearly, and Hispanics account for 1.3 million of that growth. But there are 2.3 million births in the majority population annually, and only 900,000 births among Hispanics. So it's more likely the 300-millionth person will be a white non-Hispanic," he said.

But white non-Hispanic Americans will lose their majority by 2050, when they will make up one-half of the total population and minorities will account for the other half, Mr. Bernstein said. By that time, he said, Hispanics will account for about a quarter of the U.S. population.

Many were shocked in 1967 when Life magazine designated Mr. Woo, a fourth-generation Chinese-American, as the 200-millionth American.

The Census Bureau had predicted the 200-millionth American would arrive between 10:58 a.m. and 11:02 a.m. Nov. 20 of that year.

Life said it dispatched 23 teams of reporters and photographers to stake out hospitals in 22 cities to await the birth. Mr. Woo, now a Harvard-educated lawyer, was born at an Atlanta hospital at 11:03 a.m., so his birth came closest to the predicted time.

But Mr. Frey said he "never bought" Life's choice, arguing that it should have been a white suburban boy, given the demographics of the time. Census data indicate that whites constituted nearly 89 percent of the population in 1960, a total that included Hispanics. But supporters of Life's pick note that Mr. Woo did grow up in the suburbs.

As for the nation's new population landmark, Mr. Frey said, "More important than the numbers are how we got there, which was through immigration and increased fertility."

The United States is unusual among many developed countries in that it consistently has an excess of births over deaths. Immigration is also a contributing factor, because so many of the Hispanic women entering this country are of child-bearing age, and they tend to have more children than other women.

One-fifth of all children younger than 18 in this country are either foreign-born or in a family where at least one parent was foreign-born, according to a PRB report. Nearly half of all children younger than 5 are members of a racial or ethnic minority, and such children are much more likely to live in poverty. Black and Hispanic youngsters top the list, with a third of black children and 28 percent of Hispanics living below the poverty line, the report found.

Mr. Frey said he is grateful to see the increased immigration, because it is bringing both "younger and more diverse" populations to this country at a time when "our own population is growing older." By 2030, he said, "12 [percent] to 20 percent of the population will be seniors," 65 and older.

But not everyone thinks the 300 million population marker is a reason to celebrate.

"Americans are not pleased with the rate of population growth," said Roy Beck, executive director of NumbersUSA, a group that advocates lower immigration.

A national survey of 1,000 likely voters that his group conducted in September "reveals great discomfort about the rapid U.S. population growth being caused by federal immigration policies," according to a statement from NumbersUSA.

The poll showed that about two-thirds think increased population will "negatively impact the quality of life in America, such as causing more congestion, overcrowding and pollution," the group said.

The survey also showed that America's largest population groups -- whites, blacks and Hispanics -- are worried about the Census Bureau's forecast that the nation's population will grow by another 100 million by 2043.

According to the survey, Hispanics, by a ratio of 6-to-1, said their quality of life would be negatively affected if that happens in the next 50 years. The ratio was 9-to-1 for blacks and whites. Fewer than 12 percent of respondents said they thought the projected population growth would have a positive effect on their lives.

CIS spokesman John Keeley said none of that surprises him.

"Things are already pretty dire," he said. "Look at circumstances right here in the D.C. area: the horrible rush hours, the high cost of housing, the crowded conditions in schools and the increased job competition.

"Immigration, legal and increasingly illegal, have detrimental roles in this exploding population," Mr. Keeley said.

"Rapid population growth is creating a host of societal concerns; yet it is not even being acknowledged [by policy-makers] beyond this 300 million figure," he said.

The result, Mr. Keeley said, is a "population density so stultifying you can't move."

In its report, "The United States at 300 Million," the PRB warns: "If current poverty rates for minority children continue unabated in the future, then the health and well-being of substantial numbers of children may be compromised."

Mr. Keeley said it's already time to worry about the nation's staggering growth. "We need agriculture, but unchecked growth is putting stress on natural resources. This means we will increasingly confront an inability to provide food."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Air Force Memorial Dedicated (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, October 15, 2006

The only branch of the U.S. military that had been lacking a memorial in the D.C. area now has one to call its own.

President Bush, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and other dignitaries yesterday presided over the dedication of the U.S. Air Force Memorial -- a towering set of stainless-steel spires that pierce the skyline from a perch overlooking the Pentagon.

"Under these magnificent spires, we pay tribute to the men and women of the Air Force who stand ready to give all for their country," Mr. Bush told an audience of 1,400, including many blue-clad Air Force personnel.

DOJ_NMG_0081525

"And looking from this promontory to a place once filled with smoke and flames, we remember why we need them," said Mr. Bush, referring to the nearby Pentagon, which was hit by a hijacked airplane during the September 11 terrorist attacks.

The $30 million memorial sits on a prominent hilltop east of the Navy Annex and next to Arlington National Cemetery.

Initial plans called for a site near the Iwo Jima Memorial, which sparked a squabble between the Air Force and the Marines. The dispute ended when Congress, in the 2002 Defense Authorization bill, authorized the memorial to be built at its current site.

Designed by renowned architect James Ingo Freed, who died Dec. 15 at age 75, the memorial consists of three spires -- the tallest of which reaches 270 feet into the air -- that soar skyward to evoke the bomb-burst formation of the Air Force Thunderbirds precision-flying team.

An Air Force star is embedded in granite directly beneath the spires. The area surrounding the memorial includes two granite inscription walls, a bronze honor guard statue and a glass contemplation wall to honor fallen airmen.

"This memorial has been a labor of love," said H. Ross Perot Jr., chairman of the Air Force Memorial Foundation. "This memorial says to everybody who visits, ... 'This is the spirit that helped build our Air Force.' "

The ceremony also served as a lesson on the Air Force, complete with flights by planes that served throughout its history.

First came a Stearman PT-17 biplane, with a formation featuring an F-22A Raptor ending the procession.

Officials also recounted the names of heroic airmen since the inception of the Air Force, which began in 1907 as a division of the U.S. Army Signal Corps and achieved its status as a separate military branch in 1947.

From the heroic exploits of Lt. Col. Jimmy Doolittle's raiders in World War II to the missions of pilots in Operation Enduring Freedom, the efforts of airmen past, present and future were lauded.

"The Air Force Memorial is thus a magnificent tribute to each of the 54,000 men and women who preceded us into the heavens on wings of valor," said Gen. T. Michael Moseley, the Air Force's chief of staff.

The event also included a gravity-defying demonstration by the Thunderbirds, who soared above the memorial in a bomb-burst formation and left behind only tails of smoke.

"To all who have climbed sunward and chased the shouting wind, America stops to say: 'Your service and sacrifice will be remembered forever and honored in this place by the citizens of a free and grateful nation,' " Mr. Bush said.

After the ceremony, event organizers said an estimated 30,000 people were expected to attend an open house in the Pentagon's south parking lot, which included a concert by country singer Lee Ann Womack.

The Air Force Memorial will open to the public on Tuesday.

At Long Last, A Va. Air Force Memorial (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, October 15, 2006

President Bush helped the Air Force make a dream come true on Saturday, dedicating a hilltop monument for the service to the memory of airmen lost defending America and to those that fight for it still.

"A long blue line of heroes has defended freedom in the skies above," Bush said. "To all who have climbed sunward and chased the shouting wind, America stops to say your service and sacrifice will be remembered forever and honored in this place by the citizens of a free and grateful nation."

Bush spoke at the base of three soaring steel stalks, meant to evoke the famed Air Force Thunderbirds' "bomb-burst" maneuver, that glinted in the bright sun.

The dedication ceremony concluded with a dramatic demonstration of the real thing by members of the precision flying team. Their four jets flew straight upward in close formation and released silver contrails as they peeled away from each other. A fifth plane followed, flying through the middle of the vapors while spinning.

The $30 million United States Air Force Memorial, 15 years in the making, is set on a ridge next to Arlington National Cemetery and overlooking the Pentagon and the nation's capital beyond.

"Under these magnificent spires, we pay tribute to the men and women of the Air Force who stand ready to give all to their country," the president said. "And looking from this promontory to a place once filled with smoke and flames, we remember why we need them."

As the Air Force's history was recounted by a series of speakers, a succession of aircraft — from a replica of Orville Wright's historic biplane to an F-117A Nighthawk Stealth fighter — flew overhead.

The 17,000-ton metal spires that are the centerpiece of the memorial arc as high as 270 feet into the air.

"This memorial soars. It soars in space and in the imagination," Air Force Secretary Michael Wynne said. "These three spires echo our values: integrity, service and excellence. ... This memorial is a brilliant symbol of freedom and the spirit of flight."

Nearby are also two inscribed granite walls and an 8-foot bronze "honor guard" statue of four figures. A glass wall engraved with the "missing man" formation — a signature maneuver to honor those missing and fallen in the military — provides the only images of aircraft.

"This memorial says to everybody who visits, today and tomorrow, 'This is the spirit that helped build the Air Force. This is the sacrifice that helped defend our freedom. This is the courage that helped build our nation.' On behalf of a very grateful country, and a grateful people, it says, 'Thank you,'" said H. Ross Perot, Jr., chairman of the memorial's board of trustees and a former fighter pilot in the Air Force Reserve.

The memorial was the last major work of architect James Ingo Freed, who died in December. Among his other projects is the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington.

The Air Force was the only military branch without a monument around the capital. Efforts to change that, though, were stymied by controversy, lawsuits and congressional action until the current site and design went forward.

The memorial was first planned for a spot on the other side of Arlington National Cemetery, and Freed's design of a suspended five-pointed star won the competition in the mid-1990s. But the Marines disputed the location, saying it encroached on their cherished Iwo Jima Memorial nearby.

Lawsuits ensued and legislation was passed to prevent construction. Eventually, a new site was donated and the designing process had to start over. Freed won again with a design said to be inspired after the architect saw the Thunderbirds on television.

The design has been trumpeted for its modern appeal and its reflection of the Air Force's advanced technology.

Memorial Dedication Gives Air Force Vets Chance to Tell Their Side of the Action

They all came yesterday, the avionics guys, the swaggering pilots, the military brats in shirts featuring a photograph of their dad in Guam, and those who flew everywhere from the Russian coastline to the Persian Gulf.

Frank Veale Jr., 73, who joined the Air Force in 1950, arrived with an uncle on his mind, a captain in the old Army Air Corps who died after being captured in the Philippines. Just a few feet away, Walt McGinnis, 79, from San Antonio, and his son, Kevin, 46, talked in jest about how the elder McGinnis could have easily lost it over Korea.

"He got shot at a few times," said Kevin McGinnis, a retired Air Force lieutenant colonel.

"You're never scared," the elder McGinnis said, reflecting on the moment and looking at his son. "You're just busy."

Under a blue sky pierced by a triumvirate of curved spires soaring more than 200 feet in the air, thousands of veterans and family members armed with well-traveled war stories came to an Arlington promontory and a Pentagon parking lot for the dedication and official unveiling of the U.S. Air Force Memorial. For the Air Force, which had been the only military branch not to have its own Washington memorial, the dedication completed nearly 15 years of effort to build a monument in the capital region to more than 54,000 airmen killed in action.

The dedication ceremony, which included speeches by President Bush and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, came nearly 60 years after the Air Force's creation as a separate service. Up by the memorial, hundreds of VIPs joined current and retired Air Force brass underneath the dizzying monument. They milled about its wide base, read inscriptions on adjacent granite walls, heard from dignitaries and watched the U.S. Air Force Band and Honor Guard perform.

Down by the Pentagon's parking lot, where the jutting spires could be seen in the distance, other former airmen and their relatives toured military aircraft and visited information booths. Mostly, they ambled around, sharing old stories filled with talk of B-29s or C-141s and reminiscing about the mundane tasks they just happened to perform on historic days.

Seaton Phelps, 84, from Edenton, N.C., sat in the parking lot in a back row seat, facing the distant memorial. He was part of the Air Force's predecessor, the Army Air Corps. He served in England during World War II.

"I helped prepare the planes for the paratroops on D-Day," he said. "We didn't know what was going to happen. We just helped get the planes ready -- C-4 gliders and C-47s."

When asked what he thought of the memorial, he smiled. "I don't know how to express it," he said. "It's just nice."

Nearby, Frank Veale Jr., an aircraft radar specialist during the Korean War, said he came to the dedication to remember his uncle, an Army Air Corps captain who died as a prisoner of war. "He lived through the Death March, but then he died on a POW ship that sank," he said as he walked by a booth hawking Air Force pins and hats. "He was my favorite uncle."

Then, Veale told some stories of his own, with a brash wit and carefree attitude common among airmen. There was one about how he withstood ceaseless monsoons in Okinawa while living in flimsy tents. "But we had a Quonset hut where we went for chow," he said. "That was the one good thing about the Air Force -- good chow."

Lest he forget any close calls -- many airmen have them, and it doesn't take much to get these guys going -- Veale recalled a perilous trip from a military base in Florida to England.

"We were going over the Atlantic, and I happen to look out the window, and I see that one of the propellers had stopped," he said. "This guy yelled at me and said, 'The propeller's out.' And I said, 'Don't worry, we got three more.' But right as we landed, a second propeller had feathered out, on the same side. We would have been in the Atlantic had we not been landing."

At the ceremony, Ross Perot Jr., son of the former presidential candidate and chairman of the Air Force Memorial Foundation, told the audience, "This has been a labor of love." Indeed, the memorial once was designed as a five-pointed star to be located near the famed Iwo Jima statue, but the Marines protested the encroachment on their memorial, and the plan was thrown out. Perot, an Air Force veteran, said 140,000 people helped donate money to the $30 million memorial.

The veterans were not the only ones feeling proud. Spouses and children were there, all bound by a life that they inherited and a military perspective that they cultivated as their own. Maryruth Ormsbee and Anneliese Hollis, who traveled from Fort Worth with their husbands, Clyde and Kenneth, showed pride merely by saying what their spouses did. "My husband was in explosives ordnance," Ormsbee said of Clyde. "He put bombs on airplanes. Took them off. Blew them up."

"My husband was in radar and then in simulators," Hollis said.

"We really wish that more wives would be with their husbands. Not many of them travel with them anymore," Ormsbee said.

"I second that," Hollis said.

By the ceremony's end, Air Force Capt. Erica Rabe, 32, was standing beneath the spires, anticipating the famous "bomb burst" maneuver by five F-16 jets known as the Thunderbirds. "We don't have as much history as the other branches, but we have the same amount of courage, professionalism, dedication and patriotism, so it's about time," said Rabe, who added that her father was an Air Force pilot who recently died. "He would have loved to have seen this."

Just then, directly above the spires, four F-16s screamed across the sky, zoomed upward and curved outward, before a fifth jet rocketed straight through the middle, twisting in endless corkscrews.

The memorial officially opens to the public Tuesday.

One Proud Poppy ... But (NYDN)

By Thomas M. Defrank, Daily News Washington Bureau Chief

New York Daily News, October 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - At this month's christening of the nuclear aircraft carrier bearing his name, former President George H.W. Bush delivered a rousing endorsement of his son.

DOJ_NMG_0081528

"I am very proud of our President," the elder Bush said in rain-swept ceremonies in Newport News, Va. "I support him in every single way with every fiber in my body."

Yet many of his closest former aides beg to differ.

Indeed, one of the worst-kept secrets in Bush World is the dismay, in some cases disdain, harbored by many senior aides of the former President toward the administration of his son - 41 and 43, as many call them, political shorthand that refers to their numerical places in American presidential history.

For five years, the 41s have bit their collective tongues as, they complain, the 43s ignored their counsel. But as the war in Iraq has worsened and public support for the current administration has tanked, loyalists of the elder Bush have found it impossible to suppress their disillusionment - particularly their belief that many of 43's policies are a stick in the eye of his father.

"Forty-three has now repudiated everything 41 stands for, and still he won't say a word," a key member of the elder Bush alumni said. "Personally, I think he's dying inside."

To 41 loyalists, the bill of indictment is voluminous. Some alleged 43 has betrayed his father's middle-of-the-road philosophy by governing as a divider, not the uniter he promised in the 2000 campaign. Others, like former 41 speechwriter Curt Smith, argue 43 isn't conservative enough.

"Conservatives want limited government, a balanced Middle East approach, a foreign policy that builds, not destroys, and general, not special, interest," Smith said. "Bush 41 endorsed all of the above. Bush 43 supports none."

A common refrain of the 41s is that 43's muscular approach to foreign affairs - what one derided as "cowboy diplomacy" - has estranged the U.S. from its allies and diminished its authority around the globe.

The ultimate sticking point for the old guard is Iraq. They cite the appointment of 41's close friend and former secretary of state, James Baker, to chart a new Iraq policy as belated vindication.

The 41s remain incensed, however, that Brent Scowcroft, 41's national security adviser and once a top outside adviser to this administration, has been demonized since he wrote a 2002 article opposing an Iraq invasion.

"What Brent said is now the accepted wisdom," a senior 41 hand said, "and everyone believes 41 agrees with him, though he'll never say it."

While the 41s do most of the finger-pointing, aides to the current President reject the criticism as nitpicking from out-of-touch malcontents.

They also bash the 41s for going public, charging much of the damaging material in Bob Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," was provided by 41 partisans.

"Nobody has a monopoly on wisdom," a 43 staffer said, "especially those whose information may not be as good as when they were in power."

The family-feud fault lines were on dramatic display at the carrier christening festivities, where both camps turned out in full force.

"We're all on our best behavior," a top 43 official joked.

A few moments later, however, one of 41's most prominent counselors couldn't resist.

Trading social gossip at a reception, the ex-aide noted that former Secretary of State Colin Powell was in attendance. "He should be here," the adviser noted. "We didn't fire him" - a barbed reference to Powell's departure as 43's top diplomat after four years of bureaucratic fisticuffs with Vice President Cheney and Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, two frequent targets of the 41s.

"Everyone knew how Rumsfeld acts," another key 41 assistant said. "Everyone knew 43 didn't have an attention span. Everyone knew Condi [Rice] wouldn't be able to stand up to Cheney and Rumsfeld. We told them all of this, and we were told we don't know what we're doing."

Another top former 41 loyalist confided that several ex-colleagues remarked on a perceived "stature gap" between father and son as they sat on the dais.

The 41s concede their broadsides are awkward for their ex-boss, but say they're motivated by a desire to protect his legacy.

In fact, the 41s suggest a singular irony: the unpopularity of the son's administration may be rehabilitating the father's.

"By comparison, the old man looks better and better," a senior 41 hand said, with undisguised satisfaction.

States, Not Feds, Tending To Nation's Uninsured Children (LAT)

Ronald Brownstein Washington Outlook

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

It's inspiring, truly, that everyone in Washington is so concerned about the health and well-being of the 93 teenagers who serve as pages each year for the House and Senate.

But it would be nice if the nation's political leaders could spare a moment for another 8,310,000 young people who appear to have escaped their notice.

That, according to the Census Bureau, is the number of children younger than 18 in America who lack health insurance.

Until recently, children had been a bright spot in a dismal healthcare picture. Since President Bush took office, the total number of people in America without insurance has jumped from 39.8 million in 2000 to more than 46.5 million in 2005. The percentage of people receiving healthcare through their employer has dropped every year since 2000.

Children haven't been immune to that trend. The share of children receiving healthcare through their parents' employer has also been falling. But until last year, government had stepped in to offset those losses.

From 1998 through 2004, the number of children enrolled in Medicaid (a state-federal partnership for the poor) and the Children's Health Insurance Program (a state-federal partnership for children in working poor families) swelled by more than 5.6 million. That expanding public safety net steadily reduced the number of uninsured children, despite the continuing erosion of employment-based coverage.

In 2005, the latest year for which figures are available, that relatively benign picture darkened. Employment-based coverage for kids continued its decline. But with state budgets squeezed, the number of children receiving insurance from public programs also fell. These twin retrenchments produced a jump of nearly 400,000 in the number of uninsured children — the largest annual increase since 1995.

Most Americans would probably be surprised by the profile of the 8.3 million kids without insurance. Nearly nine in 10 live in families where at least one parent works, according to a recent study of census data by Families USA, a healthcare advocacy group. Nearly six in 10 live in two-parent families. Almost a third of uninsured kids live in families where both parents work.

Less surprising are the consequences of lacking insurance. Analyzing another government survey, the report found that children without insurance were much less likely than those who were covered to receive regular check-ups, and much more likely to have unmet medical needs. Children without coverage were three times more likely than insured kids to go an entire year without seeing a doctor.

These trends have provoked little discussion in Washington, where Bush and Congress have failed to agree on any serious steps to reverse the rise in healthcare costs and the decline in access. So the initiative is shifting to innovative states. "A lot of these efforts are born out of frustration with Washington," said Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA. "It's like, we can't continue to wait for Godot."

Illinois, under Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich, has launched a program that allows all parents to buy subsidized insurance for their children, with premiums set at a sliding scale based on income. As part of the universal coverage plan that Massachusetts' Republican Gov. Mitt Romney signed this year, the state will insure through Medicaid all children in families earning up to three times the poverty level (about $60,000 annually for a family of four).

Bill Richardson, the Democratic governor of New Mexico, this year pushed through a plan ensuring access to insurance for kids 5 years of age and younger and said that if reelected, he would extend coverage to adults (partly by requiring employers doing state business to provide insurance).

In November's election, the crucial healthcare battles are being fought over ballot initiatives in California and Missouri.

In both states, broad coalitions of public health advocates are pushing for tobacco tax increases to finance expanded coverage. The Missouri plan, known as Amendment 3, would raise tobacco taxes 80 cents a pack, mostly to cover more low-income kids and adults. The California proposal, Proposition 86, is more ambitious: It would raise taxes $2.60 a pack to provide access to insurance for the estimated 800,000 children in the state without it.

These efforts dramatize both the possibilities and the perils of expanding coverage at a state level. If the initiatives succeed, they could send "a signal nationally" that encourages other states and eventually Washington to act, notes Wendy Lazarus, founder of the Children's Partnership, a leading sponsor of the California proposition.

The problem is that, compared with Washington, states have more limited revenue sources to finance expanded coverage for kids. That has led advocates in Missouri and California to focus on tobacco taxes (which carry the added public health benefit of discouraging smoking).

But by targeting cigarettes, they have stirred a ferocious counterattack from the tobacco industry. The Missouri amendment is faring better in polls than its California counterpart, but neither is guaranteed to survive the barrage of advertising the tobacco industry is funding in each state.

From both a policy and a political perspective, it probably doesn't make long-term sense to rely so heavily on one industry — even one so culpable for compounding the burden of death and disease — to fund more healthcare coverage.

Guaranteeing insurance for all kids should be a national priority, with a national solution and a broad funding source. States are taking important steps, and could take more in November. But until Washington commits to the cause, America will continue to live with the shame of denying reliable healthcare to one in every nine of its children.

'Stakes' Rise For Bush, Even In Speech (HC)

By Julie Mason

Houston Chronicle, October 15, 2006

Tougher-talking president uses word 11 times during his latest news conference

WASHINGTON — With the Republican political message galloping out of his control in the final weeks of the congressional campaign, President Bush tried corralling it last week with a news conference in the Rose Garden.

The news conference didn't produce much news, but it did produce other noteworthy things.

Bush has been using a different speaking style lately, with more angry-sounding, often highly partisan rhetoric and stronger body language.

He grips the podium, jabs a finger and raises his voice. He squares his shoulders, mocking Democrats and scoffing at critics of his policies.

Bush, who relishes political combat, is in full-throttle campaign mode.

Key issues for Bush are North Korea and the Middle East, where the stakes, Bush said, "are really high." And numerous: Bush alluded to the "stakes" 11 times in just more than an hour in his Rose Garden news conference.

In fact, "the stakes couldn't be any higher," Bush said. "I understand the stakes. I'm going to repeat them one more time."

He added, "As a matter of fact, I'm going to spend a lot of time repeating the stakes."

The stakes are high for Bush in November. If he can't lead his party to another majority in the House and Senate, his domestic agenda may wind up as scraps of forgotten rhetoric. He could also face stronger and more effective resistance to his Iraq policy.

So far, his efforts to campaign on tax cuts and the war on terrorism largely have been eclipsed by other events — the Mark Foley scandal, intelligence leaks, a spate of critical books and North Korea's purported nuclear test.

With Bush trying to restore his political footing at the press conference, he said again, "The stakes are really high."

Rock star philanthropist Bono, in Chicago last week for an AIDS prevention event, noticed the president's airplane on the tarmac and scrambled into a little last-minute meeting with Air Force One's chief passenger.

Bono and Bush, politically at odds, have forged a strange friendship over the years. Bono has met with the president several times, asking for more money for Africa and help with other issues.

For his part, Bush seems amused — even when the Irish rocker turns up in the Oval Office somewhat dishevelled and wearing sunglasses.

It often draws Bush's ire when others, especially journalists, show up in similar states of dress.

Anyway, reporters awaiting takeoff on the big plane back to Washington were surprised to see Bush, Bono and model Christy Turlington strolling across the tarmac toward Air Force One together.

At the pivotal moment on the top of the stairs, Bono flashed a peace sign.

White House deputy spokeswoman Dana Perino said the three spent about 12 minutes in Bush's private office on board.

Their meeting was mostly social. Bono thanked Bush for keeping the focus on AIDS and Bush thanked Bono for thanking him.

Snow can campaign for GOP on the jobWhite House spokesman Tony Snow initially said he would use vacation days to campaign for Republican candidates in the Nov. 7 election.

He is the first White House spokesman to add fundraising to his regular duties. But the White House clarified its policy last week, saying Snow is permitted to raise money for Republican candidates while working at his taxpayer-funded job.

"Mr. Snow, like other commissioned officers in the White House, is construed to be on duty 24 hours a day, seven days a week, and therefore is not required to track vacation or leave time," a note to reporters said.

Snow's travel expenses for campaigns are paid by the Republican National Committee.

Short take•"One has a stronger hand when there's more people playing your same cards," Bush said last week, on multilateral diplomacy.

AP, October 15, 2006

The Secret Service on Saturday apprehended a man who climbed over the fence along the North Lawn of the White House.

Around 6:30 p.m. EDT, Alexis Janicki, 24, jumped the fence, said Secret Service spokeswoman Kim Bruce. He was immediately apprehended by the Secret Service uniformed division and taken into custody.

Janicki was charged with trespassing and possession of a controlled substance, which was cannabis, Bruce said. He was turned over to the District of Columbia's Metropolitan Police Department for processing.

President Bush was at the presidential retreat at Camp David in Maryland when the incident occurred.

OPEC To Meet To Discuss Cut In Oil Output (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

Oct. 14 — The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, which produces 40 percent of the world's oil, will hold an emergency meeting in Doha, Qatar, on Oct. 19 to discuss a 1 million barrel-a-day output cut, an OPEC delegate said.

The group will convene in Qatar to discuss a voluntary supply cut aimed at reviving oil prices that have fallen by a quarter in the last three months. Members will debate whether to cut actual production or to lower the cartel's 28 million barrel-a-day output quota.

The 10 members with quotas pumped 27.6 million barrels a day last month, according to Bloomberg data. Iraq is currently exempt from the quota system.

Crude oil for November delivery rose 71 cents, or 1.2 percent, to close at $58.57 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange on Friday. On Oct. 12, futures touched $57.22, the lowest since Dec. 19. The contract slipped 2 percent in the last week.

OPEC's next scheduled meeting was to be held on Dec. 14 in Abuja, Nigeria.

The 11 members of OPEC are Saudi Arabia, Iran, Venezuela, Iraq, the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait, Nigeria, Libya, Indonesia, Algeria and Qatar. More than half of the group's output is from the Persian Gulf.

Competitive Era Fails To Shrink Electric Bills (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston

A decade after competition was introduced in their industries, long-distance phone rates had fallen by half, air fares by more than a fourth and trucking rates by a fourth. But a decade after the federal government opened the business of generating electricity to competition, the market has produced no such decline.

Instead, more rate increase requests are pending now than ever before, said Jim Owen, a spokesman for the Edison Electric Institute, the association for the investor-owned utilities that provide about 60 percent of the nation's power. The investor-owned electric utility industry published a June report entitled "Why Are Electricity Prices Increasing?"

About 40 percent of all electricity customers — those in 23 states and the District of Columbia where new competition was approved — mostly paid modestly lower prices over the past decade. But those savings were primarily because states, which continue to have some rate-setting power, imposed cuts, freezes and caps at the behest of consumer groups that wanted to insulate customers from any initial price swings.

The last of those rate protections expire next year, and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and other federal agencies warn in a draft report to Congress that "customers may experience rate shock" as utilities seek to make up for revenue they did not collect during the period of artificially reduced prices and to cover higher costs of fuel. They warned that "this rate shock can create public pressure" to turn back from electricity prices set by the market to prices set by government regulators.

The disappointing results stem in good part from the fact that a genuinely competitive market for electricity production has not developed.

Concerned about rising prices, California and five other states have suspended or delayed transition to the competitive system.

And voters around two California cities, Sacramento and Davis, will decide next month whether to replace investor-owned utilities with municipal power in hopes of lowering rates. Drives are under way to expand public power in Massachusetts. In Portland, Ore., the city council tried and failed to buy the local utility company.

Electric customers in other states are facing rude surprises.

In Baltimore, an expected 72 percent rate increase in electricity prices has aroused so much protest that the state legislature met in special session, where it arranged to phase in the higher costs over several years. In Illinois, rates are about to rise as much as 55 percent.

The three New York area states opened their electricity markets to competition, with different results.

In Connecticut, residential electric rates rose up to 27 percent last year to an average of $128 a month, and are expected to go up as much as 50 percent more in January.

In New Jersey, rates rose up to 13 percent this year, and are poised to go much higher.

New York residential customers, by contrast, paid an inflation-adjusted average of 16 percent less in 2004 than in 1996, a state report said. It is not known how much of that is attributable to government-ordered rate cuts, but the state benefited from huge increases in power generated by its nuclear plants and by buying power from New England plants that, starting next year, may have less electricity to sell to New York.

The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and five other agencies, in the draft of the report to Congress, are unable to specify any overall savings. "It has been difficult," the report states, "to determine whether retail prices" in the states that opened to competition "are higher or lower than they otherwise would have been" under the old system.

Joseph T. Kelliher, the commission chairman, said Friday that eventually "market discipline will deliver the best prices" and noted that every administration and Congress since 1978 had pushed the industry toward competition. He added that the commission recognized a need for "constant reform of the rules."

Under the old system, regulated utilities generated electricity and distributed it to customers. Under the new system, many regulated utilities only deliver power, which they buy from competing producers whose prices are not regulated. For example, Consolidated Edison, which serves the New York City area, once produced almost all the power it delivered; now it must buy virtually all its electricity from companies that bought its power plants and from other independent generators.

The goal is for producers to compete to offer electricity at the lowest price, savings customers money.

Independent power producers, free-market economists and the Clinton Administration cheered in 1996 when the federal government allowed states to adopt the new system. The new rules "will benefit the industry and consumers to the tune of billions of dollars every year," Elizabeth A. Moler, then chairwoman of FERC, said at the time. She said the new rules would "accelerate competition and bring lower prices and more choices to energy customers."

But that has not happened. A truly competitive market has never developed, and, in most areas, the number of power producers is small. In New Jersey, for example, only six companies produce power, and not all of them sell to every utility.

Some utilities have decided to buy electricity not from the cheapest supplier but from one owned by a sister to the utility company, even if that electricity is more expensive. That has been the case in Ohio.

And if electricity is needed from more than one producer, utilities pay each one the highest price accepted in the bidding, not the lowest. This one-price system, adopted by the industry and approved by the federal government, is intended to encourage investment in new power plants, which are costlier than older ones.

But critics say that, as in California five years ago in a scandal that enveloped Enron, the auction system can be manipulated to drive up prices, with the increases passed on to customers. What is more, companies that produce electricity can withhold it or limit production even when demand is at its highest, lifting prices. This happened in California, and the federal commission has found that it occurred in a few more instances since then. Critics say that more subtle techniques to reduce the supply of power are common and that the commission shows little interest in investigating.

Bryan Lee, a FERC spokesman, said complaints of manipulation are investigated, but only last year did Congress give the commission the legal tools to punish manipulators.

Under the new system there have been some big winners — including Goldman Sachs and the Carlyle Group, the private equity firm — that figured out that there were huge profits to be made in one area of the new system.

Such investors have in some cases resold power plants they just bought, making a large profit. In other cases, investors have bought power plants from the utilities at what proved to be bargain prices, then sold the electricity back at much higher prices than it would have cost the utility to generate the electricity.

Richard Blumenthal, the Connecticut attorney general, said the supposedly competitive market has been "a complete failure and colossal waste of time and money."

He asked the federal commission to revoke competitive pricing in his state, but the commission dismissed the complaint last Wednesday, saying the state had not proved its case.

Advocates of moving to the new system say that, in time, the discipline of the competitive market will mean the best possible prices for customers. Alfred E. Kahn, the Cornell University economist who led the fight to deregulate airlines and who, as New York's chief utility regulator in the 1970's, nudged electric utilities toward the new system, said that he was not troubled by the uneven results so far.

"Change," Professor Kahn said, "is always messy."

But some advocates of introducing competition to the electric industry have soured on the idea. They include the Cato Institute, a leading promoter of libertarian thought that favors the least possible regulation and that concluded earlier this year that government and electric utilities have made such hash of the new system that the whole effort should be scrapped.

"We recommend total abandonment of restructuring," Cato said. If the public rejects a greater embrace of markets, Cato wrote, the next best choice would be a "return to an updated version of the old" system.

The conflicting results among the many studies of electric prices stand in contrast to the sharp, unambiguous drops in the prices of telephone calls, air travel and trucking.

One study by the utility economist Mark L. Fagan, a senior fellow at the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard and a consultant to various businesses who favors a competitive system, found that the new system often produces better results. He found that in 12 of 18 states that restructured, prices were lower for industrial customers than they would have been under the old system. But he also found that prices were somewhat lower than his model predicted in seven of 27 states that did not open to competition.

In Virginia, a state that did not move to the new system, a report last month by the agency that regulates utilities found "no discernible benefit" to customers in the 16 states that had gone the farthest and warned that electricity prices in those states "may actually be increasing faster than for customers in states that did not restructure."

And Professor Jay Apt, a former astronaut who runs the electricity study center at Carnegie-Mellon University, found that savings from introducing competition to sales of electricity to large industrial customers "are so small that they are not meaningful."

Regardless of the debate over the effectiveness of the new system, electricity prices are expected to rise in the next few years for several reasons apart from any rise in the price of coal, natural gas, oil, uranium and other fuels.

A study issued in June by the Edison Foundation, which represents investor-owned utilities concluded that utilities would have to raise rates to upgrade local distribution systems and to finance long-distance transmission lines, as well as for new power plants. The study found that utility profit margins had thinned and financial strength had weakened. It called for relief in the form of higher rates.

After Years Of Growth, What About Workers' Share? (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

JOB growth is starting to slow, and wages are barely keeping up with inflation. Five years into a relatively robust economic expansion, it's understandable that many American workers feel that they are not getting their fair share of the pie.

In fact, the share of the economy devoted to workers' wages and benefits has eroded in the United States over the last five years. But if it's any consolation, the trend for workers in other rich industrial nations isn't much better.

The portion of the economy going to the workers in wages and benefits is perhaps the broadest measure of the workers' share of economic growth. The numbers are based on how many workers are employed and how much they are paid for their toil.

In the United States, this economic slice, including wages, health insurance and pension benefits, declined 2.5 percentage points from 2000 to 2005, to 56.5 percent of gross domestic product, according to the United States Bureau of Economic Analysis.

Workers in some countries have lost even more. According to data from the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, the forum of industrialized countries, the workers' share of gross domestic product in Germany fell 3.1 percentage points over the last half-decade. In Japan, the decline was 3 points.

Over all, the workers' share of the economy fell in 4 of the Group of 7 industrialized nations.

The recent declines are hardly atypical. While there have been some periods when the workers' share has risen, the overall trend since the 1970's has been downward in most industrialized countries.

Economists have identified some important forces causing this erosion, but they are mostly perplexed by the long decline. "It's a bit of a mystery why the labor share is falling so much," said Alan B. Krueger, a professor of economics at Princeton.

Olivier Blanchard, a professor of economics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, added, "The complete, integrated story remains to be told."

For workers, perhaps the most important question is, how long will the slide continue?

Workers in the United States appeared to get a break for a few years in the second half of the 1990's, when robust growth bolstered employment and increased labor's bargaining power. Workers' share of the economy grew 2.3 percentage points from 1995 to 2000.

But that increase proved fleeting. While the uptick led some economists to expect a similar rebound in this decade, many are losing hope.

"The longer the recovery is delayed," Mr. Krueger said, "the less confident I am."

To begin with, consider changes in the composition of the American economy. In 1975, manufacturing accounted for 28 percent of output, while finance accounted for 18 percent, according to an analysis by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. By 1995, the relative importance of these sectors had flipped — with finance accounting for 27 percent and manufacturing for 22 percent.

This shift took a chunk out of the workers' share because banks and other financial companies use fewer workers than manufacturers to do what they do, and they don't pay their workers proportionally more.

And well-known forces continue to whittle away at the workers' share. Cheap imports from China and cheap call centers in India have increased the competition for jobs. New technologies have also replaced many middle-income workers. And immigration is on the rise in much of the industrial world.

Though economists do not fully understand how these forces are affecting labor markets, most seem to agree that, one way or another, they are eating into the workers' share of the pie.

In the United States, where labor unions have lost much of their bargaining power and few workplace regulations limit employers' decisions, companies have had an easier time reducing real wages. In the last year, wages have risen only enough to keep pace with inflation. In real terms, the wages of nonmanagement employees in the United States are now 10 percent below their level in the early 1970's, according to Labor Department statistics.

In Western Europe, collective bargaining has been more successful in keeping wages up. These differences affect the distribution of the workers' share. America's low-wage labor market is virtually nonexistent in the European Union. There is no Western European equivalent of the American earning $5.15 an hour, the federal minimum wage, on the overnight shift as a convenience store cashier. A $7-an-hour baby-sitter is nearly impossible to find in London. Over all, the wage distribution in Europe is much less polarized than it is in the United States.

BUT the institutional differences have done little to halt the slide in the share of the economy that is devoted to workers' compensation.

Mr. Blanchard suggested that the decline in the labor share in Europe might have been prompted in the 1970's by strong unions pushing up employee wages — which led companies to shed workers, eliminating many occupations entirely — the late-night cashier, for example — and replacing others with machines.

"The decline in the wage share is bound to level off," said David Grubb, a labor economist at the O.E.C.D. But the question is, when will it stop falling, and how?

If historical experience in the United States serves as any guide, workers' compensation could still fall a long way. It was a different world then, but it is worth noting that in 1929, workers had less than half of the economic pie.

An Iffy Road To Lower Rates (NYT)

By Conrad De Aenlle

JUST when it looked as though a Federal Reserve interest-rate cut might be on the way, the Fed sent a message to Wall Street: not so fast.

That, at least, was the way many traders interpreted the record, released last week, of the last meeting of the central bank's policy makers. It revealed that the policy makers continue to be concerned about inflation. That concern had been largely lifted in the minds of traders, but the Fed's statement is likely to revive it, especially this week, when reports are due on September wholesale and retail prices.

After steep falls in energy prices, a Bloomberg News poll of economists forecasts rare price declines — negative inflation figures — for both reports. No such softness is anticipated, however, in the more widely followed core numbers, which exclude food and energy items.

The Bloomberg poll predicts that core consumer prices, to be reported on Wednesday, will be up 0.2 percent, the same increase as in August. Producer prices, due on Tuesday, are expected to be up by the same figure, after a 0.4 percent decline in August.

Russ Koesterich, senior portfolio manager at Barclays Global Investors, warned that if the core numbers exceeded projections, the stock market might not take the news well.

"What the Fed has told us is they're data dependent," he said. "To the extent that we have outsized numbers, it's going to be significant. The market has written off the likelihood of further hikes. By talking about the possibility of cuts, they're putting the cart before the horse."

Investors' high hopes may have backed them into a corner, with the Dow Jones industrial average trading at record levels, he cautioned.

"The stock market is discounting a Goldilocks scenario: the economy will gently slow in '07 and the Fed can cut, but the slowdown will not be so severe that it will hurt earnings," Mr. Koesterich said. "It's possible, but it's very optimistic, and it's a priced-for-perfection environment."

Weighing the prospects for such a soft landing, he added, "you have to hope the market will get it, but it doesn't often turn out that way."

DATA WATCH On a busy economic calendar, readings on Tuesday for September industrial production and capacity utilization are expected to show little change.

The next day, data on September housing starts and building permits are forecast to show further declines in the housing market.

White House Upbeat About GOP Prospects (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

Self-Assurance of Bush, Rove and Others Is Not Shared by Many in the Party

Amid widespread panic in the Republican establishment about the coming midterm elections, there are two people whose confidence about GOP prospects strikes even their closest allies as almost inexplicably upbeat: President Bush and his top political adviser, Karl Rove.

Some Republicans on Capitol Hill are bracing for losses of 25 House seats or more. But party operatives say Rove is predicting that, at worst, Republicans will lose only 8 to 10 seats -- shy of the 15-seat threshold that would cede control to Democrats for the first time since the 1994 elections and probably hobble the balance of Bush's second term.

In the Senate, Rove and associates believe, a Democratic victory would require the opposition to "run the table," as one official put it, to pick up the necessary six seats -- a prospect the White House seems to regard as nearly inconceivable.

The Mark Foley page scandal and its fallout have many Republicans panicked, but Rove professes to be taking it in stride. "The data we are seeing from individual races and the national polls would tend to indicate that people can divorce Foley's personal action from the party," he said in a brief interview Thursday.

The official White House line of supreme self-assurance comes from the top down. Bush has publicly and privately banished any talk of losing the GOP majorities, in part to squelch any loss of nerve among his legions. Come January, he said last week, "We'll have a Republican speaker and a Republican leader of the Senate."

The question is whether this is a case of justified confidence -- based on Bush's and Rove's electoral record and knowledge of the money, technology and other assets at their command -- or of self-delusion. Even many Republicans suspect the latter. Three GOP strategists with close ties to the White House flatly predicted the loss of the House, though they would not do so on the record for fear of offending senior Bush aides.

At this point in the 2002 and 2004 election cycles, Bush was on the offensive, racing around the country and providing public lifts to many candidates. This year, by contrast, is mostly about defense. Bush lately has been stumping for vulnerable House Republicans who, only a few weeks ago, seemed safe for reelection. Meanwhile, Bush's own unpopularity has made House and Senate campaigns think twice about using him.

"You have to be careful where you take him," said an adviser to a GOP candidate in a close Senate race. In the past, this source said, the White House usually dictated where the president went. "They are probably more cooperative. They will go into the places and formats we suggest," he added.

To Rove and the small cadre of operatives who have been at his side throughout the administration -- including Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman and White House political director Sara Taylor -- confidence flows from a conviction that a political operation that has produced three consecutive national victories is capable of one more, despite voter disaffection with Iraq and GOP scandals in Washington.

Republican officials say the three closely coordinate strategy, with constant e-mails and a daily conference call. They see this familiarity -- in many respects it is the same team leading GOP strategy as in the past two elections -- as one advantage they have over Democrats, whose leaders on Capitol Hill and national party officials have been at odds on strategy.

So far, there have been few surprises in the Bush-Rove playbook, which seems little changed over the past four years. It includes tapping the powers of incumbency, mobilizing Christian conservatives and others in the GOP base, and seeking to polarize the electorate around national security and taxes. A huge effort to raise money by Bush, Vice President Cheney and first lady Laura Bush seems to be paying off: By Taylor's calculation, the various GOP campaigns and party committees will have a $55 million money advantage in the final three weeks of the campaign.

The RNC is also planning another big get-out-the-vote drive in the final three days before the elections. Rove believes that many of the polls in individual House and Senate races understate what he expects to be a GOP advantage in turnout, according to one party strategist who has heard him discuss the midterms.

Taylor, an Iowa native and protege of Mehlman's, said the administration recognized long ago that this would be a difficult campaign, coming in the sixth year of a presidency. "History suggests this will be a tough year for us," she said. "But at some point, the weight of our structural advantages makes up ground. And the message is really more important than all of that. When it comes to the war on terror, people have confidence in the policies that are keeping the country safe."

Polling suggests that may be changing -- the recent Washington Post-ABC News poll found that 53 percent of Americans disapprove of Bush's handling of terrorism, the lowest number he has ever received on what has been a signature strength. But in every campaign appearance, Bush continues to attack Democrats for being purportedly soft on national security.

The frustration for the White House is that, until two weeks ago, the Bush-Rove plan seemed to be having an impact. The White House used the anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks as an opportunity to redefine the Nov. 7 elections around the terrorism issue. A modest uptick in Bush's approval ratings followed, and GOP lawmakers began to feel better about their prospects.

But recent events combined to change the campaign conversation. These include the leak of a classified intelligence document suggesting that the Iraq war was complicating the fight against terrorism, a Bob Woodward book alleging administration deceptions about the war, and -- perhaps most critically -- the Foley scandal, which raised questions about whether the GOP tolerated the abuse of minors to protect one of its own.

Nonetheless, White House officials say the president plans to use the final weeks of the campaign to try to reshape the national agenda and to help as many candidates as he can, starting this week with fundraisers for Sen. George Allen (Va.) and Rep. Don Sherwood (Pa.), who is in trouble after admitting an extramarital affair.

"The president is going to be articulating the big issues and do so in a way that grabs people's attention," Rove said, although he quickly added that he believes many of the races will turn on local issues.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), who chairs the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, predicted that it will not work: "The bottom line is that people are tired of the president and his policies, and he has been unable to escape it."

He voiced skepticism that Bush is helping Republicans much, despite what he concedes is the president's fundraising prowess. "Most candidates don't want to show up in public with him, and those that do are embarrassed," Schumer said. "If Bush were popular, these races would not be close."

A key focus is Tennessee, central to GOP hopes of holding the Senate, where Republican Bob Corker is locked in an expectedly tight race with Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. (D). Bush has visited there twice, and Republicans anticipate another visit from Bush and the first lady. White House officials have also pushed Corker to go after Ford more aggressively.

Taylor, who with Rove helps determine Bush's political travel, said the president has helped raise money for some of the most endangered GOP House incumbents, such as Reps. Heather A. Wilson (N.M.) and E. Clay Shaw Jr. (Fla.). Some of Bush's focus more recently has been on helping GOP candidates who are in less intensely competitive districts, she said, citing recent presidential stops on behalf of California Reps. John T. Doolittle and Richard W. Pombo. "For Democrats to take back control of the House, they have to go to this outer ring," she said. "One of the things that's important now is to make sure this outer tier is solid and candidates have the resources they need."

Amy Walter, who tracks the House races for the Cook Political Report, views such stops differently. "It speaks to the fact that there are Republican districts that are now in serious jeopardy," she said.

Democrats Have Intensity, But G.O.P. Has Its Machine (NYT)

By Robin Toner

WASHINGTON, Oct. 14 — Clif Kelley, a retired economist from Columbus, Ohio, is the walking, talking, fuming embodiment of what pollsters say is a defining feature of this election: the intensity of Democrats.

Mr. Kelley and a handful of fellow Democrats in Franklin County's 21st Ward began meeting about two years ago, calling themselves Grassroots 21. Today they have a newsletter, a blog and on one recent Sunday a sprawling audience crammed into Mr. Kelley's suburban backyard for a rally on a semi-rainy day.

Mr. Kelley reminded his friends that he vowed two years ago he would not die under a Bush administration. "You can see I've been holding on," he said as the audience roared.

Mr. Kelley is 89. And angry. He says he simply "can't wait" for Election Day.

Voter intensity is a critical element in politics, especially in midterm elections, when Americans' interest and turnout are typically much lower than in a presidential election year. Pollsters say enthusiasm among Democrats is particularly high this year — significantly higher, by several important measures, than the intensity of Republicans.

Republican strategists counter that they can compensate for any gap in enthusiasm with their legendary get-out-the-vote operation. The party has built its electoral success in the last two elections on identifying and producing nearly every obtainable Republican vote at the polls; this time may be more challenging, they say, but no different.

"I do think our base is coming together and will be coming together later, but four weeks is an eternity in this business," said Representative Tom Cole, an Oklahoma Republican and longtime party strategist. Republicans will ultimately be motivated to vote, Mr. Cole said, and they will turn out on Election Day even if "this is a race where professionalism has to make up for enthusiasm."

Even so, in the latest New York Times/CBS News poll, conducted Oct. 5-8, 46 percent of Democrats said they were more enthusiastic about voting this year than in previous Congressional elections, compared with 33 percent of Republicans.

A similar trend appears in recent polls by the Pew Research Center and Gallup, which show that Democrats' level of engagement is higher than in the midterm elections of 2002, 1998 and especially 1994, when a Republican landslide gave the party control of the House and Senate.

Democratic strategists consider this new intensity a critical advantage throughout the ups and downs of a campaign narrative driven at various times by war, national security scares, gas prices and, most recently, the scandal surrounding former Representative Mark Foley, Republican of Florida.

"There's been a consistent pattern for the better part of a year that Democrats are pretty focused on what they're voting for and what they're voting against," said Geoffrey Garin, a Democratic pollster, "while Republican voters are feeling ambivalent on both fronts."

Voter intensity can bubble up from the grass roots, but it can also be stoked (or dampened) by the candidates' campaigns and harnessed by a sophisticated turnout campaign.

Conservative voters have many reasons to be less enthusiastic this year, analysts say, including their party's deficit spending and the scandal over Mr. Foley's conduct toward Congressional pages, not to mention an array of local Republican scandals in Ohio. But if the Republican get-out-the-vote drive, known as the 72-Hour Project, lives up to its billing, said Andrew Kohut, head of the Pew center, "the turnout consequences for the G.O.P. might not be as dire as these poll numbers suggest."

The Republican machine was on full display last weekend in Ohio, where volunteers worked phone banks in all 88 counties on what the party called Super Saturday. They contacted 100,000 carefully selected potential Republican voters and knocked on the doors of 50,000. When the day was done, Jason Mauk, the political director for the state party, said, "I think that really discredits the notion that Republican voters and volunteers are not energized."

At one of those phone banks, in downtown Columbus, the energy level was high, fueled by endless trays of doughnuts, bagels and pizza. Shift after shift of volunteers rotated through, with a steady murmur of voices reading a script, urging a vote, offering to arrange an absentee ballot: "This is a very important election year, and your vote will help determine Ohio's future."

One of the volunteers, Laurie Sutton, said: "I hit the phone banks every night. I'm addicted to it."

At midday, several of the top Republican candidates came by to rally the troops. Betty Montgomery, who is running for state attorney general, acknowledged the challenges facing Republicans this year but summoned the memory of the Ohio State football coach Woody Hayes. "We know how to win," she said. "We know the fundamentals. He would say, 'Execute the fundamentals!' "

Ms. Montgomery recalled the 2004 election, when Ohio delivered the presidency to Mr. Bush, largely on the basis of the Republican turnout operation. "We blew their socks off," she said of the Democrats. "They didn't know what hit them."

But Ohio Democratic leaders say they do know what hit them two years ago and vow that it will not happen again. "The Republicans talk about that 72-hour operation as if it's the best thing since electricity," said Chris Redfern, chairman of the Ohio Democratic Party. "The fact is, I believe we will be competitive."

Underscoring the rivalry, Ohio Democrats said they also completed 100,000 calls that Saturday. Around the country, though, some Democrats wonder whether their party can match the well-financed 72-Hour Project, created by the Republican National Committee; some of the outside groups who worked on voter turnout for the Democrats in 2004 have curtailed their efforts, although party campaign committees insist that they have stepped forward to fill the gap.

Ohio is a state where the partisan war has raged, with little interruption, since 2004. But polls suggest that around the nation, voters understand what is at stake in these midterm elections.

Two major factors drive the Democratic intensity, analysts say: anger about the war in Iraq and other Bush administration policies, and optimism about their chances this year.

"I feel like there's some hope to get more Democrats elected this time," said Virginia Crossett, 53, a Democrat and veterinary technician in Louisville, Ky., who was interviewed in a follow-up to the recent Times/CBS poll. Half of the Democrats who were more enthusiastic about voting said they felt that way because victory was in reach.

"I think most of the Republicans are doing a horrible job, and I don't feel like my life is any better whatsoever in the last six years — and probably worse," Ms. Crossett said.

The flip side to the Democrats' optimism, of course, is that the prospect of Democratic control is a powerful motivator for many Republicans.

"A lot of issues are important to me, major issues like the war on terror, what's going on in Iraq, North Korea and Iran, immigration and the Mexican border," said Rick Nunley, 40, a Republican from North Canton, Ohio, who works in industrial sales. "Those issues will be affected drastically in the not-too-distant future if there are major policy changes or shifts in the government."

Republicans say they will keep working to harness their vote. Holly Pendell, a veteran Republican volunteer who works for the United States Chamber of Commerce, was canvassing a suburban Columbus subdivision last Sunday with her "walk book" that identified which houses to visit. The advertising campaign started so early and became so intense that people "can't even make sense of the ads," Ms. Pendell said. "That's why door-to-door is so important."

Democrats say they will be doing the same, while also counting on the intensity of the Clif Kelleys of the country. When the Democrats lost the presidential race in Ohio two years ago, it was a painful defeat to many on the local level. But Grassroots 21 has made real progress in its neighborhood, Mr. Kelley said, and "it gave us confidence that we could so something."

"What really pushes us now is the issues," Mr. Kelley said. "We're mad. I'm mad."

The group, in fact, recently adopted a new logo: the Fighting 21st.

Dems Facing Proven GOP Turnout Machine (AP-Y)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 15, 2006

In the battle for control of Congress, Democrats hope enthusiasm trumps Republican efficiency.

Otherwise, they concede, they will have problems on Nov. 7 as a party still struggling to catch up with the GOP's ability to turn voters out of seeming thin air.

"Makes me green with envy," says Ellen Malcolm, the president of EMILY's List, which backs female candidates who support abortion rights. She was speaking of the Republican Party program that relies on reams of polling data, publicly available information and consumer choice records to identify likely GOP voters in even the most Democratic precincts.

Republicans most recently put their prowess on display in California, where they turned out enough conservatives in June to elect Brian Bilbray to the House, and a few months later in Rhode Island, where they motivated moderates and independents to vote for Sen. Lincoln Chafee in a primary.

Democrats hope technology is not the deciding factor in the upcoming election that will determine the majority party in the House and Senate. Democrats need to gain 15 seats in the House and six in the Senate to knock Republicans from power.

"They don't have some secret stash of voters," says Karin Johanson, executive director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

"If the Republicans are less enthused, the independents are breaking our way, and the Democratic base is highly enthused, then we're in very good shape," she said.

For now, at least, polls indicate Democrats have momentum on their side.

Likely voters say they have a low opinion of Congress and favor Democrats over Republicans to control the House and Senate. These voters also say they trust Democrats more than Republicans to handle the economy and the situation in Iraq, although it is unclear whether that sentiment will carry over to Election Day.

An Associated Press-Ipsos survey found 47 percent of Democrats are angry at the GOP-controlled Congress, while only 15 percent of Republicans are enthusiastic about their congressional leadership. An AP-Pew poll found that anger is driving Democrats to vote.

Getting people to vote is even more of a challenge in a midterm election year. Voting levels drop compared with presidential election years. In 2000, 59.5 percent of people in the U.S. age 18 or older voted. That fell to 46.1 percent in 2002, then climbed to 63.8 percent in 2004, a presidential election year.

As recently as the 1990s, the Democratic Party consistently won the turnout battle, relying on aggressive work by precinct captains and labor leaders in urban areas home to Democratic base voters.

Republicans started to retool their efforts after 2000 when Democratic presidential candidate Al Gore won the popular vote by 543,895 over George W. Bush. Bush won the electoral vote and the presidency, and his top strategist, Karl Rove, was determined to change how the party turned out voters.

"The Republican Party kind of stared death in the face and said if we don't figure out how to do better, we're going to lose," said Terry Nelson, the RNC's deputy chief of staff in 2002 and the Bush campaign's political director in 2004.

So, Republicans built a massive database of voters.

They compiled information about individuals that is available in public records and in consumer data that the GOP buys from vendors. Voter profiles contain everything from a person's age, address and voting frequency to their magazine subscriptions, preferred drinks and vehicles owned.

With an expansive voter file, Republicans then can use computer modeling to parse out individual voters in Democratic precincts whose consumer habits indicate they may lean toward the GOP. Republicans then can tailor messages to them based on their lifestyle habits and voting behaviors, and personally reach out to each of them to vote.

A final push comes just before an election, when volunteers with detailed voter lists make phone calls, knock on doors and send mail to encourage people to turn out — specifically those identified as most likely to side with Republicans but also most likely to stay home.

The system helped the GOP keep majorities in Congress and the White House in 2002 and 2004.

"The Republicans have about a four-year head start on where the Democrats are now," said Michael McDonald, a Brookings Institution expert on voter turnout. "The good news for the Democrats: You can catch up pretty quickly."

Democrats have been scrambling to do just that. But progress in setting up a party-centered operation like the RNC's has been slow, leading to disputes within the party and prompting allied groups to set in motion their own turnout efforts.

In 2004, Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry drew 16 percent more votes than Gore had in 2000. Republicans did even better — Bush's votes increased by 23 percent.

Karen Finney, spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee, said chairman Howard Dean has invested $8 million in the party's voter file this year, committed $12 million to get-out-the-vote efforts and is using the same voter identification and turnout techniques as Republicans in six states.

"The Republicans were further ahead of us last cycle. They just had much better data and were able to do more sophisticated things with it," Finney said. But this year, she said, through the combined efforts of the DNC, the House and Senate committees and the party's allied groups "we will have the resources we need to get our voters out."

Absent a large-scale party-driven program, the House and Senate Democratic campaign committees set up their own voter identification and turnout initiatives using the same techniques Republicans rely upon.

Additionally, labor and progressive organizations started a turnout campaign similar to the GOP's. Coordinating the effort is America Votes, a nonprofit group that played a similar role in 2004.

This time, America Votes is supplying coalition members voter data compiled by a new firm founded by Harold Ickes, a former White House aide under President Clinton. The America Votes effort, estimated to cost $25 million, is targeting Michigan, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Minnesota, Colorado and Wisconsin.

Labor unions have pledged to spend $40 million on turnout operations, and MoveOn.org, the liberal group, says it has budgeted $12 million.

The RNC planned to spend $60 million this fall on both advertising and get-out-the-vote efforts to protect the GOP's narrow majorities.

Incumbency Is Clear Winner In House Midterms (WT)

By Donald Lambro, The Washington Times

The overwhelming majority of House incumbents have little if any serious opposition in November's midterm elections, whose outcome likely will be decided by 30 to 40 tossup races out of a total of 435 contests.

That is the inherent contradiction in an election portrayed as a titanic battle of fed-up voters unhappy with members of Congress when, in fact, a majority approve of their representatives' performance in office and are expected to return most incumbents to Washington, many by large majorities.

"This happens to be a year when more competitive House seats are in play, but it's still a small universe," said Norman Ornstein, a political analyst at the American Enterprise Institute. "The vast majority of members, no matter how strong the wind is blowing, no matter how much the public wants change, they are immune from it."

While voter approval of Congress has plunged to 32 percent in the wake of the lobbying and congressional-page scandals, a Washington Post-ABC News poll of voters last week found that at least 60 percent liked and supported their representatives.

"The old adage that voters hate Congress but love their congressman continues to ring true. Incumbents are hard to beat," said Jonathan Collegio, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

The number of noncompetitive House elections range from 354 to nearly 400, according to various analysts who have surveyed the individual campaigns.

"There are probably around 380 out of 435 seats that are simply not competitive at all," Mr. Ornstein said. "You still have about 30 or so that are in the pure tossup category and close to another 30 that are leaning one way or the other."

A comprehensive survey of House seats by Congressional Quarterly's CQPolitics.com said there was a "total of 354 seats (or 81 percent of the House)" safe for the incumbent party.

CQ also found that 55 House members had no major-party opponent, though most had third-party, independent or write-in opposition who were not considered a threat to their re-election. Of these 55 lawmakers, 45 were Democrats and 10 were Republicans -- "an indication that the Democrats sought to field as many candidates as possible in an election year in which the national political environment favors them," said CQPolitics.com senior writer Gregory L. Girouix, who conducted the 50-state survey.

Elections analyst Stuart Rothenberg said 59 House seats are "in play," including 51 Republican seats and 8 Democratic seats. Twenty-six of these seats, all held by Republicans, are considered "tossups," while another nine Republican seats are either favored to go Democratic or leaning in that direction.

The Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats to take majority control of the House, which they lost in 1994. That was the year when Republicans, without losing any of their own races, won a net gain of 18 seats in open contests and defeated 34 Democratic incumbents for a total 52-seat gain.

The predominant reason most representatives remain safe is redistricting, the redrawing of congressional lines every 10 years to maintain proportional representation in each district. Redistricting has become a high-tech, computer-designed art, in which the majority party in the state legislatures, armed with the latest census tracts, can move enough voters into districts to protect their lawmakers from serious challenge.

"The dynamics of redistricting still works to create safe districts in most cases," Mr. Ornstein said.

Washington Drags At Lawmakers' Campaigns (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

Deficits, the Iraq war and the Foley scandal hurt House members seeking higher office.

LAS VEGAS — For 10 years, Jim Gibbons has represented a big chunk of Nevada in Congress, enjoying the advantages of incumbency as he coasted to one easy reelection after another.

But as he tries to move up to statewide office this fall, Gibbons isn't promoting all those years spent in Washington. Instead, the Republican lawmaker has focused on attacking his Democratic opponent as a tax-raising liberal and talking up his knowledge of Nevada "corner to corner."

Asked about Congress, Gibbons replied brusquely: "I'm running for governor." A few moments later, however, he acknowledged, "You'd have to be kidding yourself [to] think that some of these media stories about what's happening back there aren't being viewed and watched here."

Gibbons, a square-jawed former airline pilot, is one of 16 House members — nine of them Republican — who have tried to move on to either a governorship or the Senate in this year's midterm election. Most have struggled in a political climate that nonpartisan pollster Andrew Kohut described as "anti-incumbent, anti-Washington, anti-Republican."

In Minnesota, where GOP Rep. Mark Kennedy trails badly in his Senate bid, being linked to Congress is like being strapped "to one of those 15th century torture devices" that squeeze tighter and tighter, said University of Minnesota political scientist Lawrence Jacobs.

In Colorado, where Republican Rep. Bob Beauprez is trying to become governor, "the Washington burden" has all but killed his chances, said Floyd Ciruli, an independent polltaker in Denver.

Even here in Nevada, where Gibbons is ahead in polls, Republicans fret that the Mark Foley sex scandal and other frustrations with the GOP-run Congress could depress party turnout and cost them an open governor's seat in Carson City.

"It's the 'X' factor of 2006," said Phil Musser, executive director of the Republican Governors Assn., which recently launched a TV ad assailing Gibbons' Democratic opponent, state Sen. Dina Titus, to help shore up his support. "It's no secret," Musser added, "that it's not the best year to be a member of Congress running."

Of the 16 House members who have sought higher office this year, two were eliminated in primaries, including Nebraska's legendary ex-football coach Tom Osborne, who lost to Republican Gov. Dave Heineman in a major upset. Most of the rest are locked in close contests, or else trail far behind their noncongressional opponents. (Two House Democrats running for Senate and governor in Ohio seem to be immune, thanks to the state's fiercely anti-Republican mood).

It is not just the controversies enveloping the GOP-run Congress that have burdened those seeking a political change of address, though they certainly haven't helped. Along with Foley, the Florida Republican who abruptly quit when his explicit messages to teenage House pages were made public, three other GOP members of Congress have been forced to resign during the current session, including former Rancho Santa Fe Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who is serving a federal prison term for bribery.

In Iowa, gubernatorial hopeful Jim Nussle, an eight-term Republican congressman, has had to explain the record deficits run up during his years as chairman of the House Budget Committee. Facing a tough challenge from Democratic Secretary of State Chet Culver, Nussle doesn't talk much about Washington. Instead, he stresses his years as a county prosecutor before being elected to Congress in 1990.

In Wisconsin, Democratic Gov. James Doyle has called attention to the unpopular war in Iraq — unduly politicizing it, critics say — by flying state flags at half-staff for every Wisconsin soldier killed. He has lately pulled ahead of Republican Rep. Mark Green, who voted to support the invasion.

Democrats, too, are facing guilt by political association with Congress, which is suffering its worst approval ratings in more than a decade.

In Maryland, 10-term Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin has been blistered by his Republican rival, Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, for the 20 years he has spent on Capitol Hill. "What you just watched was the problem of Washington," Steele said in a recent debate. "They run their mouths, but they do not listen."

But the larger weight of woes is being borne by Republicans. There are more of them aspiring to higher office, and — as the party in power — the GOP represents the status quo, which is not a helpful thing in this restive election season. "If you're unhappy, [elevating] a member of Congress is probably not the change you have in mind," said Jennifer Duffy, a nonpartisan analyst with the Cook Political Report.

Even under better circumstances, moving up from the House is rarely easy, said Thad Beyle, a University of North Carolina expert on the nation's governors, who puts the typical election odds at no better than 50-50. That is because most members of Congress represent only a fraction of their state, requiring them — however long they have served on Capitol Hill — to essentially start campaigning from scratch.

Such is the case with Gibbons in Nevada, even though his district — more than 105,000 square miles, stretching from Reno to the edge of this famously sybaritic city — is one of the largest congressional districts in the country.

Las Vegas and Clark County make up roughly 65% of the state electorate and have their own Democratic representative in Congress. For Gibbons, who favors cowboy boots along with his monogrammed French cuffs, that means introducing himself to hundreds of thousands of new voters — not to mention the more than 5,000 new residents arriving here each month. There simply aren't enough hours in the day, he laments, to shake all those hands.

To win statewide, a Republican needs to minimize losses in the Democratic south, perform well in Reno and Washoe County in the north, and run up the vote in "the rurals," as the rest of Nevada's 17 counties are known. To that end, Gibbons has played on long-standing regional resentments, portraying legislator Titus as a Las Vegas politician with little regard for the rest of the state.

Titus has responded by trying to wrap Congress around Gibbons' neck. Her TV ads have assailed "Washington waste," and she attacks Gibbons as a failed lawmaker who has not delivered for the state despite his party's majority status. "He's forgotten about Nevada," she said in an interview.

Titus, who has served 18 years in Carson City, contrasted her record on healthcare, environmental issues and balancing budgets — a requirement under state law — with the red ink and toxic atmosphere on Capitol Hill. "You don't see that kind of partisanship in the Legislature," she said in a Georgia twang that some Nevadans consider a liability.

Gibbons, who served in the Legislature before going to Congress, scoffed at the comparison. "Being in Carson City is like playing slow-pitch softball with your best friends," he said. Working in Washington is like "playing shortstop in a hardball, fast-pitch game in the third game of the World Series."

Though serving in Congress may be nothing to brag about this election season, Gibbons said his ability to perform at both levels should count for something. "I think voters in the state of Nevada are quite smart and they will analyze their needs … and make a choice based on who they think is the best candidate for the job," Gibbons said.

Not, he suggested, on events 2,500 miles away.

Up or out

Sixteen House members have sought to move on to a governorship or the U.S. Senate in this year's midterm election.

Fourteen face voters in November:

• Rep. Bob Beauprez, R-Colo., running for governor
• Rep. Sherrod Brown, D-Ohio, running for U.S. Senate
• Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, D-Md., running for U.S. Senate
• Rep. Jim Davis, D-Fla., running for governor
• Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., D-Tenn., running for U.S. Senate
• Rep. Jim Gibbons, R-Nev., running for governor
• Rep. Mark Green, R-Wis., running for governor
• Rep. Katherine Harris, R-Fla., running for U.S. Senate
• Rep. Ernest Istook, R-Okla., running for governor
• Rep. Mark Kennedy, R-Minn., running for U.S. Senate
• Rep. Jim Nussle, R-Iowa, running for governor
• Rep. C.L. "Butch" Otter, R-Idaho, running for governor
• Rep. Bernard Sanders, I-Vt., running for U.S. Senate
• Rep. Ted Strickland, D-Ohio, running for governor

Two others were defeated in primaries:

• Rep. Ed Case, D-Hawaii, lost U.S. Senate primary
• Rep. Tom Osborne, R-Neb., lost gubernatorial primary

Candidates Taking Aim At Lobbyists (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum, Washington Post Staff Writer

The dirtiest word on the campaign trail this year is "lobbyist."

In close contests from Connecticut to California, Republicans and Democrats are attacking each other for getting too close to "special interests" and lobbyists. The accusation, a longtime election staple, is carrying greater heft than usual, election experts agree, thanks to the guilty plea of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff in January and the recent e-mail scandal of former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

"The lobbyist has become the prime caricature for having too much power in Washington," said Evan Tracey of TNS Media Intelligence/CMAG, a nonpartisan research firm that monitors political commercials. "Lobbyists and special interests are the biggest bogeymen of this election."

Candidates and independent organizations have run more than 300 political ads suggesting that the incumbents, the challengers or both have been co-opted by narrow interests or, worse, have actually lobbied. Many more such ads are planned in the tightest House and Senate races.

In one congressional district in eastern Florida, each candidate has tried to lay the taint of lobbying on the other. Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. (R) upbraided his Democratic rival, state Sen. Ron Klein, a lawyer, for working as a lobbyist at the local level -- a suggestion that Klein dismissed as "a personal attack." In response, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) bought ads accusing Shaw of championing special aid to drug companies in Medicare legislation.

Maryland's Senate contenders, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele (R) and Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D), have also traded insinuations in TV ads that the other is too sympathetic to "special interests."

Lobbyists have never been popular, and Democratic leaders have signaled for months that "corruption" would be central to their assault on the GOP. But as ethical misdeeds on Capitol Hill have multiplied, politicians of both parties are betting big that voters will reject candidates who appear to be too involved with professional favor-seekers.

"First there was Abramoff; now there's Foley," said Paul A. Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists, a lobbyist trade group in the capital. "Corruption has risen to play a major role in this election, and lobbyists are a target."

Allegations of lobbying are as likely to come from Republicans as from Democrats. In the rematch of Rep. Michael E. Sodrel (R-Ind.) and former representative Baron P. Hill (D), Sodrel disparaged Hill for joining a D.C.-based lobbying firm last year rather than returning home after his defeat for reelection. "It speaks volumes about him," said Cam Savage, Sodrel's campaign manager.

Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) has been attacked by her Republican opponent for sponsoring more than $11 million in earmarked appropriations for the clients of Ron Dotzauer, a former boyfriend, current campaign adviser and head of a lobbying firm.

"This is a year in which Congress has been rocked by scandal, much of it between members of Congress and lobbyists," said Elliott Bundy, spokesman for Mike McGavick, Cantwell's challenger. "We have discussed how her connections to this lobbyist have affected her official duties."

Democrats berate Republicans for their lobbyist connections with equal vigor. The DCCC put up ads in Arizona against Rep. J.D. Hayworth (R) that charged him with taking more than $4 million in contributions from "lobbyists and special interests." And in California, a group called Americans for Conservation went after Rep. Richard W. Pombo (R) for advocating the sale of public land "after mining lobbyists threw him a fundraiser."

The DCCC also paid for TV ads against Rep. Nancy L. Johnson (R-Conn.) that asked, "When Washington special interests wine and dine Nancy Johnson, what do you think they talk about?" The punch line: "It probably isn't you."

Tracey said dozens of similar ads are playing across the country. Portraying politicians as being in the thrall of unpopular interests, he said, "is an easy catch phrase that seems to work," especially in what is shaping up as a year in which many voters are dissatisfied with the federal government.

Millionaire candidates who are funding their own campaigns are particularly heavy users of the anti-lobbyist theme. Typical is Jim Pederson, the Democratic business executive running for Senate from Arizona. His slogan is "Nobody's Senator But Ours." In one of his commercials he proclaimed: "I'm even willing to finance much of my campaign with my own money to keep my independence from special interests."

Polls suggest that expressing such disdain could be a winning tactic. The latest USA Today-Gallup survey showed that no other issue topped "corruption in government" as Election Day nears: 86 percent of those asked said that corruption will be either important or very important to their decision at the ballot box -- the same percentage that named the Iraq war as important to them.

Democrats have a clear advantage on the issue, according to a Washington Post-ABC News poll this month. When respondents were asked which party they trusted to handle various issues, Democrats led Republicans on ethics by 19 points. The chief reason apparently is that most of the lobbyists and lawmakers caught misbehaving -- including Abramoff and Foley -- are Republicans.

But no one has welcomed an accusation of excessive coziness with lobbies and lobbyists; candidates invariably cry foul for fear of the political fallout. Cantwell's campaign has said the senator was helping her constituents with the controversial earmarks, not Dotzauer. Other lawmakers on the receiving end of such attacks also say the ads overlook the good intentions of their public service.

Lobbyists believe they have been wronged as well. The American League of Lobbyists sent letters and press statements to Republican and Democratic campaign committees complaining that the attacks against it are unfair, and also hypocritical because the parties are constantly leaning on the league for contributions. "If you think we're the biggest problem in the system, return our money," league president Miller said. He said no one has taken up his challenge.

Nonetheless, whenever lobbying becomes an issue in a race, both sides react quickly. In Missouri, Democratic Senate candidate Claire McCaskill aired an ad that inquired about Sen. James M. Talent (R): "What kind of a person takes $280,000 from oil companies, then gives them $14 billion" in legislated benefits? The National Republican Senatorial Committee shot back that the commercial distorted the senator's "record more than a fun-house mirror ever could."

In Minnesota, both candidates for a House seat have expressed queasiness about the lobbying that was done by a railroad to secure federal loans, including help it received from Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.). During the two years before his election to the Senate in 2004, Thune was paid $220,000 to lobby for the Dakota, Minnesota & Eastern Railroad. As a senator, he proudly championed the railroad's effort to expand a federal program so that it could be eligible for a record $2.3 billion loan to assist its expansion in Minnesota.

In the district that includes Rochester, Minn., Rep. Gil Gutknecht (R) said he is "troubled" by the process that led to the law's change and intends to negotiate the best deal he can for his constituents. His Democratic challenger, Tim Walz, said he wants the law rescinded and has made his opposition a focus of his campaign.

"Lobbyists are writing the legislation that's going through," he charged. "This is a breakdown of government in general, and the people are appalled."

An Ad Takes The Democrats' Campaign Straight To Bush (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

The September Fund, a new independent group founded by the Democratic operative Harold M. Ickes, produced this 30-second spot. It was first broadcast Thursday on CNN and will be shown in as many as a dozen competitive Congressional districts starting next week.

PRODUCER Jimmy Siegel

THE SCRIPT So what's our exit strategy from Iraq?

Why do our soldiers have to keep dying?

What about affordable health care?

Can't we support stem cell research?

Why did we let down Katrina victims?

Why won't Congress do anything?

Pass a decent minimum wage?

Why are we losing so many jobs to overseas?

(Narrator:)

O.K., it's kind of ridiculous to think you're ever going to get an answer from this (pause) bush.

But it's also kind of ridiculous to think you're going to get an answer (cue a picture of President Bush) from this one.

Text: Demand Answers. Vote for Change.

ON THE SCREEN A succession of Americans are standing in a park posing the questions to a shrub. The handheld camera moves in and out to show the people and the plant. The bush, of course, does not respond to their questions, and they walk away in disgust. The photograph of Mr. Bush makes him seem befuddled.

ACCURACY The advertisement makes no real challengeable claims of fact. It reflects the Democratic critique of the president's policies on Iraq and stem cell research and is critical of the administration's response to Hurricane Katrina. Congress has not acted on several major issues, including immigration and Social Security. The federal minimum wage has not risen in almost a decade.

SCORECARD This is the first advertisement from the group formed by Mr. Ickes, who has said he hopes to raise as much as $20 million to counteract the Republicans' significant financial edge in this election. Mr. Ickes has not said how much he has raised nor has he named his major donors. He has also not revealed what races he plans to single out. While Mr. Bush is not on the ballot anywhere, the September Group hopes to tie Republican candidates across the country to what Democrats claim are the failures of the Bush administration and the Republican-led Congress. The producer, Mr. Siegel, a well-regarded former Madison Avenue advertising executive, has also made commercials for Eliot Spitzer, the Democratic candidate for governor of New York.

A Gender Insurgency In Politics (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

Men have been making policy in Washington for as long as most of us can remember. But much of the political future rests in the hands of women.

In the narrowest terms, with Democrats needing 15 seats to capture a majority of the seats in the House of Representatives, there are 17 highly competitive districts with female candidates.

More broadly, much of the voter mobilization effort in both parties -- and their allied groups -- is aimed at women, especially those who normally vote in presidential years but skip the midterm elections.

That this election could result in placing a woman, Nancy Pelosi, in line to be speaker of the House for the first time in history only emphasizes the growing role of women in setting the political course.

Dennis Simon, a Southern Methodist University political scientist who has studied female candidates for Congress, has issued his statistics describing filings for 2006.

He reported last week that women made up 16 percent of the candidates running in this year's congressional primaries, an all-time high and the ninth consecutive election cycle in which that proportion has increased.

The total of 136 women nominated for House seats this year is only one fewer than the record set in 2004. And odds are good, Simon says, that the number of women elected will be higher this year than the 67 in the last Congress.

Of the 65 women seeking reelection -- 42 Democrats and 23 Republicans -- only six are regarded as vulnerable, all from the GOP side. Three of them -- Reps. Marilyn Musgrave of Colorado, Deborah Pryce of Ohio and Heather Wilson of New Mexico -- have female opponents, so the maximum loss of seats held by women would be three.

That contrasts with the 53 races in which women are challenging incumbents and the 18 open seats with female candidates.

One of the most heavily contested open seats, Minnesota's 6th District, has opposing female nominees, Republican Michele Bachmann and Democrat Patty Wetterling.

Overall, more Democratic women are in competitive races than Republican women. There are 39 Democratic challengers to incumbents, compared with 14 Republicans. In the open seats, 12 Democratic women and six Republican women are running. Simon credits the disparity largely to the work of groups such as Emily's List, which recruits and trains pro-abortion-rights Democratic women to run and raises money to support them.

Comparable efforts on the GOP side have been far less extensive or successful, Simon said. Martha Rainville in Vermont may be the Republicans' best hope to capture a seat. She is running for a seat left open when independent Bernard Sanders, who caucuses with the Democrats, decided to seek an open Senate seat.

Democrats have several other challengers in addition to the races already mentioned. Among the potential winners are Lois Murphy, running again after a narrow loss in 2004 in Pennsylvania; Tammy Duckworth, a wounded Iraq war veteran running for an open seat in Illinois; Diane Farrell in Connecticut; Gabrielle Giffords in Arizona; Darcy Burner in Washington; Kirsten Gillibrand in New York and Christine Jennings in Florida. Add Wetterling in Minnesota, Patricia Madrid in New Mexico and Mary Jo Kilroy in Ohio, and it is a formidable lineup of talent, boosting the Democrats' chances of gaining control of the House.

Backing these candidates is a grass-roots effort to draw more women to the polls. A number of groups, both left and right, are engaged in the campaigns. I bumped into one unusual program, sponsored by the AFL-CIO last week, called "Stirring the Pot." Small groups of women, half a dozen to two dozen, met on Tuesday evening for living-room conversations about health care, education and job security and to encourage each other to vote.

I talked to Monique Schmittou, one of 20 women who met for a potluck supper in Canton, Mich. A single mother who has a teenage daughter and cares for an elderly mother, Schmittou recently was laid off from an auto-parts company for which she had worked 10 years.

Now facing the loss of her health insurance, she joined others in discussing what she calls "a crisis" for many in her community. Before they broke up, they addressed about 250 cards to other Canton women, urging them to vote next month.

It may be that women like these will give the men in power a needed kick in the pants -- to get them moving on the real issues.

Voters' Allegiances, Ripe For The Picking (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

IN May 1980, the pollster Richard Wirthlin huddled with his presidential candidate, Ronald Reagan, to plot a course through what looked like a daunting landscape for their party. Just over half the country told pollsters that they were Democrats or leaned that way, compared with just 30 percent that said they were Republicans — a gap that had held steady more or less since the New Deal.

The rest is political history. By winning over millions of white working-class Democrats, Mr. Reagan cut that gap in half and ushered in 26 years of Republican dominance at the voting booth.

Now, on the eve of the midterm elections, surveys show mounting impatience with both the war in Iraq and Republican rule. Some political analysts — including Mr. Wirthlin — say they see a chance for a potential Democratic comeback, an opportunity for another historic realignment of the political parties.

"I would not be surprised," Mr. Wirthlin said, noting a small slip in the number of voters who say they lean Republican combined with an unusual spike in the number who reject both major parties.

In recent Harris Interactive polls, the number of respondents who refuse to acknowledge a preference for either party has risen to about 25 percent of the electorate from about 12 percent for most of the last decade.

Much of this increase in independents, he said, is probably accounted for by former Republican voters not quite willing to say they lean Democratic, but also unlikely to turn out this year.

"It is a red flag that Republican politicians need to watch," Mr. Wirthlin said. Although Republicans have long outperformed Democrats at turning out their voters, he added, "this year they may be raking water up a hill."

Dramatic shifts in political allegiance are clear only in retrospect and hard to foresee. The White House strategist Karl Rove long predicted that President George W. Bush would cement a Republican majority that could govern Washington for decades.

On the other side, Ruy Teixeira, a Democratic pollster, and John B. Judis, a liberal journalist, responded with their 2002 book, "The Emerging Democratic Majority," published just months before the Republicans defied history to enlarge their majorities in the midterm elections. There are reasons to consider a Democratic resurgence a long shot. No Democratic presidential candidate has won a clear majority of the national vote since Jimmy Carter in 1976, in the aftermath of Watergate. President Clinton won with pluralities, thanks in part to the third-party candidacy of H. Ross Perot in both elections. And in the first midterm of his presidency, in 1994, Democrats lost decisively in the battle for control of the House, which reflects national political trends more closely than the Senate.

Still, polls showing Democrats poised for big gains this fall in both chambers of Congress are reigniting the debate: Can Democrats crack apart the Reagan coalition of white blue-collar workers, evangelical Protestants, Southerners and chambers of commerce? Or will shifts in population toward the outer suburbs, the South and the West combine with the Democrats' secular, liberal Northeastern image to keep the party a minority in national elections for years to come?

At the heart of the debate is the war in Iraq, which pollsters on both sides agree is the biggest factor propelling Democratic hopes for the fall.

To many analysts, the backlash against the war is an inevitable and transient reaction that could fade when the Republicans pick a new standard-bearer in 2008. John Mark Hansen, a political scientist at the University of Chicago, said every conflict since the Mexican-American War has hurt the president's popularity and cost his party in midterm elections. Even in 1942, less than a year after Pearl Harbor, the Democrats lost 45 seats in the House and 9 in the Senate — during "the good war" and at the start of what turned out to be their party's ascendance.

Democrats, though, argue that Iraq may be singular. No other fight has been so closely associated with one party or its leader. None has been justified with arguments that crumbled as quickly as the suspicions of weapons of mass destruction or an Iraq-Qaeda tie. And the war's end, for now, remains far out of sight.

"Iraq has the potential to be to the Republican Party on national security what the Depression was to the Republican Party on economics," said Representative Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois Democrat who is chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

The Democrats' hope is that the war changes the reputations of the two parties in a way that may ultimately lead to remaking their constituencies as well, just as Roosevelt's New Deal formed a lasting bond with union members and urban immigrants. President Johnson's Great Society programs, on the other hand, eventually delivered the South to the Republicans by linking the Democrats to civil rights and liberalism — a gradual shift that reached a sudden tipping point with Mr. Reagan's election. By tarnishing the Republican image of greater competence in foreign affairs, Democrats say, the war could open new inroads for their party among the white working-class voters who have voted Republican since the Reagan days.

White voters without a college degree make up about half the electorate, according to the census. And Democrats have long contended that those voters should be the natural constituency for their party's brand of economic populism.

But the white working class has voted overwhelmingly for Republicans since Reagan. President Bush widened the Republican advantage among such voters from a margin of 17 percentage points in 2000 to 23 percentage points in 2004, according to exit poll data compiled by Mr. Teixeira, a senior fellow at the Century Foundation.

One reason for the Republican edge with those voters, many pollsters say, has been the party's reputation as the one that shares their values, especially those of traditionally religious Christians. But another major factor has been national security. By two to one, voters in 2004 trusted Mr. Bush over his Democratic opponent, Senator John Kerry, to handle terrorist threats. Now, that security edge has all but disappeared. Among white voters with no college education, approval of the president's handling of the war on terrorism had plummeted from a margin of 22 percentage points the summer of 2004 to just 7 percentage points last week, according to a New York Times/CBS News poll.

And the Republican advantage as the party that shares voters' "moral values" declined from 12 percentage points to only 5 points — within the poll's margin of error. (Several polls show that voters also now favor the Democrats to manage the war and the economy.)

"Iraq is the squandering of the national security premium the Republicans have been living on," Mr. Teixeira said. The Republicans' failure at "standing up" to foreign threats, he argued, had diminished their credibility on a whole cluster of "values" issues like "standing up for what is right" as well.

That, he contended, is vindicating his argument for a Democratic ascendance: if the Democrats can cut their margin of defeat among white workers, they can build a durable national majority from their coalition of professionals, women, African-Americans and the fast-growing Hispanic population. Although Mr. Bush's popularity with Hispanics at one time threatened to dislodge them from the Democratic bloc, the Republican moves this year to build a wall along the Mexican border has effectively pushed them back.

"That is fatal," Mr. Teixeira said.

Turning momentary popularity into a more lasting majority, of course, takes more than a midterm election. For one thing, voters typically develop a party preference based on the political atmosphere at the time they come of age and grow more attached to that party over the course of their lives. The voters who came of age in the 1930's, for example, have remained the most solidly Democratic. Fifty-seven percent are Democrats and only 38 percent are Republican, according to the American National Election Study.

Recent surveys and exit polls suggest that the Democrats have regained the upper hand among the young voters who entered the electorate over the last 15 years, and political scientists say dismay at the Iraq war is likely to prolong that trend.

"The longer Bush's approval ratings stay in the mid-30's, the more lost young Republicans there will be in the next generation," said Donald P. Green, a political scientist at Yale. But by the same rule, voters who came of age in the Reagan era are reliably Republican. Voters around the age of 36 are the only age group in which Republicans outnumber Democrats, according to 2006 surveys by the Pew Research Center. And it will be decades before they pass through the populace, "like an elephant through a boa constrictor," Professor Hansen said.

The true political consequence of the Iraq war also remains to be seen. American voters may hate wars, but they also favor candidates who take a muscular approach to foreign affairs, Professor Green said. Since the Vietnam-era peace movement, Democrats have had a reputation as peaceniks. It has cost them votes, especially among white working-class men and especially since the Reagan era. Unless Iraq leads to a new caution about military force, the war may not do much to change that.

"The usual card the Democrats would play would be 'get out of war,' " Professor Green said. "That just reinforces it."

Others argue that the travails of the Bush administration will be less transformative than the Democrats hope. "In the Depression, birth rates plunged way down," said Michael Barone, a political analyst. "They stopped having sex. They put their kids to bed hungry. In my opinion, the Iraq war is not that kind of event."

"If the Republicans suffer losses, it is a negative verdict on competence rather than ideology," he continued. "If you look at domestic issues, what are the Democrats talking about? The minimum wage is the first thing they mention, and it is a 1938 law."

Mr. Barone, who is associated with the theory of a lasting Republican majority, argued that essential elements remained unchanged. The party is strongest in the regions with the highest growth rates — the South and West — and it dominates 97 of the 100 fastest growing counties in the country, mostly booming "exurbs" on the outskirts of cities.

And whatever happens in Iraq, little has changed to the Democrats' reputation as the party of secular, elite liberals.

"Next to race, church attendance is the strongest correlation with voting," said Michael Dimock, associate director of the Pew Research Center. "America remains very religious. A lot of people tell us that someone who does not believe in God is not an acceptable candidate for president. Anything but that."

What's more, Democrats will need solutions to capitalize on their opportunity, said Professor Jack Pitney Jr. of Claremont McKenna College.

"Franklin Roosevelt had a clear answer, a very specific program, the New Deal," he said. "Do the Democrats have the same kind of clear answer to Iraq? It is damaging to Republicans, but it is hard to see how it is constructive to Democrats."

Still, Mr. Wirthlin, puzzling at Republican troubles even in a relatively prosperous economy, pointed to Sept. 11.

"Foreign policy took on a different and darker edge with the destruction of the twin towers," Mr. Wirthlin said. "My assumption is that was a mega-event that refocused people politically from 'myself and my neighbor and getting a job' to 'how are we doing in the world?' "

And at the moment that has meant an even greater focus on the war in Iraq, he said, turning what was once the Republicans greatest strength into a major liability.

Allen And Webb In Virtual Tie, Post Poll Says (WP)

By Robert Barnes And Michael D. Shear, Washington Post Staff Writers

Northern Virginia Voters' Views Differ From Rest of Commonwealth

Virginia Sen. George Allen (R) and Democratic challenger James Webb are virtually tied in a race that could shift the balance of power in Washington and which reinforces the differences between Northern Virginia and the rest of the commonwealth, according to a new Washington Post poll.

Allen gets 49 percent, compared with 47 percent for Webb, within the 3 percentage point margin of error for the poll conducted over three days last week. With few respondents saying they are undecided and most seemingly locked in for their candidate, the poll indicates that the candidates' strategies for turning out supporters will be vital and that changes in the national political climate could tilt the outcome.

President Bush's approval rating among Virginians who say they are likely to vote is about the same as it is nationally. But fewer people in the state say their feelings about Bush will influence their Senate vote, compared with the number in a national poll. And in a sign that the greater Democratic enthusiasm seen nationally is also evident in Virginia, the poll finds that fewer of those who say they are certain to vote Nov. 7 identify themselves as Republicans than a year ago.

The three issues that poll respondents cite most frequently as extremely important -- the situation in Iraq, the war on terrorism and ethics in government -- are all volatile subjects heading into the campaigns' final weeks. The poll shows that Allen has a sizable advantage among those who cite terrorism and that Webb is not doing as well as Democrats nationally in turning the Iraq war and Republican congressional scandals into issues that work for his side.

Northern Virginians are increasingly Democratic -- more distrustful of the war in Iraq and the president and more supportive of Webb than the rest of the state, according to the poll. The region is the economic engine of the commonwealth and the source of much of its growth, and on many issues, its urbanizing and diverse population seems to agree more with the rest of the nation and less with those who live south of the Rappahannock River.

No matter who wins, a race filled with drama and controversy has won unprecedented attention from the electorate. Fifty-two percent of likely voters in the survey say they are following the race "very" closely; the previous high in Post polling goes back to 1989, when 39 percent of Virginians showed high interest in L. Douglas Wilder's bid to become the first black candidate to be elected governor in any state.

Independent Gail Parker receives 2 percent of the support in the poll.

For Webb, the 60-year-old Democratic Party newcomer who launched his campaign eight months ago, the poll provides new evidence that his underfunded, long-shot bid has created one of the country's most competitive races.

"We are extremely encouraged by these numbers," said Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd. "We've always maintained that the more people learned about the real George Allen, the more they would feel he's wrong for Virginia. We will build upon this momentum, and we know we will win."

But the poll contains plenty of concern for the former Navy secretary and author from Falls Church. Webb owns a solid lead only in Northern Virginia, and his supporters, as a group, are far less enthusiastic about his candidacy than are Allen's voters. One of the selling points for his candidacy was that his military background and service in the Reagan administration would appeal to Republicans, but he does no better among the GOP in the Post poll than Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) did in the state in the 2004 presidential race.

Allen, 54, can be content that after what might be the most tumultuous campaign any incumbent has seen this election cycle, he still has a bond with Virginians who elected him governor in 1993 and senator in 2000. A strong majority of those in the poll say they think of him as honest, trustworthy and a leader, and 57 percent approve of how he's doing in the Senate.

"We've always known the race was going to be close," said Allen consultant Chris LaCivita. "After being subjected to one of the meanest campaigns of attempted character assassination in the commonwealth's history, we are confident that the people are going to vote on issues. When they vote on issues, Allen wins."

But there are serious doubts about Allen in the poll. The percentage of voters who say they don't like Allen has increased dramatically from a year ago, and 43 percent now say they have an unfavorable opinion of him. By a large margin, independent voters sided with Allen six years ago when he ousted Democratic Sen. Charles S. Robb; this year, he's essentially tied with Webb among that group. And nearly one in five polled say they feel Allen was being intentionally racist when he called an Indian American supporter of Webb "macaca." An additional 44 percent view the comment as racist but say they don't think Allen intended it that way.Dueling Controversies

Allen's remarks might have as much as anything to do with why the race is so close.

His macaca comment caused a national controversy -- the film clips a staple on Youtube.com and his changing explanations a gift to late-night comedians. It was followed by articles charging that as a University of Virginia student in the 1970s, Allen regularly used a racial epithet to describe blacks. Allen denies that.

And he stumbled when answering questions about his previously unacknowledged Jewish ancestry.

Allen responded by putting Webb on the defensive about a 1979 article Webb wrote condemning the idea of women in combat and at the Naval Academy. Webb apologized for the inflammatory language he had used, such as calling the overwhelmingly male dormitory at the academy a "horny woman's dream," but Allen has spent more than $1 million on ads spotlighting the issue because he said it shows a disrespect for women.

It is unclear from the poll how much those so-called character issues will affect the campaign -- 17 percent say Webb's comments are important to their vote, as opposed to 25 percent who say they feel the same way about Allen's remarks -- but they have given the race a nasty tone.

"I didn't like the way the race has sort of turned to all of these sort of negative things," said Vicki Merkel, 52, a teacher from Vienna who says she will vote for Allen. "Why do people say those things? And why are we digging way into the 1970s anyhow?"

She is among the 64 percent of those polled who say the campaign has been too negative, but voters are split almost evenly about who is to blame. Allen's supporters say the media have been tougher on their candidate, and overall, 36 percent of the respondents say the media have treated Allen unfairly, compared with 19 percent who say the same about Webb.A Plunge in Popularity

Allen was once one of the commonwealth's most popular politicians. But now Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) and the state's senior senator, John W. Warner (R), have much better favorability ratings, as does former governor Mark R. Warner (D).

Allen's favorable rating in Post polls of likely voters has plunged from 63 percent last fall to 53 percent today, and his unfavorable numbers have increased from 31 percent to 43 percent. Fifty-three percent of those polled have a favorable opinion of Webb; 37 percent have an unfavorable opinion And although Allen refuses to promise he would serve out his six-year term instead of trying for the presidency in 2008, the poll shows Virginians are opposed to the idea.

By a margin of 56 percent to 35 percent, poll respondents say they don't think Allen would make a good president, including 20 percent of those who say they will vote for his reelection.

But Allen's supporters appear loyal in other ways. Although Republicans nationally worry that their base might be turned off, 43 percent of Allen's voters say they are "very" enthusiastic about his Senate campaign, as opposed to 25 percent of Webb's.

"I just like the way he talks," said John Sullivan, 79, retired from the Navy and living in Loudoun County. "He's very forthright about things and conservative, which I am."

Apart from Northern Virginia, Allen is well thought of throughout the state, the poll shows, and voters say he's doing a good job. And on issues, he has several significant advantages.

Among those who say the U.S. campaign against terrorism is extremely important in their decision, two-thirds favor Allen. By contrast, voters who say the war in Iraq is extremely important split their votes evenly between Allen and Webb, who made his opposition to the war a cornerstone of his campaign. The same is true for those who cite "ethics in government" as a top concern.

Allen has a similar lead among those who consider taxes extremely important -- he has spent a considerable amount of money on advertisements saying that Webb would vote to roll back tax cuts -- and among those who say immigration is extremely important to their decision.

In addition, the poll shows that Allen does not suffer from the gender gap that has afflicted other Republican candidates in the past. In every Virginia election for the past decade, Democratic candidates for governor and Senate have held leads among women. But 49 percent of the women polled say they would vote for Allen, compared with 47 percent for Webb.

Webb is struggling with women more than previous Democrats have. In 2005, Kaine led among likely women voters by nine points in late polls, and former governor Warner had a double-digit lead among women going into Election Day.A Leap From Unknown

Perhaps the most positive news for Webb in the poll is the tightness of the race, considering that he was largely unknown even in late spring and that Allen spent about $9.5 million on his reelection, compared with Webb's $2 million.

On personal characteristics such as honesty, family values and leadership, Webb scores nearly as highly as Allen, who has been a fixture in Virginia politics for 25 years. More people say Webb would "stand up for issues important to African Americans" than would Allen, and more say Webb is "tolerant of the points of view of all Virginians."

Still, Webb supporters speak more of what he stands for than the man himself. Jeanette Wiltse, 64, a retired consultant from Arlington County, said she thinks Allen has done "all right" and she doesn't know very much about Webb. But she's voting for him.

"First thing is, he's a Democrat," Wiltse said. "I'm absolutely fed up with this administration. I think the war is a large part of it. I think Bush has basically trashed our foreign relations."

But according to the poll, Webb has not been able to persuade enough women like Wiltse to join his cause, even though only 39 percent of women say the war in Iraq was worth fighting.

On the plus side for Webb, he's also splitting the male vote, which traditionally has gone for Republican candidates. Webb has hoped his status as a decorated veteran would help with the large portion of the Virginia population that has served in the military. About 25 percent say Webb's background would make them more likely to vote for him.The Northern Va. Factor

Webb would win handily if the election took place only in Northern Virginia, claiming 56 percent of the vote there to Allen's 42 percent, the poll shows. But Allen would win easily in the rest of the state, besting Webb by almost 10 points.

"I would prefer to tilt the balance to the Democrats in the Senate and get the war over," said Elizabeth Barclay, 55, a Fairfax County lawyer.

And the differences are particularly striking among men: Webb's 18-point lead among males in Northern Virginia turns into a 12-point deficit in the rest of the state.

The views of Northern Virginians are similar to those of the rest of the nation this political year, according to the poll.

When it comes to the war in Iraq, Northern Virginians say it was not worth fighting by almost a two to one margin -- just as strongly as the rest of the nation. Commonwealth residents outside Northern Virginia are evenly split on whether the war should have been fought.

Klobuchar Still Leads Big Over Kennedy (MINNST)

By Kevin Diaz, Rob Hotakainen

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 15, 2006

Patricia Lopez, Kevin Diaz and Rob Hotakainen DFL Senate candidate Amy Klobuchar continues to hold a substantial lead over her GOP rival Mark Kennedy, according to the latest Minnesota Poll, and there are signs that national Republican leaders are now turning their focus to other Senate campaigns.

The poll shows Klobuchar with 55 percent to Kennedy's 34 percent, a margin that is nearly the same as it was in September.

Kennedy's campaign challenged the poll results, as it has with every Minnesota Poll on the Senate race.

"No one believes these numbers," said Heidi Frederickson, a Kennedy campaign spokeswoman. "This is a single-digit race. We know it, the Democrats know it and Minnesotans know it."

Klobuchar campaign manager Ben Goldfarb said the race will "ultimately be very close, but it's clear that Minnesotans are tired of Congressman Kennedy's outrageous negative attacks and continue to respond to Amy Klobuchar's positive vision for change."

The two candidates will debate today on NBC's "Meet the Press."

The poll, conducted from Oct. 6 to Wednesday with 818 likely voters, has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3.4 percentage points. A Rasmussen poll conducted earlier this month also showed a double-digit lead for Klobuchar.

The latest Minnesota Poll suggests that voter choices in the Senate race are turning mostly on national issues such as the Iraq war and President Bush's 61 percent job disapproval rating in the state, the highest he has had.

Those results appear to be hurting Kennedy, a three-term congressman representing Minnesota's Sixth District who has been politically close to Bush and supports the war.

The poll shows that 50 percent of independents and 62 percent of moderates favor Klobuchar, compared with 29 percent and 24 percent respectively for Kennedy.

"We see this nationally," said Steven Smith, a political scientist and congressional expert at Washington University in St. Louis. "Independents and moderates in particular are looking for a change."

Divided over strategy

As part of its attempt to maintain control of the Senate, the Republican National Committee (RNC) and the National Republican Senatorial Campaign (NRSC) have begun focusing most of their television advertising on close contests for Republican-held seats in Ohio, Tennessee and Missouri, according to the latest federal campaign spending reports.

DOJ_NMG_0081554

The strategy is angering some Minnesota Republicans, who say it's wrong for the party to abandon Kennedy, a candidate once regarded as the GOP's best bet to pick up a Senate seat.

"In reflects an incumbent- protection mentality," said Gary Miller, who runs a pro-Kennedy website called Kennedy vs. the Machine. "It's disappointing."

Others say they fear that a lack of interest in Minnesota by the national party could depress voter turnout and hurt Republican Gov. Tim Pawlenty and others involved in close races. But to many GOP leaders, it's a simply a matter of national strategy; resources are tied up in other states.

"What's going on is we've got a couple of pitched battles with incumbents that will decide whether the Senate changes hands," said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn. "It's not a reflection of this race."

The NRSC has yet to make a TV ad buy for Kennedy.

By comparison, Coleman said, the national party pumped more than $5 million into his 2002 Senate bid, when he squared off first with the late Sen. Paul Wellstone, and then Democratic legend Walter Mondale.

Kennedy campaign officials scoffed at any suggestion that the NRSC has abandoned their race.

"They're being very helpful," Frederickson said. "They're going to send in a bunch of people to do [last] 72-hour get-out-the vote efforts. We're in daily contact with them. ... The idea that they've abandoned us is utterly false."

State GOP leaders certainly have not given up on Kennedy. Coleman, for example, has given $100,000 from his own campaign fund to help get out the vote in Minnesota.

Party activists say that will be their focus in the remaining three weeks of the campaign. "My message to our folks is this is a winnable race, and to stay involved" Coleman said. "I'll continue to make that pitch to my colleagues in the NRSC."

On the attack

Kennedy's standing in polls has prompted him in recent weeks to go on the attack against Klobuchar with negative ads that, according to the Minnesota Poll, have hurt his standing with voters and made some of them more likely to vote for Klobuchar. Kennedy is now viewed negatively by 44 percent of voters, the poll shows, compared with Klobuchar's 25 percent negative rating.

Lifelong Republican Marvel Carstenbrock, 79, of Austin, Minn., said she plans to break ranks and vote for Klobuchar, although she also supports Pawlenty for governor. "I like that Amy Klobuchar," Carstenbrock said. "She's a good gal. She seems like she'll work hard." As for Kennedy, she said, "I am sick of that guy and his negative commercials. I wish he would just say what he wants to do."

The poll also shows that Klobuchar has a huge gender gap working in her favor -- 60 percent of women support here compared with 28 percent for Kennedy. She is running strongly in the metro area and outstate Minnesota. And on a list of a half-dozen indicators, Klobuchar is seen by more voters as a stronger leader and more independent thinker, with a well-defined agenda.

The poll numbers indicate that Kennedy is doing better than he had been in recent weeks locking up his conservative base, with strong support coming from voters such as Dwight Hicks, 53, a maintenance worker in Anoka County.

"I like the Republican Party's direction in general," Hicks said. "What's most important to me about Kennedy is that he's a Republican. I just agree with Republicans."

Still, that progress has been slow and Klobuchar is doing better among Democrats and liberals than Kennedy is doing with conservatives and Republicans. Klobuchar also is continuing to demonstrate significant crossover appeal, picking up a fifth of conservatives and nearly 1 in 10 Republicans.

Her support among high-wage earners also tops 50 percent even though she has pledged to roll back Bush tax cuts on those earning more than $300,000.

Tacit Silence On Stem Cell Research In Missouri Race (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

DOJ_NMG_0081555

KIRKSVILLE, Mo. — Over cocktails one recent Monday night at a Democratic fund-raiser in New York, Claire McCaskill, the Democratic Senate candidate in Missouri, played up her support for stem cell research.

But at a campaign appearance here in rural and largely conservative Kirksville, Ms. McCaskill never mentioned the subject.

Similarly, her Republican opponent, Senator Jim Talent, came out against a statewide ballot measure on stem cell research at the strong urging of conservative Christians. But when Mr. Talent recently addressed an electricians' trade group at a resort on the Lake of the Ozarks, he did not speak of his opposition.

Just a few months ago, the Missouri stem cell research initiative on the November ballot was a defining issue of the campaign, as both candidates tried to firm up support among the party faithful in one of the tightest Senate races in the country. But now, as Mr. Talent and Ms. McCaskill reach beyond their traditional bases, the emotionally charged ballot measure — which would allow the research and possibly provide state financing for it — is almost too hot to touch.

In a race that appears to be a dead heat, the result has been an odd sort of mutual quietness, where the opposing camps seem to agree that the less said on the stump about stem cell research, the better.

"I've urged everyone to make those decisions on their own," Mr. Talent said after the speech to the electricians, in Osage Beach, Mo., when asked about the ballot measure. "I've tried not to make it political."

Ms. McCaskill denied shying from the issue but acknowledged it was not part of her standard campaign speech.

"It's not that I'm ignoring it, but the stem cell issue usually comes up in the context of question and answer," she said after a debate in Clayton, Mo. "People are confused and want to talk about it."

The truth of the matter, campaign analysts say, is that Mr. Talent and Ms. McCaskill are battling over a tiny percentage of undecided voters and dare not risk offending them by drawing attention to such a polarizing issue.

The race here is one of six nationwide in which Democrats see the possibility of picking up a Republican seat to win control of the Senate; as such, there is little margin for error for either party. Even in a recent national television appearance on MSNBC, when the two candidates were asked about stem cell research, Mr. Talent and Ms. McCaskill were measured in their responses, and careful to use language that would not offend.

Robert Hunt Sprinkle, the editor in chief of Politics and the Life Sciences, a journal edited at the University of Maryland, has tracked how the stem cell research issue has figured in elections nationwide. Mr. Sprinkle said it was "quite sensible" that the two candidates in Missouri had backed away from "defending a view on a topic of arcane technological content" in a close campaign.

"This is a debate that is entered at one's peril in the campaign context, when a sound bite is removed for analysis," he said. "These are very treacherous waters."

The dynamic is markedly different in several other states, where Democratic candidates have made stem cell research a bigger part of their campaigns, in part because of evidence of broad public support for the research in those states and because of the wedge it sometimes drives between far-right and moderate Republicans.

In Wisconsin, the incumbent Democratic governor, James E. Doyle, has made his steady support of all permissible forms of stem cell research almost a daily mantra in his race against Representative Mark Green, a Republican who favors setting stricter limits.

In the Maryland race for the Senate, Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, a Republican, is running against Representative Benjamin L. Cardin, a Democrat who has tailored his message to two main themes: the war in Iraq and his support for stem cell research.

"Ben Cardin is doing what I expected Claire McCaskill to do, which is bring it up," said Trevor Parry-Giles, an associate professor of political communication at the University of Maryland. "It might be one of those issues that plays better on the coasts for Democrats, but Republicans face a tougher road on this one because they need moderate independent voters."

In Missouri, Mr. Talent has found himself tripping over the Republican divide.

Some more moderate Republicans, including Gov. Matt Blunt and John C. Danforth, the former United States senator, are backing the stem cell research referendum, while more conservative legislators, including Representative Todd Akin, are speaking out against it, particularly to Christian congregations.

At first, Mr. Talent chose to steer clear of the issue, hesitating to take a position on the ballot measure before relenting under pressure from Christian conservatives. The senator had already angered many conservatives by removing his name from a Senate bill opposed to cloning, so there was some bridge-building to be done.

"This is a difficult issue," Mr. Talent said in an interview. "It comes up a fair amount, but I've been talking about my priorities and what they're going to be. Generally, I've focused on what I've done."

And as of late, Ms. McCaskill has made that task easier for Mr. Talent by also sidestepping the stem cell debate. Like many Democrats facing off against incumbent Republicans, Ms. McCaskill, the Missouri state auditor, has highlighted Mr. Talent's close association with an unpopular White House and pressed national issues like security, the war in Iraq, taxes and health care.

"He agrees with President Bush more than I agree with my husband," Ms. McCaskill said of Mr. Talent in an interview. "I think it's very hard for Missourians to accept that he's an agent of change. In contrast, I have very independent branding."

The largest group in the state promoting stem cell research, the Missouri Coalition for Lifesaving Cures, which is responsible for putting the initiative on the ballot, has steered clear of questions about the Senate race because of its nonpartisan stance.

The group's chairman, Donn Rubin, said it was trying to pitch a large tent.

"Our initiative is supported by many denominations, Christian and other, who believe in this research as a means to alleviate suffering," Mr. Rubin said. "Anyone of us could be a patient tomorrow and we all have a stake in seeing this amendment pass."

If the measure were to pass — and polls indicate that a majority of Missourians support it — Missouri would join California as the only states to include the right to perform stem cell research in its state constitution. But unlike the California measure, which designated billions of dollars for the research, the Missouri amendment does not include a commitment to financing. (It does not bar the possibility of it, however.)

The ballot measure would guarantee that any stem cell research that is legal under federal law could be performed in Missouri. Mr. Rubin said the coalition sought to get the issue on the ballot in direct response to efforts for years by conservative lawmakers to ban the cloning procedure involved in some forms of the research.

In the most controversial form of stem cell research, embryos are cloned and their stem cells are removed. This practice has ignited the political debate about whether life is being destroyed.

"This is the big one, this is the biggest pro-life issue voters have ever been confronted with," said Pam Fichter, the president of Missouri Right to Life. "This is the people deciding whether they want to enshrine in the constitution the right to clone and kill human embryos."

Given the void in the discourse at the candidates' level, many voters have been left to sort through a barrage of advertisements financed by independent groups. On billboards, on the radio and on television, the proposed amendment has been dubbed the "kill bill" by anti-abortion groups and conservative Christians. Advocates for the measure equate its passing with the guarantee of lifesaving cures.

Meanwhile, the Senate candidates continue to look for swing voters. Ms. McCaskill is working long hours to shore up her standing in the state's rural counties, where weak support from conservative voters contributed to her narrow defeat in the governor's race in 2004 and where opposition to the stem cell initiative tends to be strong. At the same time, Mr. Talent is trying to win the support of more liberal voters in urban areas, where his conservative views on stem cell research generally are not well received.

"They're raiding the traditional backyard of the other," said Professor Lana Stein, who heads the political science department at the University of Missouri, St. Louis.

Low-Key Democrat Leads High-Stakes Senate Race (WP)

By David Finkel, Washington Post Staff Writer

Social Conservative Bob Casey Is an Unlikely Party Hero

READING, Pa. -- For Bob Casey Jr., it was one of the good days in his campaign to send Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) into political obscurity. Morning brought word of a new poll showing him with a 12-point lead over Santorum, who is the third most powerful Republican in the Senate, and evening brought an adoring audience to a fundraiser here in a private home, where Casey said with growing confidence, "I really believe this race is about America."

His voice, in contrast to the high-pitched, battle-ready aggressiveness that is in Santorum's, was polite as he criticized his opponent and President Bush, touched upon his Catholic upbringing and discussed his work as a Jesuit volunteer in inner-city Philadelphia. "In the life of a middle-class family, things are not going all that well," he said several weeks ago to the middle-class crowd, and as he went on, his quiet words blended with the cricket chirps coming through the open windows.

When Casey was done talking, the next sounds included scribbling pens and checks being torn out of checkbooks because of what Democrats say this race means: A Casey victory would not only topple one of America's best-known conservatives but would also enhance the Democrats' prospects of winning control of the Senate.

The Democrats need to pick up six seats to take control of the Senate, and Pennsylvania has become one of their best hopes. Emboldened by polls showing widespread discontent with the GOP-controlled Congress, Democrats vow a fundamental reordering of domestic and foreign policy if their party sweeps to victory in the Senate and House on Nov. 7.

In going after a high-ranking Senate Republican, Democrats picked someone well suited for the role: the state treasurer and a member of one of Pennsylvania's best-known political families, who has strong conservative views on social issues, a liberal economic philosophy and opposition to the war in Iraq. Casey is against abortion and gun control, and he agrees with the current federal policy that limits embryonic stem cell research -- all positions that have inoculated him against attacks from the right.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), the chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, was so eager to recruit Casey that he and Gov. Edward G. Rendell (D) forced former state treasurer Barbara Hafer out of the race. That move rankled many liberal Democrats because of Hafer's support of abortion rights, but Schumer viewed Casey as the only candidate who could beat Santorum.

Since formally announcing his candidacy in March 2005, Casey has held a steady lead over Santorum in the polls. Yet even as he appears on the verge of a victory with national implications, many in his state and throughout the country know little about his background. Casey, 46, gives new meaning to political humility, and he discourages attention to his personal life or comparisons to his father, the late Robert P. Casey, a former governor.

"When a good politician walks in the room, even if you don't see him, you know it. The oxygen is sucked out of the room," said David Paul, a financial adviser in the Philadelphia suburbs and a Casey supporter. "When Casey comes in, you really don't know he's there. Whatever people were talking about, they just keep talking."

G. Terry Madonna, a Pennsylvania pollster, said, "If you ask people 'Who is Bob Casey Jr.?' their answer would be 'Well, I think he's a public official whose father was governor.' " Madonna, director of the Center for Politics and Public Affairs at Franklin and Marshall College, added, "They will not have a real specific sense about who he is."

Casey, when asked to talk about himself during a recent interview, replied, "Yeah, gosh, let's talk about public policy for a while."

Casey's father was a dominant figure in Pennsylvania. As a youth, he was a gifted athlete who turned down a tryout with the Philadelphia Phillies to accept a college basketball scholarship. After college and law school, he won his first election, becoming the state's auditor general, and made three unsuccessful bids for governor before finally winning in 1986. His two terms were notable for advances in welfare reform and health care for women and children. He was also a staunch foe of abortion.

The governor was barred from speaking at the 1992 Democratic National Convention in part because of his un-Democrat-like opposition to abortion. He was also the defendant in a U.S. Supreme Court case that year called Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, which challenged Pennsylvania restrictions on abortion and, to the dismay of abortion proponents, led to a redefining of fetal viability.

Casey's eldest son, Bob, followed in his footsteps, graduating from the College of the Holy Cross and obtaining a law degree from Catholic University before entering politics and winning his first of two terms as state auditor general in 1996. Casey ran for governor in 2002 but lost to Rendell in the Democratic primary. In 2004, he ran against a little-known opponent and won the post of state treasurer with 3.3 million votes -- more votes than any other candidate for a statewide office in Pennsylvania history.

Being treasurer, Casey recalled recently, was the perfect reflection of why he got into politics -- not because of personal ambition, he said, but because of his notion of public service. Since his childhood in Scranton, he said, that's what his father and mother emphasized. "I don't remember my parents ever giving us a noblesse oblige speech," he said. Rather, he learned through everyday examples, especially from his father.

As a state official, Casey proved to be a traditional Democrat on most issues, but, like his father, he was an ardent foe of abortion.

So when the party that had kept his father from speaking in 1992 began courting him in late 2004 to run against Santorum, he had a conversation with one of his brothers.

"Isn't this interesting?" is the way that conversation went, Chris Casey said. "Isn't this ironic?"

Casey's sister Margi McGrath commented on why the national party sought out her brother: "It's not because they love him. He's not their tailor-made candidate."

Yet within days of his election as state treasurer, the Democrats were contacting him about running against Santorum.

Santorum, a former House member, first won election to the Senate in 1994 with 1.7 million votes, which was just under 50 percent of the popular vote. He was reelected in 2000 with 2.4 million votes, or 53 percent, and he became a prominent and polarizing conservative figure in the Senate.

Whatever the reason for the courtship, Casey didn't say yes immediately.

"He was agonizing about it," said McGrath.

Casey recounted a conversation with his wife: " 'You've got to think about this,' " he said she told him. "And I said, 'I'm going to think about it, very seriously.' And she said, 'But you've got to really think about this,' and these weren't her words, but basically she was saying, 'You can win this race, you can defeat him, and I'm not sure anyone else can.' And that weighed heavily on me because I knew, to be blunt about it, if I didn't run, he'd probably be reelected. And maybe easily."

For three months, Casey worked the angles, thinking about the implications of winning and of losing and his often-stated desire to become Pennsylvania's governor. He finally agreed, he said, because "you can make a tremendous contribution as a U.S. senator on issues I care about, like health care and like building an economy."

"But also I was influenced by the idea that sometimes you've got to stop what's going on, and you may be the only person that can do that," he said.

By midsummer of this year, Santorum had raised substantially more money than Casey -- $17.2 million to $10.8 million -- much of it going toward advertising that has portrayed Casey as a ladder climber, a candidate with only the vaguest positions, and, in an attempt to convey that he is not the same Casey as his father, "Bobby."

"What you heard from Mr. Casey is what you hear all the time. No specifics," Santorum said when the two debated on "Meet the Press" in early September. Casey, however, who was anything but docile in the debate -- sometimes interrupting Santorum, sometimes correcting him, sometimes mocking him -- was well ahead in the polls at that point.

He has been leading in the polls since spring. The only blip in a steady stream of successes came in a poll a few weeks ago, which showed that unfavorable reactions to him had risen from 13 percent in May to 22 percent in September as Santorum ramped up his attacks. "Santorum, at the moment, is defining Casey better than Casey is defining himself," said Madonna, the pollster.

What the poll also showed, however, is that the race is far less about Casey than about Santorum. Nearly 30 percent of likely Casey voters said they support him mainly because he's not Santorum -- "a pretty high percentage," Madonna said. And as Santorum's unfavorable rating has climbed from 26 percent when Casey entered the race to 37 percent in September, the Casey campaign has seemed content to remain low key, letting Casey be defined less by who he is than by who he is not.

As McGrath said, when asked who her brother is: "He's not a polarizing figure."

Who is he, though?

DOJ_NMG_0081559

At a second campaign stop in Reading, this one with union workers at a small hotel, Kathy Quimby watched Casey come in.

"Wasn't his father in politics?" she asked, trying to figure out where she had heard Casey's name.

Quimby, who works at the hotel, watched as the candidate went around the room, shaking hands and speaking in an even voice about what is wrong and right in the country.

Chalk up another vote against Santorum: "He seems like a nice guy," she said.

The New York Senate Race (NYT)

Hillary Clinton is running in a phantom race for the Senate, pitted against an unknown, unqualified opponent. In the unlikely event that New Yorkers ever learn what John Spencer's views are, most would find them far too conservative. It's a measure of the haplessness of Mr. Spencer's campaign that the Republican nominee has been dogged by rumors that his real aim is to prepare the ground for an attempt to regain his old job as mayor of Yonkers.

It would be easy to endorse Hillary Clinton for a second term even if she had a far more credible opponent. Mrs. Clinton has been an excellent senator — hard-working and in close touch with her state. We have been particularly impressed by her focus on the neglected "first suburbs" of aging housing and decaying infrastructure. As a Democrat, she has a limited ability to influence legislation, but she has taken a lead in forming the debate on a number of issues of substance. Her bill aimed at fixing the mechanics of voting set the standard for election reform legislation.

Watching Mrs. Clinton do her job, we have been impressed by her mastery of even the most obscure details of New York's problems. Her ability to work with Republicans has been a pleasant surprise. She has won the genuine respect of most of her colleagues in Washington, and she seems to have found a forum in which her lifelong wonkishness can be put to good use. It seems as if in the Senate, Mrs. Clinton has found her true calling.

The puzzle of this campaign is that she might not consider that a compliment.

Mrs. Clinton's intention to be a candidate for president in 2008, though unannounced, is hardly a secret. And the Republicans' failure to field a candidate of substance has allowed her to spend this fall running against George Bush. So far, the voters do not seem to mind. The idea that Hillary Clinton wants to desert New York two years into her next term has been the centerpiece of Mr. Spencer's campaign, to little avail.

We enthusiastically endorse Mrs. Clinton for re-election, while watching with interest to see if she can convince the country that she has as much aptitude for the presidency as she does for her current job. Her extraordinary discipline might help her to avoid mistakes during a presidential campaign, to run a race that will not center on some symbolic slip-up. But can she conjure up a vision of the future for a nation desperately in need of inspiration and real leadership? Can she speak to the great issues of the day directly, without carefully trimming every sentence to steer clear of controversy?

The real question is not whether she can turn in continued good performance in the Senate, or even whether she can run a smart campaign for president. It is whether she can put some great idea ahead of her own political upward mobility, whether there is a cause so important to her that she will risk her political security for it. We are waiting for a profile-in-courage moment, a sign that she is something more than a very competent politician. Meanwhile, we endorse Hillary Clinton for another six years in the Senate.

GOP All But Cedes The Race To Feinstein (LAT)

By Scott Martelle, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

The Republican candidate for one of California's two seats in the Senate — potentially one of the most powerful legislative positions in the country — walked alone into a banquet room at the Pomona Valley Mining Co. restaurant on a recent morning and looked around.

The regular meeting of the California Federation of Republican Women, Southern Division, was underway, and the candidate, Dick Mountjoy, portly beneath a shock of white hair, stood mostly unnoticed. As a woman at the head table talked of plans for an upcoming convention, Mountjoy slipped small stacks of pamphlets and bumper stickers from the pockets of his cream-colored jacket and placed them on the registration table.

There was no entourage. No scheduler clicking away on a Blackberry or campaign handler whispering into a cellphone. Just Mountjoy, a former state senator from nearby Monrovia and self-described "biblical constitutionalist," here to talk to the Republican faithful about his campaign to unseat incumbent Democrat Dianne Feinstein.

David had it easier against Goliath.

During a national election cycle marked by a bitter fight for control of the Senate and the House of Representatives, the campaign for California's senior Senate seat has the feel of a foregone conclusion as Feinstein, one of the state's most popular vote-getters, holds a commanding lead among likely voters in the race.

"Mountjoy doesn't have the reach in the Republican Party or the name identification or the appeal to moderates that Feinstein has with Democrats," said Terry Christensen, a political analyst at San Jose State. The Republican Party "knows it, and they're not spending money on it. So it's partly Feinstein's strength and partly the California Republican Party's weakness," Christensen said.

And few people seem to know who Mountjoy is, despite his role as one of the architects of 1994's Proposition 187, which would have made it illegal for undocumented immigrants to receive many government benefits. Mountjoy's 29% support among all registered voters in the most recent Los Angeles Times poll is less than the 34% of state voters enrolled as Republicans. And in a July Field poll — one of the last to ask the question — 62% of voters said they did not know enough about Mountjoy to have an opinion about him.

Little has changed since then. Feinstein entered the late-summer push with more than $8 million in the bank to Mountjoy's $21,000, making it likely that this will be the second California race in a row for the Senate in which the Republican challenger was unable to air crucial television ads in the final weeks of the campaign.

The next financial reports aren't due until today, but even Republicans seem to have given up. The National Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee — a key funding and organizing tool for Republican Senate incumbents and hopefuls — doesn't even list Mountjoy as a candidate on its website. To add insult to injury, where his face and biography should be posted, the website lists Barbara Boxer, a red flag for Republican bulls.

Which is fitting, since this lopsided matchup has its roots in Boxer's 58%-38% reelection two years ago over former California Secretary of State Bill Jones.

"The conventional wisdom is that Boxer is not as strong politically as Feinstein, and if Boxer could win in a walk, then the Feinstein race would be that much easier," said Jack Pitney, a political analyst at Claremont McKenna College and a former Republican official.

"Feinstein's advantage fed on itself. She went into the election a heavy favorite, and that deterred more credible candidates from getting in the race. From the Republican perspective, it's a vicious cycle. People don't think he can win, so they don't give him support, which makes it less likely he will win."

So why would a politician willingly enter such a race?

"The biggest upside is low expectations — nobody expects him to do anything," Pitney said. "If he can crack 40%, he can claim a moral victory. But it's more about him doing his duty for the party. Major parties ought to nominate somebody to run against an incumbent, even if the outcome looks like a foregone conclusion. He's performing a service for textbook democracy."

Mountjoy insists that he is running to win and hopes that a strong Republican turnout and weak Democratic showing on election day will trump the early polls and overwhelming disparity in campaign budgets.

"We don't have a lot of money, but we have enough to get our message out, and that's all we need to do," Mountjoy said. "We don't try to match her money, just outdo her with the issues."

Mountjoy's platform embraces such boilerplate conservative issues as increased border security with Mexico, no amnesty for illegal immigrants, support for the war in Iraq, elimination of unspecified government waste, a stronger military and enhanced property rights. He also opposes abortion, even in cases of incest or rape, and gay marriage.

"America is at a crossroads," said Mountjoy, who lists the Bible and the U.S. Constitution as his two guiding texts. "We've got to turn America around. We are quickly slipping into a moral decay that is unprecedented, and I for one say it has got to stop."

Feinstein's positions are just as reliably moderate-liberal as Mountjoy's are conservative.

She advocates a "humane" approach to stemming illegal immigration; a "structured downsizing" of the U.S. military presence in Iraq and Donald H. Rumsfeld's ouster as Defense secretary; a more collegial approach to foreign policy; and a heightened fight against global warming. She supports abortion rights and civil unions for gays.

As for campaigning, don't expect to see much of Feinstein on the stump beyond a few town hall-style meetings and what campaign manager Kam Kuwata referred to as "Washington report lunches" — part of her regimen for keeping in touch with constituents.

"Sen. Feinstein has focused her time on doing what she's been doing all along — doing her job well," Kuwata said. "Why tinker with something people appreciate?"

Dianne Feinstein

Party: Democrat

Occupation: U.S. senator since 1992. Mayor of San Francisco from 1978 to 1988; member, San Francisco Board of Supervisors, 1970 to 1978.

Age: 73; born in San Francisco.

Residence: San Francisco

Personal: Married; one child, three stepchildren, five grandchildren.

Education: Bachelor's degree from Stanford University.

Career highlights: Former mayor of San Francisco, she first won election to the U.S. Senate in 1992 in the wake of the controversial appointment of Clarence Thomas to the U.S. Supreme Court, when she and Barbara Boxer made California the first state to have two women elected to the Senate at the same time. Feinstein has established a reputation as a liberal-moderate. Serves on the Judiciary, Appropriations, Energy and Natural Resources committees, and the Select Committee on Intelligence. Backed legislation protecting more than 7 million acres of California desert and dealing with other environmental issues; backed creation of a director of national intelligence; helped establish rights for victims of violent crime, and wrote the 1994 bill banning assault weapons.

Platform: Calls for a "change in direction in Iraq"; a more collegial relationship with allies on foreign policy; securing the border but also adopting a "humane approach" to undocumented immigrants already in the U.S.; aggressively working to reduce global warming; supports stem cell research; opposes further development of nuclear weapons by the U.S.; and calls for appointment of "mainstream judges" to the federal bench.

On the Issues

Iraq: Says Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld should be replaced. Supports development of a timeline and exit strategy that would significantly reduce the presence of U.S. troops by the end of 2007.

Immigration/border: Supports increasing the number of Border Patrol agents and Port of Entry inspectors. Says illegal immigrants should be put on a path to citizenship if they can prove they have been law-abiding, have worked and will continue to work, pay a fine and all back taxes and learn English.

Environment: Wants to raise average fuel economy on all vehicles by 10 miles per gallon by 2017, reduce greenhouse emissions by 10% or more by 2025.

Abortion: Supports abortion rights.

border and increased law enforcement. Opposes government benefits for illegal immigrants, except emergency medical care. Opposes all amnesty programs.

Environment: Says the continuing influx of immigrants must be addressed first.

Abortion: Opposes abortion.

Ohio GOP's Financial Support Wavering (AP-Y)

By Julie Carr Smyth, Assocated Press Writer

AP, October 15, 2006

As the GOP scrambles nationwide to retain its majority, scandal-ridden Ohio appears to be falling off the financial radar screen.

Television time is being forsaken for House candidates. And national promotions of the state's gubernatorial candidate by the Republican Governors Association popped up, then disappeared.

Ohio Republicans are trying to regroup amid a guilty plea Friday by U.S. Rep. Bob Ney in a Washington influence-peddling case and the trial of GOP fundraiser Tom Noe — accused of stealing from a state investment in rare coins — set to begin next week. Their national counterparts are following suit, focusing every last penny on races they believe they can win.

Those include U.S. Sen. Mike DeWine's seat, which is being hotly contested by U.S. Rep. Sherrod Brown; U.S. Rep. Deborah Pryce's seat, which Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy is seeking; and the seat Ney is vacating, which the party hopes state Rep. Joy Padgett can win over Democrat Zach Space.

"As races change, dynamics change," said Ed Patru, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee. "We're not going to continue spending money in races where we're significantly ahead and, conversely, in some races if it looks to be out of reach, you're not going to dump a bunch of money into it."

In recent days, the committee pulled advertising it had planned in the race between Republican Craig Foltin and Democrat Betty Sutton for Brown's open House seat, which the GOP initially thought it could wrest from Democrats. The committee also viewed the seat being vacated by Democratic U.S. Rep. Ted Strickland, who is running for governor, as a potential gain, but has backed away from that hope.

Strickland has held a double-digit lead in the polls in that race, which is drawing national attention because the winner's party will carry an edge into the 2008 presidential election. A narrow win in Ohio gave President Bush the electoral votes he needed for re-election in 2004.

Without mentioning specifics, Patru said open seats have been judged less important than those held by incumbents. He said the committee is still optimistic about 10 to 12 seats that are open or held by Democrats nationwide, and believes Democrats have also adjusted their early expectations.

Meanwhile, after an aggressive early advertising push, Republican gubernatorial nominee Ken Blackwell, Ohio's secretary of state, has disappeared from the airwaves — a surprising turn of events for the leading candidate on the party's ticket.

A one-time strategy called for the RGA to air its own ads in support of Blackwell, but the governor's group appears to have written off the state.

In a letter to supporters earlier this month, the group's chairman, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, listed Iowa, Maine, Oregon, Illinois, Arkansas and Michigan as the only states with targeted governor's races.

RGA executive director Phil Musser said the letter has been misinterpreted, and that specific states were listed where money was still able to be spent under campaign finance limits.

"If we could send volunteers under the law in Ohio, we sure would," Musser said. "And any assertion that this is about how we view the race is ludicrous."

The Ohio Republican Party does not appear to be coming forward to fill the advertising void, choosing instead to put its resources into the races for secretary of state and state auditor.

Blackwell said Friday he is not disappointed with the support he has received.

"The fact is the president came in and raised $1.6 million for me. They've had Cabinet officers in just this week," he said. "The RGA has made independent expenditures in the hundreds of thousands of dollars. I'm perfectly satisfied with the level of support."

During a visit this week to stump for DeWine, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said the party is not letting up in Ohio despite the hurdles it faces.

"We have well over 50 people on the ground whose job it is to help Ken win, to help Mike DeWine win and to help the congressional candidates win," he said. "We sent out 1.5 million absentee mail pieces, that specifically feature Ken Blackwell and the others on the ticket. We believe Ken Blackwell is an asset to Ohio and the whole turnout effort we have in place benefits Ken Blackwell on Election Day."

GOP, Democrats Rally For Ohio Hopefuls (NYT/AP)

HAMILTON, Ohio (AP) -- House Majority Leader John Boehner rallied supporters in a key southwest Ohio county Saturday amid a series of scandals involving Republicans and polls indicating tight or uphill battles.

"I'm here to tell you that elections are not won or lost on what the polls say. Elections are won or lost based on who shows up to vote," Boehner told more than 100 people at Butler County Republican Party headquarters before volunteers fanned out with yard signs, rolls of stickers and campaign door hangers.

Boehner faces questioning in the House ethics committee investigation of the page scandal unfolding since Florida Republican Rep. Mark Foley resigned over suggestive instant messages sent to a former page in 2003.

Boehner told reporters he didn't know earlier of the messages that prompted Foley's departure and suspects their release was timed politically.

"I had no knowledge. I don't think the speaker or anybody else in the leadership had any knowledge of these sexually explicit messages," Boehner said. "The question is who did know? Why did they show up when they did?''

In Ohio, the page scandal has affected the race of Republican Deborah Pryce, he said. Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy ran a radio ad highlighting Pryce's friendship with Foley.

Also Saturday, Democratic Rep. John Murtha campaigned in Ohio for fellow Democrat Victoria Wulsin, who is challenging first-term Republican Rep. Jean Schmidt in the state's 2nd District. Schmidt criticized Murtha's call to pull troops out of Iraq on the floor of the House last year.

The 16-term Pennsylvania congressman said there needs to be "a return to civility" in Washington and said the Iraq war is a costly failure that's only going to get worse if U.S. troops remain.

"The Iraqis have to figure this out themselves," he said.

During a debate last November, Schmidt spoke of a phone call she received from a Marine colonel saying he "asked me to send Congressman Murtha a message -- that cowards cut and run, Marines never do."

The remark prompted boos from Democrats and brought the House to a standstill. Schmidt subsequently apologized to Murtha and said she hadn't realized he was a decorated Marine veteran of the Vietnam War.

Schmidt wouldn't comment on Murtha's visit, but said her constituents agree with her support of the president's Iraq policy, not Murtha's call for withdrawal. She received campaign help Saturday from Rob Portman, the White House budget chief and the district's representative for 12 years before Schmidt.

During his visit, Murtha also helped raise funds for Wulsin, a medical doctor and former public health officer. He said little about Schmidt, saying his main campaign mission is to get a Democratic majority in the House.

Confessions Of A 'Defeatocrat' (WP)

By John P. Murtha

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

The Republicans are running scared. In the White House, on Capitol Hill and on the campaign trail, they're worried about losing control of Congress. And so the administration and the GOP have launched a desperate assault on Democrats and our position on the war in Iraq. Defeatists, they call us, and appeasers and -- oh so cleverly -- "Defeatocrats."

Vice President Cheney has accused Democrats of "self-defeating pessimism." Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has faulted us for believing that "vicious extremists can be appeased." The White House calls Democrats the party of "cut and run."

It's all baseless name-calling, and it's all wrong. Unless, of course, being a Defeatocrat means taking a good hard look at the administration's Iraq policy and determining that it's a failure.

In that case, count me in. Because Democrats recognize that we're headed for a far greater disaster in Iraq if we don't change course -- and soon. This is not defeatism. This is realism.

Our troops who are putting their lives on the line deserve a plan that matches our military prowess with diplomatic and political skill. They deserve a clear and achievable mission and they deserve to know precisely what it will take to accomplish it. They deserve answers, not spin.

Our military has done all it can do in Iraq, and the Iraqis want their occupation to end. I support bringing our troops home at the earliest practicable date, at a rate that will keep those remaining there safe on the ground. It's time that the White House and the GOP start working with Democrats in Congress to come up with a reasonable timetable for withdrawal and for handing the Iraqi government over to the Iraqis.

The administration's use of Rovian catchphrases is nothing but propaganda designed to stifle the loyal opposition. We Democrats are determined to restore our nation's military strength, refocus on the real terrorist threat, bolster security safeguards at home and reestablish the credible standing we once had in the world. That is not defeatist. It is a call to formulate and execute a winning game plan for the War on Terror.

Most Democrats voted against the 2002 resolution authorizing the use of military force in Iraq. Regrettably, I was not one of them. Since entering Congress in 1974, I have always supported the president on issues of war. But in this case, I made a mistake -- and unlike certain members of the administration, I'm willing to say so. If I had known in October 2002 what I know now, I would never have voted for the resolution.

Some of my Democratic colleagues questioned whether Iraq posed an immediate threat to our national security; some were not convinced that Iraq was accelerating the development of nuclear weapons and had an active chemical and biological weapons program; and almost all believed that Iraq was not involved in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. They turned out to be right on all three counts. Nevertheless, since our forces deployed to Iraq, Democratic support for the troops has never wavered.

In the past nine months alone, $962 billion has been appropriated for the Defense Department, $190 billion for the war effort. A vast majority of Democrats voted for the funding. Democrats also identified shortfalls in body armor, armored vehicles and electronic jammers to defeat roadside bombs. Democrats uncovered problems with the military readiness of our ground forces in the United States and fought for measures to restore it. That's hardly defeatist.

When U.S. forces first entered Baghdad, the Iraqi people cheered as the statue of Saddam Hussein was torn from its pedestal. Forty-two months and $400 billion later, we are caught in a civil war in which 61 percent of Iraqis think killing Americans is justified and the Iraqi people butcher one another at an alarming rate. We are considered occupiers. The longer we stay, the harder it becomes for the Iraqis to find their own destiny.

The administration's "stay-the-course" strategy is not a plan for victory. It's not even a plan. All we have is a new military blueprint to keep 140,000 troops in Iraq through 2010.

We are seeing an astonishing and unprecedented parade of retired U.S. generals calling for a new direction in Iraq. These are voices of bravery, experience, conscience and loyalty. These are men who have been taught to look coldly and objectively at the facts of bloodshed. Can they all be wrong? How about the 15 intelligence agencies that recently offered the opinion that this war has not made us safer? Are they all defeatists? Are they to be ignored?

Was Gen. Eric K. Shinseki, former Army chief of staff, a defeatist when he said that it would take several hundred thousand troops to prevail in Iraq? His recommendation was ignored. Or what about Gen. Jay M. Garner, our first administrator in Iraq, who recommended that the Iraqi army be kept intact and used to stabilize the country? His recommendations were ignored. The Iraqi army was disbanded and the former military took their munitions and went off to form the core of the insurgency. Was former secretary of state Colin L. Powell defeatist when he warned: "If you break it, you own it"? Was Republican Dwight D. Eisenhower a defeatist when he ran for president in 1952 to change the course of Democrat Harry S. Truman's administration in Korea?

Will the White House toss the same tired insults at Sen. John W. Warner (Va.), the Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, who has voiced concern over the situation in Iraq? Or at former secretary of state James A. Baker III when the commission he is co-chairing delivers its report on reassessing our options in Iraq?

This administration's insistence on a "go-it-alone, stay-the-course" policy in the face of objections from a majority of Americans and Iraqis and most world public opinion, and in the face of a deteriorating situation, defies logic.

The United States is about to begin its fifth year of occupation and fighting in Iraq. That makes this war longer than U.S. participation in World Wars I and II, and longer than the Korean War and our own Civil War. With every year of occupation, our efforts to fight global terrorism and our military's readiness to fight future wars have further deteriorated, along with our standing in the world. Meanwhile, the radical Islamic cause wins more and more recruits.

Despite the presence of more than 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, 23,000 Americans injured or killed, tens of thousands of Iraqi deaths and the expenditure of nearly a half a trillion dollars, here are the dismal results:

Â· In September, 776 U.S troops were wounded in Iraq, the highest monthly toll in more than two years.

Â· Over the past year, the number of attacks against U.S. personnel has doubled, rising from 400 to more than 800 per week.

Â· Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, recently acknowledged that sectarian violence has replaced the insurgency as the single biggest threat to Iraq.

Â· In the past two months, 6,000 Iraqis died, more than in the first year of the war.

Â· Last week, electricity output averaged 2.4 hours per day in Baghdad and 10.4 hours nationwide -- 7 percent less than in the same period in 2005.

Â· A Sept. 27 World Public Opinion poll indicated that 91 percent of Iraqi Sunnis and 74 percent of Iraqi Shiites want the Iraqi government to ask U.S.-led forces to withdraw within a year. Ninety-seven percent of Sunnis and 82 percent of Shiites said that the U.S. military presence is "provoking more conflict than it is preventing." And Iraqi support for attacks against U.S.-led forces has increased sharply over the past few months, from 47 percent to 61 percent.

Now, Karl Rove may call me a defeatist, but can anyone living in the real world deny that these statistics are heading in the wrong direction? Yet despite this bleak record of performance, the president continues to stand by his team of failed architects, preferring to prop them up instead of demanding accountability.

Democrats are fighting a war on two fronts: One is combating the spin and intimidation that defines this administration. The other is fighting to change course, to do things better, to substitute smart, disciplined strategy for dogma and denial in Iraq.

That's not defeatism. That's our duty.

He served 37 years in the Marine Corps.

Rep. Murtha Blasts GOP For Name - Calling (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Rep. John Murtha, a decorated Marine veteran who favors withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq, wrote an essay for Sunday's Washington Post blasting Republicans for referring to him and other Iraq war opponents as "Defeatocrats."

In his opinion piece, first published on the Post's Web site Saturday night, Murtha, D-Pa., said Vice President Dick Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and others in the White House have called Iraq war opponents appeasers and pessimists and labeled Democrats the "cut and run" party.

"It's all baseless name-calling, and it's all wrong," Murtha wrote. "Unless, of course, being a Defeatocrat means taking a good hard look at the administration's Iraq policy and determining that it's a failure.

"In that case, count me in. Because Democrats recognize that we're headed for a far greater disaster in Iraq if we don't change course -- and soon. This is not defeatism. This is realism."

Murtha, a military hawk and close confidant of top military officials, surprised Washington last year when he called for pulling all troops out of Iraq within months.

At a GOP fundraiser in Milwaukee last month, Cheney accused Murtha of advocating a policy of retreat in the war against terrorism.

In the Post essay, Murtha wrote: "Democrats are fighting a war on two fronts: One is combating the spin and intimidation that defines this administration. The other is fighting to change course, to do things better, to substitute smart, disciplined strategy for dogma and denial in Iraq.

"That's not defeatism. That's our duty," Murtha wrote.

Murtha's Opposition To Iraq War Makes Him A Big Target (PPG)

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 15, 2006

Rarely in the annals of American politics has the much-used David-Goliath analogy been so apropos. U.S. Rep. John Murtha is literally and figuratively daunting -- literally because he's 6 feet, 3 inches tall and broad-shouldered with a booming voice; figuratively because he's a giant in Congress, a 32-year veteran of the House of Representatives. And his challenger, Republican Diana Irey, is the opposite -- soft-spoken, slight, barely clearing 5 feet, a neophyte on the national stage.

We know how the Bible story ended. But can Mrs. Irey slay this towering Johnstown warrior?

Since earning a surprising victory in her first run for political office, when she defeated an incumbent to secure a seat on the Washington County Board of Commissioners in 1995, Mrs. Irey has been a favorite among Pennsylvania's GOP notables such as former Allegheny County Chief Executive Jim Roddey, and Sens. Arlen Specter and Rick Santorum. A West Virginia native, she married into a family with some clout. Her late father-in-law, Frank Irey, was GOP chairman in Washington County.

For years, there had been speculation that she'd be recruited to run for higher office, but, until now, she's balked, citing her young family and her comfort with her role in Washington, Pa.

What changed? Last autumn, she said, Mr. Murtha's call for American withdrawal from Iraq lit a fire. At the same time, she had been marginalized on the commissioners board, the only Republican there, serving with two Democrats. Add a dash of ambition and the timing was right.

"Jack Murtha's been in office for 32 years, and that's too long," said Mrs. Irey, 44, the mother of three teens. "I believe he's lost touch with the beliefs of the people in the 12th District. ... He no longer is voting the conservative values of the 12th District. He's voting more like he's the congressman from liberal San Francisco than conservative southwestern Pennsylvania."

With more than $2.5 million raised and $1.8 million on hand, Mr. Murtha is financially better off than his foe. Mrs. Irey had raised $305,000 and had $159,000 in cash on hand as of June 30, the most recent Federal Election Commission reporting deadline. And, despite her hopes of using Mr. Murtha's well-publicized Iraq comments to nationalize the race and her fund-raising base -- "We have contributions from all 50 states," she said -- $36,000, or 23 percent, of her campaign funds have come from out of state. And a recently published poll showed her trailing 57 percent to 30.

Still, those numbers tell just part of the story. Mrs. Irey has outpaced several of Pennsylvania's congressional challengers and has raised more money than at least one incumbent. Her invitations to "Fox News Live" and "Hannity & Colmes," and her stint on "Hardball with Chris Matthews" are as good as free advertising and are luxuries that aren't afforded to all congressional challengers. She's also been supported by a vociferous Internet-based anti-Murtha campaign, organized by a group known as Vets for the Truth, which has rallied opposition to certain Democratic candidates who have served in the U.S. military. Presidential candidate Sen. John F. Kerry was the group's most notable victim.

Mrs. Irey hopes that outside support will be joined by a regional electorate that registers Democratic but often votes conservatively. Over the course of a half-hour interview, Mrs. Irey tossed up a dozen conservative boilerplate issues: gay marriage, the Pledge of Allegiance, immigration and border security, lower taxes, drilling in Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, and, of course, her support and Mr. Murtha's disapproval of the Iraq war.

The war looms as the largest issue in many congressional races across the country, but especially so in this race. Mr. Murtha, 74, a retired Marine reservist and the top-ranking Democrat on the House committee that disburses defense appropriations, crashed into the national consciousness in November, when he called for a military withdrawal from Iraq, to be carried out at the earliest practical date. He became a darling of the anti-war left and, just as quickly, a target for the right, which has branded him a traitor.

Both candidates say they speak for veterans. Mr. Murtha has done so historically, noting that he visits military hospitals once a week, and he suggests that he, and not Mrs. Irey, is in better position to gauge the military's mood. His opposition to the war "is a policy thing. This has nothing to do with supporting the military," he said.

But Mrs. Irey predicts she'll win close to half of the veteran voting bloc Nov. 7. The disaffection with Mr. Murtha is greater than his campaign realizes, she said. "Every time we withdraw before a mission is completed," Mrs. Irey said, "we send a message of surrender."

Mrs. Irey has seized on not only Mr. Murtha's November comments, but also his response to the deaths of two dozen unarmed Haditha, Iraq, residents who were killed by U.S. Marines reportedly outraged over the death of a comrade. Mr. Murtha said the Marine group killed in "cold blood," and suggested that the group's superiors tried to cover up the deaths. "Our troops overreacted because of the pressure on them, and they killed innocent civilians in cold blood," he said.

The remarks "were completely inappropriate," said Mrs. Irey. "That was a rush to judgment. What he did was wrong."

His sudden outspokenness is surprising to those who have known him over his three decades in Congress. Until last year, Mr. Murtha was generally viewed as a behind-the-scenes deal-maker who was able to navigate the congressional power structure while rarely airing dirty laundry. His Haditha comments seemed out of character, and politically ill-advised. So, too, did his remarks at a Sept. 30 political rally, during which he said that he knew of military wives who were abused by their soldier husbands.

"This war is [tearing] the families apart," he said. "I see women who have been abused when their husbands come home."

If the Haditha comments don't hurt him, Mrs. Irey hopes that Mr. Murtha's ancillary role in the Abscam congressional bribery scandal will. Like some of Mr. Murtha's previous opponents, she hopes to make hay by pointing out that Mr. Murtha was an "unindicted co-conspirator" in the 1980s scandal. The FBI sting netted several congressmen, including two from Pennsylvania, by offering bribes in exchange for favors and asylum for a fictitious Arab sheik.

When an agent offered $50,000, Mr. Murtha memorably responded: "I'm not interested, at this point." In resurrecting Abscam, Mrs. Irey has been aided by talk radio, as well as by The American Spectator magazine, which unearthed the hour-long video of the attempted sting and released it last month. In the video, Mr. Murtha invites the agents to invest in his distric t, possibly in the coal mining industry, or in area banks, hoping to bring jobs to his district.

He also seems aware that he is toeing the legal line, and says he doesn't plan to throw away his legislative career for a few bucks.

"I'm going to be there 20 years in that Congress, and I don't want to screw it up by some little thing along the way. If I wanted to make a lot of money, I'd have been outside," in the private sector, he says. Mr. Murtha, then as now, reminds voters that "I was the one who didn't take the money."

How serious a threat?

How seriously does Mr. Murtha take the Irey campaign?

It's tough to say. Publicly, he says his campaign's internal polls show a generous lead, and he says he doesn't count Mrs. Irey among his toughest challengers. "Mascara was a threat. Bailey was a threat. They were sitting congressmen," he said, speaking of former Reps. Frank Mascara, a Democrat who lost his district to Mr. Murtha in a primary forced by reapportionment, and Don Bailey, who lost the same way.

But he's also hired a private detective to look into Mrs. Irey's past. The firm, Gentile-Meinert and Associates, didn't discover anything of note, Mr. Murtha said, although it reported that Mrs. Irey has a poor attendance record. She's been appointed to a lot of boards, but doesn't always attend the meetings, he said.

He said the hiring an investigator was not an indication that he views Mrs. Irey as a contender. His campaign hires a detective to investigate all of his political opponents, Mr. Murtha said.

Mrs. Irey sees it another way.

"People across the nation care about this race," she said. "Of course, it has very little to do with me, and everything to do with my opponent." For example, donations to her campaign spike each time she appears on cable TV to criticize Mr. Murtha.

Still, the spikes don't add up to much, relative to Mr. Murtha's campaign funds. Trailing in money, she'll have to hope that her many TV appearances will help build name recognition in the eastern part of the district, then rely on her popularity in parts west, where she's been in office longer than Mr. Murtha has. Though he's been in Congress for 16 terms, and is now seeking his 17th, much of Mr. Murtha's district -- including the Washington County side -- is new to him, a result of redistricting after the 2000 Census.

He said his district has a Democratic voting registration majority of 150,000. But in recent elections, some of those registered Democrats have been voting Republican. In the 2004 presidential election, Westmoreland and Cambria counties tilted to President Bush. Mr. Murtha's 12th District contains pieces of both counties, all of Greene County, jagged bits of Armstrong, Fayette, Indiana, Somerset and Washington counties, and a sliver of Allegheny.

Recent history, as far as Mr. Murtha is concerned, is ancient history. "Our polling says they're not going to vote Republican this time," he said. "The Democrats are going to be in the majority. There's going to be a hurricane throughout the country."

But Mrs. Irey hopes the country's anti-Republican mood will be trumped by more generic anti-incumbent sentiments. "I'm afraid that our nation is headed in the wrong direction," she said. "This is going to be the Diana and Goliath story."

In Pennsylvania, Questions About War Erode A Traditional Republican Advantage (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

DOJ_NMG_0081569

EDGMONT, Pa., Oct. 12 — When Joe Sestak announced he was running for Congress, national Democrats and media consultants told him not to talk about pulling troops out of Iraq, arguing it would only encourage the image of Democrats as weak on national security.

Nine months later, having ignored their advice, Mr. Sestak has put a 20-year Republican incumbent on the run for the first time, turning a bid by a political novice into a real race. Polls show that Mr. Sestak is running even or better with his opponent, Representative Curt Weldon, and that the war more than any other issue is propelling voters toward him.

Facing pressure from Mr. Sestak and a stream of bad news from Iraq, Mr. Weldon, who prides himself on his foreign policy credentials, has adopted an unconventional proposal to allow the generals on the ground, rather than President Bush as commander in chief, to decide the pace of a phased withdrawal.

"That's what I've asked the president to articulate," Mr. Weldon said in an interview, "but so far he's been unwilling to do so."

Mr. Sestak's persistence on the issue, and Mr. Weldon's efforts to recalibrate his position, highlight some of the ways Iraq may be altering the politics of national security after decades in which the advantage has gone to the Republicans.

Democrats are increasingly confident that they can win on national security by arguing, as Mr. Sestak does, that going to war with Iraq ignored the more potent threats of North Korea and Iran, and that staying has left the nation unprepared to deal with crises elsewhere.

Mr. Sestak's résumé provides the Democrats an especially good opportunity to be seen as strong when it comes to protecting the country: a former three-star admiral, he worked as a national security adviser in the Clinton White House.

In an election where every seat matters — Democrats need 15 to win a majority in the House — Mr. Sestak's credentials could prove crucial. The Seventh Congressional District race here in the wealthy Philadelphia suburbs has emerged as the most competitive in one of the most competitive states for House races.

"We wouldn't be talking about this race if it weren't for the Iraq war," said G. Terry Madonna, the director of the Keystone Poll at Franklin & Marshall College in Lancaster. "It's been a long time since I've seen a foreign policy issue like the war dominate a suburban Congressional race. No one can honestly believe that Sestak would be a serious challenger to Weldon if it weren't for the war. His experience has given him added credibility."

Mr. Weldon is not shy about foreign policy: he has made several trips to North Korea and pushed for a missile defense system. Bucking ridicule and the conclusions of the Bush administration, he has argued that the jury is still out on whether there were unconventional weapons when the United States went into Iraq, and that the 9/11 commission ignored evidence that a secret Pentagon program had identified several hijackers before the attacks.

But Mr. Weldon faces other issues on the foreign policy front. Law enforcement officials said Saturday, for instance, that they were investigating his role in securing lobbying contracts for his daughter's international public relations firm.

In this race, however, Mr. Weldon has tried to run on his local bona fides — his roots in a blue-collar town here, the money he has brought home — dismissing Mr. Sestak, who grew up in the district but lived elsewhere for 31 years in the military. But the war has been hard to avoid.

At an event for Republican women at the Edgmont Country Club, he talked about his successes in land preservation and economic development, and named local hospital and social service agency executives as close friends. "I'm running on what we've done," he told the audience.

A woman raised her hand: "You need to instruct us: what about bringing home the troops, which seems to be the most important issue, and the blame and so forth on all our Republican candidates?" she asked. "What should campaign workers say about Republicans bringing home the troops?"

Mr. Weldon replied, "It's a good question, it's a tough issue," then outlined again his plan to let the generals decide when the Iraqi army is ready, and to dismiss an American brigade as each Iraqi one is ready.

"I don't want Dick Cheney or Don Rumsfeld doing it," he said. "We don't need some armchair politician back in Washington, because they want to run for office, to pick a date out of the air. The generals on the ground decide it's time to bring our troops home in a phased withdrawal, which they are doing, then that's the system we have in place."

"Look, all of us want out of that war," he added. Then he changed the subject to North Korea, saying he was the first congressman to go there, and had just spent the weekend on the phone with the United Nations to try to resolve the nuclear crisis.

The most recent Keystone Poll showed about a quarter of registered Republicans saying they would cross lines to vote for Mr. Sestak. He has attracted a broad coalition; in one evening, he went from a fund-raiser with Howard Dean to a meeting of suburban Republican women.

"People don't see a clear strategy, they don't see why we went in, they don't see how we're going to get out," said Anne St. Clair, a Republican who has voted for Mr. Weldon but is now leading Republicans for Sestak and had invited the women to meet him at her home in Thornton, Pa.

Ms. St. Clair said she and her husband grew disenchanted with their party when they lived abroad in the last several years and watched the nation's reputation deteriorate. "The current administration feels they know what's best for this country and for the rest of the world," she said. "I came home and felt like I didn't recognize my party."

A drab conference room in East Goshen Township exploded into applause as Mr. Sestak said that he was a few points ahead in a recent poll. For an hour, the audience asked questions on North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Pakistan, and how to provide a powerful defense but avoid war.

"I'm not antiwar," he told them. "I am for a strong defense that helps to shape a global environment that moves towards peace and prosperity by having all elements of our power out there — from diplomacy to our economy to the power of our ideals, and our military backing them up. That does not mean going on reckless misadventures like Iraq, to impose ourselves, or to go against where there really wasn't a clear and present danger."

His answers pleased Lowell Young, a retiree who voted for John Kerry in 2004 but said he did not like to think of himself as a Democrat.

"The Democrats are too wishy-washy," Mr. Young said, giving as an example the debate over legislation governing treatment of terrorism suspects, where the Democrats sat back while Republicans negotiated with the White House. "They're afraid to take a stand, they're afraid they're going to be seen as weak on national security. They need a backbone. Joe seems to have it."

Still, national Republicans have reserved about $8 million in television time in Pennsylvania for the last month of the campaign, the bulk of it in this district. And Mr. Madonna, the pollster, said the result would probably be influenced by international events in the next several weeks.

"Democrats have begun to turn their image around, but it just takes something like the London bombings to gin up fears," he said. "There's just enough in the Republican arsenal — to argue that what Clinton did on North Korea was wrong, for instance — to keep voters not entirely comfortable with Democrats on the national security issue."

Endorsement In Louisiana (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

BATON ROUGE, La., Oct. 14 (AP) — The Louisiana Democratic Party on Saturday turned down Representative William J. Jefferson, an eight-term congressman, and endorsed State Representative Karen R. Carter, one of a dozen challengers who emerged after Mr. Jefferson became a target of a federal bribery investigation.

The State Central Committee voted 69 to 53 at a special meeting to decide whom to endorse in Louisiana's open primaries on Nov. 7. This is the first time in recent memory that an incumbent has failed to win the state party's endorsement. All seven of the state's Congressional seats are open.

Mr. Jefferson denies the bribery accusations and has not been charged.

A Kentucky businessman, Vernon L. Jackson, pleaded guilty to charges that he made payments to a consulting firm run by Mr. Jefferson's wife in return for the congressman's help on business deals in Africa.

Hefley Risks GOP Hold On Colorado Seat (WT)

By Valerie Richardson, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 15, 2006

COLORADO SPRINGS -- Republican state Sen. Doug Lamborn's fiercest opponent in the 5th District race isn't his Democratic foe. It's the Republican he's trying to succeed -- 10-term Rep. Joel Hefley.

Mr. Lamborn is running neck and neck with Democrat Jay Fawcett, a veteran and small-business owner, in the ultraconservative district, according to a Denver Post poll released last week.

One of the reasons: Mr. Hefley.

Shortly after Mr. Lamborn won a six-candidate primary on Aug. 8, Mr. Hefley, who is retiring, said he would refuse to endorse the Republican candidate, pointing to what he described as his "sleazy, dishonest campaign."

That stinging rebuke, coming from the highly regarded Mr. Hefley, delivered a devastating blow to Mr. Lamborn's candidacy. Several other prominent Republicans soon joined Mr. Hefley in refusing to endorse Mr. Lamborn, pointing to ads and mailings they say unfairly demonized his Republican foes.

One flier, sent out by the local Christian Coalition, accused fellow Republican Jeff Crank of supporting "the radical homosexual agenda." Radio and television ads produced by the Club for Growth accused Mr. Crank, who was Mr. Lamborn's chief rival for the nomination, of supporting tax increases.

Mr. Lamborn has insisted he had no control over the content of the disputed materials because they were put out by independent political committees, not his campaign.

"Unfortunately, Mr. Hefley is not revealing that the ads he disagreed with were run by third-party groups that I had nothing to do with," Mr. Lamborn said Friday.

Meanwhile, Mr. Fawcett has taken full advantage of the internecine squabble, running newspaper ads last week listing state Republican leaders under the headline, "None of These Republicans Will Endorse Doug Lamborn for Congress."

Mr. Hefley responded Friday with a statement stressing that he would not support Mr. Fawcett, either, but repeating his earlier remarks about Mr. Lamborn.

"I do not endorse liberal Democrats, and I regard Jay Fawcett as a liberal Democrat," he said. "I also do not endorse people who I feel run sleazy, dishonest campaigns, regardless of their political affiliation."

Mr. Lamborn, meanwhile, said nothing about the Hefley comments, instead describing himself repeatedly as a "Ronald Reagan Republican" and stressing the theme, "I am a conservative Republican, and he is a liberal Democrat."

Still, Mr. Hefley's remarks have stuck.

"That one comment, 'sleazy campaign,' is what has defined the Lamborn campaign," Colorado College political science professor Robert Loevy said. "The issue is Lamborn, not the Democrat. If Lamborn is defeated, it will be because of Joel Hefley."

National Democrats have taken notice. Last week, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee raised the race's profile to an "emerging race." At the same time, other Republicans are speaking out in Mr. Lamborn's defense.

"I've known Doug Lamborn for years in the legislature, and I have not found anyone with higher integrity than Doug," said Republican state Sen. Dave Schultheis of Colorado Springs.

Working in Mr. Lamborn's favor is the district's overwhelmingly Republican makeup. The Republicans hold a 2-1 registration edge, and no Democrat has been elected to the seat since its creation in 1972.

But the district is also heavily populated by active and retired military, and Mr. Fawcett has the advantage of being a retired Air Force officer.

Dems Have Clear Shot At DeLay's Seat (AP-Y)

By Joe Stinebaker, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

Voting Republican in this conservative district was never difficult when Tom DeLay's name was on the ballot. With DeLay out of the race and the GOP unable by law to substitute a name on the ballot, voters must write in the Republican candidate,

DOJ_NMG_0081572

Houston City Councilwoman Shelley Sekula-Gibbs. That could prove to be such a chore that Democrats might walk away with a seat that has long been in the GOP's hands.

Cynthia Hart, a straight-ticket Republican and mother of three in suburban Houston, said she was unaware she would have to write in the Republican candidate.

"I guess I have to be more careful," Hart said. "But I'm not so sure I would take the time to go through all that."

That's welcome news to Democrats who see a real chance for capturing the former House majority leader's seat, a gain that could help them wrest control of the House from the GOP. Democrats need to gain 15 seats to seize the majority.

Beyond the math, winning in DeLay's district would be sweet revenge for an opposition party that has suffered the powerful Republican's wrath for nearly a decade. Democrats have a legitimate candidate in Nick Lampson, a former congressman who has outraised, outspent and campaigned longer than the Republicans.

Less than a month to the election, Lampson isn't gloating.

"Certainly, there's the satisfaction of being able to win, and to prove your point, but it was always about the issues," Lampson said. "I obviously felt he (DeLay) was vulnerable or I wouldn't have gotten into it. Some thought that I was nuts, but I guess when you believe strongly enough that something needs to change, you're willing to do extraordinary things to do it."

DeLay resigned from Congress in June amid a series of investigations of his fundraising activities. The courts refused to allow Republicans to replace him on the ballot, leading him to withdraw from the race and forcing Republicans to turn to Sekula-Gibbs as a write-in candidate.

National Republicans were supposed to invest $3 million to $4 million to help Sekula-Gibbs, according to state Republican chairwoman Tina Benkiser. So far, however, she's received just $134,000 from the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Lampson had $2.2 million to spend as of June 30.

Sekula-Gibbs, 53, insists the national attention surrounding the race and intense media coverage locally have helped her overcome any disadvantages. The dermatologist entered politics after her husband, local television anchorman Sylvan Rodriguez, died of cancer.

"It was essential to me that we maintain a conservative voice in Washington," she said in explaining her decision. "The people of this district are very conservative. They want a conservative voice. And the individual who the Democrats have offered is far from conservative."

Although Lampson gets low marks from conservative groups, he secured the endorsement of the National Rifle Association, a prize among Texas candidates.

Sekula-Gibbs strongly supports the war in Iraq, opposes abortion and favors building a fence and stationing the National Guard at the Mexican border to stop illegal immigration.

Lampson, 61, describes the war in Iraq as "a mess," but he says he opposes withdrawing until the Iraqi army is capable of controlling the country. He favors sending more border agents south but not the military. He also advocates more rigorous prosecution of businesses that knowingly hire illegal immigrants.

Lampson plays down party affiliation in the Republican-leaning district, which President Bush won with 64 percent of the vote in 2004.

"I believe that people want something different from the partisanship that they have been experiencing," he said, noting that he received 60 percent of the vote in his old district, which was 53 percent Republican.

Much of Sekula-Gibbs' time and money has gone toward telling voters who she is and how to vote for her. Vice President Dick Cheney headlined a fundraiser for her earlier this month. The campaign also had been working to bring in House Speaker Dennis Hastert, but it quickly abandoned those plans in the wake of the congressional page scandal.

Advertising may help voters gain familiarity with Sekula-Gibbs' write-in campaign, but some experts predict it won't help enough.

The district uses electronic voting and voters will have to highlight and enter the "write-in" entry. They then turn a small wheel on the voting machine and spell out Sekula-Gibbs' name. Misspellings or other errors will be accepted as votes as long as the voter's intent is clear to members of "resolution committees" made up of Republicans and Democrats in each county.

Helen Square, an independent voter from Houston, said she would write in Sekula-Gibbs because she was familiar with her work on Houston City Council.

"I like to vote for the person," Square said, "and not for the party."

Alvin and Ruth Ziehr, a Pearland couple, said they try to keep up with local politics but acknowledged it's been difficult to stay atop changes in this race. The two knew that "Shelley someone" was mounting a GOP write-in effort and that no Republican would appear on the ballot.

"But that's all right with me," laughed Alvin Ziehr. "I've never voted Republican in my life."

Denver Post, October 14, 2006

John Salazar served in the U.S. Army during the Vietnam era, and is the only veteran in Colorado's congressional delegation. He's a farmer who isn't away from the land long enough to forget its many challenges. When he was elected to Congress two years ago, we wondered whether Salazar would bring this experience to bear.

In his first term representing the sprawling 3rd Congressional District, Salazar gained a seat on the House Veterans Affairs Committee and used the position to push for expanded veterans health care, fairer treatment of military widows and for cracking down on fraudulent claims for military medals.

Salazar also has been active on two other panels well-suited to serve a district that counts farming, ranching and tourism as key industries: Transportation and Infrastructure, and Agriculture. In those roles, he has fought for overdue highway improvements and sought to promote cleaner fossil fuel technologies, along with such renewable energy sources as ethanol.

Salazar's freshman performance and keen interest in 3rd District issues has earned him re-election.

By Democratic standards, Salazar is cut from conservative cloth, as evidenced by his vote to repeat the estate tax and the fact that he has the support of the National Rifle Association. That may account for the fact that the GOP has invested little in the 3rd though registered Republicans outnumber Democrats by about 20,000 voters.

Republican candidate Scott Tipton, owner of the Mesa Verde Trading Co., is an engaging rival and longtime GOP activist. Tipton's been crisscrossing the district in a high-mileage pickup, and we like his spunk and his willingness to provide an alternative.

Tipton sounds the standard-issue Republican calls to rein in a federal bureaucracy and free-spending Congress, but he has no answer to the fact that Congress has been entirely controlled by his own party for the past six years as the fiscal climate has turned ugly.

Third district voters are more likely to achieve real change by returning the free-thinking incumbent, Salazar, than by sending Tipton to Congress to reinforce the status quo.

Of 53 Races, Only 3 Offer Ray Of Hope To Non-Incumbent Party's Candidates (LAT)

By Tony Perry, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

SAN DIEGO — The congressional election isn't until Nov. 7, but the real decisions may have been made in 2001, the last time district lines were redrawn in California.

Of 53 districts in the state, only three have drawn much interest, two of those because of the ethical problems of the Republican incumbents.

And to call all three competitive could be a stretch.

"In California, we have 20 safe Republican seats and 33 safe Democratic seats" and not much in between, said Gary Jacobson, congressional scholar at UC San Diego.

Still, Democrats are hoping for electoral lighting to strike in the districts that are represented by longtime GOP incumbents John T. Doolittle and Richard W. Pombo and by recycled incumbent Brian Bilbray.

Doolittle (R-Roseville) was associated with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Pombo (R-Tracy) is the bete noire of the environmental movement and took money from Abramoff. Bilbray (R-Carlsbad) took over, after a June special election, the seat once held by Randall "Duke" Cunningham, who is now imprisoned for bribery. He previously served three terms in Congress from another district.

But if lightning is to strike, it will have to defy some daunting numbers from the past.

In four decades, Jacobson said, no Democrat has beaten a Republican in a congressional district in which Republicans held a registration edge of four percentage points or greater.

In Doolittle's district, the pro-GOP margin is 18 percentage points, in Pombo's 6 and in Bilbray's 14.

With those numbers, and their belief that neither the Iraq war nor the Mark Foley page scandal will make Republicans dump their party's candidates, Republican strategists are talking with confidence.

"California is the quietest state in the nation when it comes to congressional races," said Jonathan Collegio, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Democrats, however, think that Pombo is vulnerable because of his position against the Endangered Species Act, among other things.

Busloads of environmental activists from the Bay Area are providing energy to dump the seven-time incumbent in favor of wind-turbine manufacturer Jerry McNerney, the Democrat.

"We see fertile opportunity in the ethical problems of Pombo and Doolittle, the national climate, and the proclivity of the House Republican leadership to look the other way" in the Foley-page scandal, said Kate Bedingfield, a spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

In the district in northern San Diego County once represented by Cunningham, the Democratic Party has listed Francine Busby's as an "emerging race" as she tries to oust Bilbray, who defeated her in a June special election.

Busby, a school board member and women's-studies lecturer, has called on House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Illinois) to resign because of a failure to investigate early signs of impropriety involving ex-Rep. Foley and the pages. She has challenged Bilbray to do the same, but he has refused.

Issues aside, politics is a game of numbers — registration and money — and in both regards incumbents enjoy the advantage.

"Gerrymandering has all but abolished competitiveness in November," said Allan Hoffenblum, a Republican consultant and editor of the nonpartisan Target Book.

So lopsided is the registration that, for example, Democratic incumbents Xavier Becerra, Diane Watson and Maxine Waters of Los Angeles, Lucille Roybal-Allard of East Los Angeles, Juanita Millender-McDonald of Carson and Hilda Solis of El Monte face opposition that is either nonexistent or considered token.

California voters like incumbents, even when they break promises not to become career politicians. Grace F. Napolitano (D-Norwalk) and Ken Calvert (R-Corona) were reelected in 2004 despite breaking term-limit pledges and are running again this year.

Roll Call, the Washingtoninsider newspaper, archly notes that the only chance Republican Peter Hankwitz, a television producer, has of beating Brad Sherman (D-Sherman Oaks) and serving in Congress is if "he stars in a sitcom that takes place on Capitol Hill."

In only one district has the incumbent opted for retirement. Bill Thomas (R-Bakersfield) is retiring; Assembly Minority leader Kevin McCarthy, a former Thomas aide, is favored to replace him. An intra-party fight was avoided in the primary when state Sen. Roy Ashburn of Bakersfield decided not to run.

In many districts, the only real fight was in the primary.

In the 50th District, Bilbray barely nosed out a millionaire investor, Eric Roach, to win the GOP nomination in the April primary to succeed Cunningham.

Roach considered continuing his candidacy but decided against it after a meeting with party leaders. Bilbray beat Busby in the June runoff to win the remaining months of Cunningham's term.

In the 51st District, which covers part of the San Diego border with Mexico and most of the Imperial Valley, Rep. Bob Filner, a Democrat, won a bitter contest with Assemblyman Juan Vargas of San Diego. Filner is now a prohibitive favorite to beat teacher Mike Blake, a Republican, for his eighth term.

"You have to go with form," Jacobson said. "The world can change, of course, but not very often."

The Contrarian State (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

Reliably Democratic California looks more GOP-friendly this year than much of the U.S. In a climate that favors the moderate, Schwarzenegger sets the tone.

By political tradition, California forges its own way. It has affirmed its place in the forefront of reliably Democratic states even as the nation has kept Republicans firmly in control of Congress and the White House.

So now that the national mood has shifted amid the troubles in Iraq, giving Democrats a shot at seizing Congress, it is oddly fitting that 2006 is shaping up as a strong year for Republicans in California.

The Republican governor, Arnold Schwarzenegger, is heavily favored for reelection Nov. 7 over his Democratic challenger, state Treasurer Phil Angelides. Several other Republicans seeking statewide office are mounting surprisingly competitive races against Democratic rivals, though the outcomes are far from sure. And billions of dollars in bonds and taxes on the ballot face tough prospects, thanks largely to Republican voters' aversion to government growth.

With its nearly 16 million voters spread across more than 163,000 square miles, California is so vast that it creates an election climate of its own. This year, its dominating force is Schwarzenegger, whose comeback from his political collapse last year is driving a potential Republican resurgence in California — or at least what would pass for one in a state so effectively Democratic.

Further isolating California from the national swing toward Democrats is the absence of serious competition in the state's 53 congressional races, but for two U.S. House districts where the reelection of Republicans is somewhat uncertain.

By drawing the state's congressional map to protect incumbents of both major parties, the Legislature has made California immune from "the great churning dissatisfaction with the Republicans on a national level," said Tony Quinn, co-editor of California Target Book, a nonpartisan election guide. "We might as well be out in the Pacific Ocean someplace."

Also marginalizing California's role in the nation's midterm vote is the all-but-guaranteed reelection of Democratic U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein. Her Republican opponent, former state Sen. Richard Mountjoy of Monrovia, has raised too little money — and is too conservative — to pose a credible threat.

As for Schwarzenegger, he has refashioned his political image in a way that separates him more than ever from the social conservatives who lead the national Republican Party. A supporter of gay rights, gun control and legal abortion, he has doggedly chased after support from Democrats and independents this year, as must any California Republican running statewide. (Republicans make up 34% of California voters, Democrats 43%. Another 23% have shunned the major parties but still tend to favor Democrats.)

For the most part, Schwarzenegger has done so by striking deals with Democrats who control the Legislature, signing bills he had long resisted. One of them cuts prescription drug costs. Another caps greenhouse gas emissions to put California in the vanguard of the fight to stop global warming.

Schwarzenegger has also neutralized some of the fervent opposition he faced last year from organized labor by signing a bill to raise the minimum wage and by restoring school money that he had diverted to balance the state budget. In a nod to labor's success in defeating his initiatives last November, Schwarzenegger has also dropped his bellicose rhetoric against "union bosses."

"I wouldn't say that California's going Republican so much as the Republican gubernatorial candidate has put on Democratic colors for the sake of the election," said Jeff Lustig, a political science professor at Cal State Sacramento.

In his reelection ads, Schwarzenegger stresses such typically Democratic issues as schools, healthcare and the environment, along with the touchstone Republican topics of crime and taxes. At the same time, he has joined Democrats in pushing for $37 billion in bonds for vast public construction projects.

The overall mix has enabled Schwarzenegger to cast himself as a centrist in his battle against Angelides, who positioned himself as a liberal in the Democratic primary with a showcase proposal to raise taxes on corporations and the wealthy.

For Angelides, a former developer and state Democratic chairman, the campaign has been disjointed. In the spring primary, he emphasized character, portraying himself as the rare Democrat who had the guts to stand up to Schwarzenegger budget cuts at the peak of the governor's popularity.

Over the summer, he shifted to populist economics: He vowed to fight for middle-class Californians struggling with rising costs of gasoline, healthcare and higher education. To blunt Schwarzenegger's attacks on his history of supporting tax hikes, Angelides also pledged to cut taxes for Californians who make less than $100,000 a year.

Most recently, Angelides has turned to Iraq, saying he would demand the return of California's National Guard troops from the war. The move was part of his effort to depict Schwarzenegger, who has supported the war, as a partisan crony of President Bush, a highly unpopular Republican in California.

The jumble of Angelides approaches reflects his trouble in drawing sharp distinctions with a governor who spent the year racking up bipartisan deals with the Legislature. California may be a Democratic state, but recent history suggests its voters strongly favor moderates regardless of party label.

"Anybody who can dominate the center in this state is going to win," said Gary Jacobson, a UC San Diego political science professor.

Beyond ideology, Schwarzenegger's wide lead in voter surveys also illustrates the potency of a household name, which Angelides lacks. The three Democrats with the strongest statewide poll ratings are also three of the best known: Feinstein, Oakland Mayor and former Gov. Jerry Brown, running for attorney general, and Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer, a candidate for treasurer.

For other races, some Democrats fear Angelides will fail to entice a strong turnout of his own party's voters, helping Republicans. Among the Republicans running close to their rivals were Thousand Oaks state Sen. Tom McClintock for lieutenant governor, Secretary of State Bruce McPherson, who is seeking reelection, Silicon Valley tycoon Steve Poizner for insurance commissioner and former Moorpark Assemblyman Tony Strickland for controller.

Normally, Democrats would hold the edge in all those races, but each Republican has unique advantages. McClintock, facing Insurance Commissioner John Garamendi, is well known from his previous runs for governor and controller. McPherson, named to his job by Schwarzenegger to replace a Democrat who resigned, has the perks of incumbency for his race against state Sen. Debra Bowen of Marina del Rey. And Poizner is dipping into his personal fortune for his contest against Lt. Gov. Cruz Bustamante, whose fundraising practices turned off many voters in his run for governor in the 2003 recall.

Also on the ballot are 13 propositions. Their common theme is money: They call for $46 billion in spending on highways, schools, levees and much more. The state would raise taxes, mainly on oil and tobacco, by more than $3 billion a year. The full package of ballot measures would add $84 billion in debt, including interest, to state budgets over the next 30 years.

Together, the proposals will test whether California's voters stick to the fiscal restraint they established when the state was more amenable to Republicans or embrace an expansive government agenda that buttresses its more recent standing as a Democratic stronghold.

"We could have a complete repudiation of taxes or the most massive public works spending projects we've ever seen in California," said Thad Kousser, an assistant professor of political science at UC San Diego.

"So the stakes are really quite high."

How California Helps Protect GOP Power (LAT)

By Tony Quinn, Tony Quinn Is A Former Consultant To Legislative Republicans On Redistricting And Was An Expert Witn

Gerrymandered districts almost ensure no state Republicans will lose their seats even in the worst of times.

WITH THE Mark Foley sex scandal dropping on congressional Republicans like a brick on a teacup, bipartisan decisions made five years ago to gerrymander congressional district lines in California and other states may be all that's left to save the GOP from losing control of Congress.

When the California Legislature redrew the state's political lines in 2001, the priority of both Democrats and Republicans was to put a lock on their respective districts.

Four GOP incumbent congressmen had lost in the 2000 election, and the party, fearful of losing even more in increasingly blue California, was desperate to hold on to its 20 seats in the House. Republicans offered Democrats a deal: Give us 20 safe seats in the redistricting plan, and you can do anything you want with the remaining 33.

Districts must be equally populated. But in a bipartisan gerrymander, other factors — protecting racial minorities, ensuring compact districts — can be easily ignored, as they were in the 2001 redistricting. Job security was uppermost in the minds of the Democratic and Republican mapmakers.

Rep. Howard L. Berman, for example, wanted to dilute the number of Latinos in his San Fernando Valley district to avoid a Latino primary challenger, and he got what he wanted. The whole deal was cemented in a meeting between Democrats and White House political guru Karl Rove.

Among the big losers was Rep. Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco, the House minority leader.

The gerrymandered lines in California amount to a Republican firewall against losses even in the worst of times, and for the GOP, these are the worst of times. The national political environment could hardly be more favorable for Democrats. Pelosi's party needs to win only 15 GOP-held districts and she would become the first Californian and first woman to be speaker of the House.

But the gerrymandering of congressional districts in California and other states is so extreme that Democrats are having trouble finding enough targets to win control of the chamber. Some analysts think that Democratic chances of winning the Senate are better because candidates run statewide.

The bible for House races is the Rothenberg Political Report, published by Stuart Rothenberg, which tracks the 435 House districts. The report lists only 41 "highly competitive" districts this fall throughout the country, 37 of which are held by Republicans. None of them are in California.

In general, the number of competitive House seats in the sixth year of an incumbent administration is much higher. President Bush is far less popular than in 2004, so one would expect him to be a drag on Republican incumbents. In 1994, the unpopular Clinton administration was the main reason that Democrats lost 52 House seats, including three in California.

But the 20-seat deal crafted by state Republicans in 2001 was part of a broader gerrymandering effort to ensure that their party would be the majority in the House even in a terrible political year. The icing on the cake was the 2003 Texas redistricting engineered by former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. He turned a previous Democratic gerrymander into one that produced six additional GOP congressmen from Texas in 2004. That followed earlier GOP-directed gerrymandering in such states as Michigan and Pennsylvania.

Republicans, thinking strategically, combined these and other safe seats with the 20 in California to produce their majority. Congressional Democrats, by contrast, seemed more interested in protecting individual incumbents, which undercut their chances of winning nationally.

One of only two mildly competitive congressional districts in California is the 11th in the Stockton area, held by Rep. Richard W. Pombo, the controversial Republican chairman of the House Resources Committee, whom Democrats and environmentalists accuse of trying to dismantle the Endangered Species Act.

In 2003, Stockton residents sued, claiming that Pombo's district violated a California constitutional provision requiring that districts should respect city and county boundaries and be geographically compact. California's congressional Democrats and both parties in the Legislature spent a nice hunk of taxpayer dollars defending their handiwork, and Pombo's district survived.

In 2005, Democrats successfully fought to defeat Proposition 77, which would have provided for an immediate redrawing of legislative and congressional districts, despite the fact that their efforts were propping up a number of otherwise vulnerable GOP incumbents, among them Pombo.

Pelosi and other Democrats think they can defeat Pombo in November, and perhaps they will if a huge Democratic wave builds. But they certainly have made his reelection easier by giving him a highly gerrymandered district.

Without the gerrymandered districts, Democrats would certainly make some gains in the state.

So, if Pelosi comes up short of the 15 seats needed to make her the next House speaker, she'll know where to place the blame. She can just look in the mirror.

It's Back To Politics As Usual, More Or Less (LAT)

By Robert Salladay, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

Compared to the recall and last year's special election, this choice is more traditional, except for Schwarzenegger's enduring celebrity.

SACRAMENTO — If the historic recall election three years ago upended California politics, the race between Democrat Phil Angelides and Republican Arnold Schwarzenegger in 2006 has returned the political system to its regularly scheduled programming.

Between state Treasurer Angelides and the incumbent Gov. Schwarzenegger, there is little talk about sweeping away special interests or transforming the political system as we know it.

Instead, potential voters have been given a choice between established politicians from the two major parties, each with traditional corporate or union backers, each with slightly different but relatively mainstream views on public policy.

Still, an unusual and important factor hangs over the campaign, and brings a benefit to the incumbent: Schwarzenegger's status as a worldwide celebrity.

"That celebrity has consistently brought out more media coverage, more cameras, than anything I have seen at an Angelides event," said Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a USC professor and expert on California politics. "It must be terribly frustrating for Angelides."

Few jobs in the United States are as powerful as California governor. Only the president and the Chicago mayor make more political appointments. The Legislature sends more than 1,000 bills to the governor every year. The vast state bureaucracy regulates nearly every aspect of California life. It provides healthcare and educates millions.

When voters choose the next person for that powerful job, their choice will look much like offerings from the past: a liberal Democrat against a centrist Republican. When Angelides and Schwarzenegger differ, there are few surprises.

That's the case on many issues — for example, on immigration, one of the most important to voters, according to recent polls.

Angelides and Schwarzenegger agree that illegal immigrants should be "put on a path to citizenship," but only after paying a fine and back taxes, learning English and getting in line behind people who are attempting to become citizens legally. Both have called for a more civil debate on the explosive issue.

The two men's biggest difference concerns the California National Guard. Angelides says he would not use federalized state troops to police the U.S.-Mexico border. Schwarzenegger sent more than 1,000 troops to the border on a limited deployment at the request of President Bush to back up federal border agents, but rejected a later Bush administration call for more.

Even the supposedly sharp contrast between Angelides and Schwarzenegger on the subject of raising taxes is fuzzier than both sides admit.

Yes, Angelides wants to raise taxes — on California's wealthiest couples, while offering tax cuts to the middle class. Schwarzenegger would have voters believe that Angelides is salivating over $18 billion in planned tax increases in the event that he gets into office, a figure that is clearly wrong.

Yes, Schwarzenegger is holding firm against tax increases, a politically popular position. But he's hardly a fiscal conservative. He has presided over a 26% increase in state government spending, and approved higher fees and tuition at California's public colleges — which some call a tax by another name.

He also proposed $68 billion in borrowing to shore up the state's faltering infrastructure system. The Legislature sliced that approximately in half, putting $37 billion in bonds on next month's ballot for voters to approve.

Angelides, with the help of his union supporters and a traditional Democratic message, survived the June primary by defeating state Controller Steve Westly.

But the bitter race left his campaign nearly broke, and battered by the impression that he had polluted Lake Tahoe or was beholden to developers.

Schwarzenegger, who had no Republican primary opponent, immediately fired up his campaign. The day after the primary, he launched ads against Angelides alleging that the treasurer would take California backward. And he hammered the tax issue so much that the treasurer had a hard time recovering. Since early summer, Angelides has lagged well behind Schwarzenegger in the polls.

"I can tell by the joy I see in your eyes that you love to raise taxes," the governor said to Angelides during their recent debate in Sacramento, the only one scheduled between the two. "Why don't you just say right now, 'I love increasing your taxes.' "

Incumbent governors come with considerable political advantages, not the least of which is the veto pen. Schwarzenegger has used his office, and the power of the veto threat, to negotiate big legislative deals with the Democrats who control the Legislature. One example was a bill to curb California's contribution to global warming, putting the state at the forefront of a global issue.

The bipartisan efforts have gone a long way for Schwarzenegger, according to the polls, to assure voters that he has abandoned the confrontational tone of his disastrous 2005 special election.

Many of Angelides' strongest supporters have appeared on stages with the governor — political symbolism he dearly needed after the bruising special election.

But Schwarzenegger's political transformation also has provided a contrast for Angelides to exploit. He has been hammering the governor for supporting Bush during a critical time in the president's 2004 reelection campaign, suggesting that the Republican governor is far more conservative than he lets on.

"The fact is, when you speak like this you sound just like Newt Gingrich," Angelides told Schwarzenegger at the debate.

"You sound like Speaker Hastert. You sound like George Bush attacking me on taxes."

Angelides says voters will turn on the governor over the issue of trust, a word he used multiple times when the two candidates debated in Sacramento.

On the campaign trail, he notes repeatedly that the governor has had multiple political personas since being elected in 2003.

The challenger's central question has been: Which governor can we expect? The reformer of 2004, the conservative of 2005 or the centrist of 2006?

Whichever candidate you believe, the race has put California a long way from the turbulent recall days, and handed voters something familiar: politics as usual.

Schwarzenegger For Governor (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

The governor has learned how to work with the Legislature and chart a moderate course for California.

AFTER HIS HISTORIC ELECTION in the 2003 recall, followed by some early promise and a disappointing sophomore year, Arnold Schwarzenegger has been a solid, pragmatic governor who has steered a moderate course for California. He deserves a sequel.

In the last year, the Republican has formed relationships with legislative leaders that focused the usually fractious and often obstructive Democrats on a productive agenda. Together, they have given Californians a historic law to combat global warming, a prescription drug plan and a reasonable increase in the minimum wage. If he is reelected, the governor says, "we're going to continue in a bipartisan way."

That's encouraging — and there's reason to believe it's not simply a sound bite. The governor says he now realizes he made a mistake last year in trying to strong-arm the Legislature and browbeat the voters with his ill-advised and ill-fated special election. And a look at his track record suggests that Schwarzenegger is more comfortable the closer he is to California's center of political gravity.

In fact, he may embody it. On the environment, on stem cell research and on reproductive choice, he has distinguished himself from the Bush administration and other conservatives on the national scene. He respects the still-thriving spirit of the state's taxpayer revolt yet also understands California's heritage of building for the future.

His priorities for the next term, Schwarzenegger says, include reforming the state's dysfunctional prisons and another try at fixing California's jury-rigged redistricting system. His previous attempts to address both problems failed miserably. Paradoxically, however, he may be in a better position to address these issues — and others, such as the state's structural budget deficit — because he is a Republican. A little partisanship can be healthy in Sacramento, if it serves as a check on the excesses of the legislative or executive branch. And Schwarzenegger and the Democrats in the Legislature now better understand how they give each other political cover.

No such dynamic would exist if Schwarzenegger's opponent, Democratic state Treasurer Phil Angelides, were elected. Some of his criticisms of the governor are valid; Angelides is correct to note that Schwarzenegger is too hazy about how he plans to close the state's perpetual budget shortfall. To the extent that the challenger is more candid, however, his prescription of raising some personal income and corporate taxes is the wrong one.

Schwarzenegger correctly senses that a leader with good instincts and confidence is more effective — and more inspiring — than one with a good plan and a lot of details. Angelides may be more specific about many of California's problems. But Schwarzenegger is more likely to solve them. The Times endorses Arnold Schwarzenegger for governor.

LOS ANGELES

I FEEL utterly confident that Michael R. Bloomberg would never be caught dead in the alligator-skin loafers attached to the feet of Arnold Schwarzenegger, which the governor of California had just plopped atop a table in the presidential suite of a four-star hotel in Newport Beach.

Even so, over the next 20 minutes of that recent interview, I could not help feeling that I was covering the mayor of New York all over again, albeit a taller, tanner, somewhat less comprehensible rendering.

I was the City Hall bureau chief for this newspaper for most of Mr. Bloomberg's first term, and now, here in Los Angeles, I find myself with a sense of déjà vu covering Mr. Schwarzenegger, the other popular, blue-state Republican.

Sometimes, I feel amused. Other times, slightly cursed. (Do I really have to listen to another speech by the man who proclaims to embody the American dream?) But I often find myself amazed that the middle-aged Jewish guy with the Boston twang I covered two years ago is so similar to the Austrian-born muscle man 3,000 miles west.

Both men are moderate centrists, estranged from their party's mainstream, who first ran for office on what seemed like a lark. After making a slew of goofy comments and odd policy pronouncements, they both found themselves, shockingly, in their first political jobs.

Both watched their popularity sink mid-term to embarrassing levels. Mr. Bloomberg came back to beat handily — and greatly outspend — a Democratic machine politician whose attempts to claw away at the mayor and paint him as the president's buddy flopped.

Mr. Schwarzenegger's re-election bid does not end until next month, but his campaign has uncannily mirrored Mr. Bloomberg's 2005 race. Like the mayor, he distanced himself from his party, cut deals with lawmakers, and outspent his opponent while also more or less ignoring him. The outcome, polls show, is likely to be the same.

Each had two careers that made him buckets of money before settling into a $1-a-year job as a high-profile public servant, their old lives informing how they govern.

Mr. Bloomberg — former Wall Street trader and entrepreneur — literally tore down the walls at City Hall and replaced them with glass, to emulate the financial information company he founded. Mr. Schwarzenegger — one-time body builder and movie star — explained his tax policy by walking me through the budget of "Terminator 3."

Each man is tolerant, though far from politically correct. The world has watched each squirm when off-the-record comments became public. Each can be snappish with his staff (random tip: don't ever serve the governor cold eggs, or come unprepared to meet with the mayor) but endlessly cheerful and optimistic in public.

Both remain fond of creature comforts.

The same week I met with the governor, I walked into the Beverly Wilshire Hotel, where Mr. Bloomberg was staying, and what seemed like half his senior staff had taken a breakfast table there. Preferred mode of transport for both? Private plane.

And they like each other. Mr. Bloomberg is hosting a fund-raiser for the governor in his home on Monday; the mayor's recent visit here to promote environmental legislation was like one big buddy movie. During one news conference, Mr. Schwarzenegger announced that the mayor was, "My soul mate. He's the man."

It is not terribly surprising that the re-election campaigns of Mr. Bloomberg and Mr. Schwarzenegger are so similar. The week after Mr. Bloomberg won reelection last year, Maria Shriver, Mr. Schwarzenegger's wife, called Kevin Sheekey, Mr. Bloomberg's campaign manager, and said that she wanted her husband's re-election campaign to be just like the mayor's.

Further, Mr. Bloomberg and Mr. Schwarzenegger are both products of the areas they represent. New York and California voters tolerate Republicans as long as they give them some tax relief and seem to keep jobs in the area, yet keep their social politics firmly rooted to the left and legislate effectively across party lines.

Mr. Bloomberg, who is sometimes mentioned as a 2008 presidential candidate, and Mr. Schwarzenegger, who by law cannot be, both see themselves as the answer to gridlock. "Perhaps fame and money sets them free to set their own course," said Bruce E. Cain, director of the Institute of Governmental Studies at the University of California, Berkeley. "Maybe plutocracy is the answer to our partisan problems."

Together, they promote causes (like environmental programs), raise cash (for the governor) and offer moral support in a political arena with few natural allies. "The Republican Party does not really meet either of their needs," said Louis DeSipio, a professor of political science at the University of California, Irvine. "They learn from each other's mistakes."

And while Mr. Schwarzenegger's vice is cigars (something I shall never partake in with him) and Mr. Bloomberg's is popcorn (something I appreciated when visiting his office, though it often needed more salt), they seem to simply like hanging out. "I can tell you," Mr. Sheekey said, "in California they had a riotous time together."

Ehrlich, O'Malley Swap Scorn In TV Debates (WP)

By John Wagner And Matthew Mosk, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

Baltimore Crime and Schools Dominate in Back-to-Back Exchanges

Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley traded scathing assessments of each other's records yesterday during a pair of debates in which they did little to hide their mutual disdain.

Ehrlich (R) accused his Democratic rival of neglecting Baltimore's low-performing schools, of wrongfully arresting thousands of its citizens and of practicing a "leadership style of whining and blaming others for your failures."

O'Malley argued that there are "two Bob Ehrlichs," one who, during an election year, touts tax cuts, investments in education and a commitment to the environment, and another whose record of governing is starkly different.

"We can do better, but we need a governor who is on the side of working families," O'Malley said during the first of two debates, which was taped yesterday afternoon for broadcast tomorrow night on Maryland Public Television and WJZ (channel 13) in Baltimore.

In an unusual arrangement, the gubernatorial candidates engaged in a second debate that aired live last night on statewide public television and on WBAL (channel 11) -- the candidates described the two as though they were two halves of a sporting contest.

The set of televised debates came amid a bruising contest between two of Maryland's best-known politicians that until yesterday had played out largely through television advertising, much of it negative and in the expansive Baltimore media market. For months now, the governor has succeeded in keeping the campaign focused largely on Baltimore crime and education, two topics he had identified as weaknesses for an opponent who has overseen one of the nation's largest cities for seven years. But it is unclear whether his message is working with statewide voters -- O'Malley has consistently led in independent polls.

Yesterday, those two themes resurfaced for long stretches as the two men sparred. But O'Malley managed to weave a third theme through both debates -- the notion of "two Bob Ehrlichs." That allowed him to address a range of claims Ehrlich has made during the campaign, such as his assertion that he supported state-funded stem cell research or backed large increases for higher education, moves he only made in the final year of his term.

After the debates had concluded, Ehrlich tried to head off the new line of attack, saying that there are two Bob Ehrlichs -- "the 60th governor of Maryland and the 61st."

Both men sought to spotlight their accomplishments, with Ehrlich, Maryland's first GOP governor in a generation, saying that his administration had "taken Annapolis by storm" after having been sent there to stop the "worst instincts" of the Democrat-led legislature.

"I believe by any measure, Maryland is better today than it was four years ago," Ehrlich said, citing higher statewide school test scores, new transportation projects and a thriving economy.

O'Malley cited improvements in test scores in Baltimore, particularly among younger students, as well as reductions in violent crime and homicides -- progress that, he said, Ehrlich has sought to belittle for political gain.

In both debates, the two men sat behind desks stacked with their notes and papers, and exchanged comments in loosely structured hour-long encounters.

As often occurs with his more casual style, the governor's answers were peppered with acronyms and references to programs, such as his "wraparound" social services approach that would probably have befuddled all but the most devoted state government junkies.

O'Malley tried for a loftier tone, at one point calling for a "new line" in Maryland, a reference to Maryland's nickname as the "Old Line State." Ehrlich presented a more common-man persona, twice telling the mayor after he finished an answer, "I don't know what all that means."

The most pointed exchange came in the afternoon debate over the way the two candidates view Baltimore and the significant aid that the state provides for social programs there.

"I pay for you," Ehrlich said, looking straight at O'Malley. "Without us, you are done."

Reading from a document, Ehrlich then ticked off annual state investments in Baltimore schools, transportation, social services and community colleges. "You get the drift here," Ehrlich said.

O'Malley shot back that Ehrlich was practicing "the politics of division and fear."

"I just wanted to remind you that the citizens of the City of Baltimore are also citizens of our state and that we're all in this together," O'Malley said. "Frankly, governor, the biggest philosophical difference between you and me is that I do believe that we're all in this together, and you believe this is a world of us and them."

The evening debate was calmer than the afternoon one and more focused on the issues, with the first 21 minutes devoted to education.

Ehrlich focused on the worst-performing of Baltimore's schools, saying the mayor "wants to claim success, wants to pretend that these schools are in good shape." O'Malley responded by putting emphasis on the city's highest-performing schools and accusing the governor of "promoting stereotypes" by concentrating on the failures in a small segment of inner-city classrooms.

The two also explored the issues of crime, the recent utility rate increases and the state's budget outlook, and, in the end, leadership styles. The governor repeated his assertion that O'Malley's style is to "blame everyone." The mayor said of Ehrlich: "Good at potshots; bad at taking responsibility."

At the outset of the first debate, O'Malley sought to inoculate himself against attacks on schools and crime that have dominated Ehrlich's television ads, warning the audience that they were coming.

O'Malley later tried to shift the focus of the debate by noting that about 40 percent of those arrested for murder in Baltimore this year were under the supervision of a state-run parole system overseen by the Ehrlich administration. He also spoke of problems in the state's juvenile justice system, which Ehrlich had pledged to fix during his 2002 campaign.

O'Malley's greatest wound on the issue of the city's homicide count, however, may have been self-inflicted. In a discussion about crime, he said mistakenly that the murder count in Baltimore had dropped below 200 for several years running. Last year, the count stood at 269.

Aides said that O'Malley clearly meant to say the count had dropped below 300, a figure that was exceeded every year in the decade before O'Malley was elected in 1999.

An Ehrlich news release issued after the debate, however, said O'Malley had "deliberately misled the citizens of Maryland."

O'Malley adviser Steve Kearney said the mayor "misspoke," and Kearney pointed out that during the WJZ debate Ehrlich mistakenly claimed not to have raised taxes during his term. "If they want to play that game, we can."

While sales and income taxes have not increased during Ehrlich's term -- a distinction the governor often makes -- he did agree to raise property taxes, as well as raising fees on vehicle registration and sewer service -- increases O'Malley hammered him on during the debates.

More broadly, O'Malley sought to portray Ehrlich as more interested in promoting corporate interests than protecting working families. O'Malley said that Ehrlich-appointed utility regulators had "rubber-stamped" a major rate increase this year by the state's largest electricity provider. And he chided Ehrlich for allowing college tuition to rise by 40 percent at some campuses.

Ehrlich countered that O'Malley was engaging in "classic class warfare."

Ehrlich also was critical of the Baltimore police policy of stepped-up enforcement for offenses such as loitering. Police say the strategy helps deter violent crime, but critics have decried the large number of people who are arrested for such offenses but who are never charged with a crime.

Ehrlich said O'Malley's "mass arrests" have alienated citizens and demoralized the police force.

O'Malley seemed to grow increasingly impatient with Ehrlich's focus on Baltimore issues, reminding him at one point: "This is a race for governor, governor. This is not a race for Baltimore City Council."

Schools, Crime Are Debatable (WT)

By S.a. Miller, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 15, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley clashed yesterday in two debates that frequently dwelled on the city's crime problems and poorly performing schools, despite the mayor's attempts to shift the focus to the governor.

"We have made tremendous progress in our city in recent years," said Mr. O'Malley, the Democratic nominee for governor. "But we can all make more progress if we had a governor that practiced the politics of bringing people together instead of the politics of division."

He promised to practice "the politics of hope and the politics of dreams and the politics that say we are all in this together."

Mr. Ehrlich, a Republican seeking re-election, responded: "I don't know what all that means."

"That's the leadership style of whining and blaming others for your failures," continued Mr. Ehrlich, pointing to the mayor's past criticism of Baltimore State's Attorney Patricia C. Jessamy, the City Council and President Bush for impeding the city.

Mr. O'Malley has also blamed the city's crime problems on a "revolving door" at the state's prisons. "The problem that every jurisdiction in our state faces is not a lack of courage by our local police," he said. "Governor, if you want to do something about the dangerous position that our officers are put in, why don't you do something about your broken parole and probation system?"

The moderator at the debate, which was videotaped at WJZ-TV (Channel 13) in Baltimore, did not allow Mr. Ehrlich to respond. The debate will be aired Monday at 7 p.m. by the station and statewide by Maryland Public Television.

Mr. Ehrlich did get to respond during the next debate, which was aired live last night by Maryland Public Television and WBAL-TV (Channel 11) in Baltimore and in many ways duplicated the first encounter.

"Talk about revolving doors," Mr. Ehrlich said. The mayor has had "seven police commissioners in seven years. ... Not a whole lot of people are lining up to take criminal justice advice from you, Mr. Mayor."

The candidates' disdain for each other was evident at both debates, which likely were their last face-to-face confrontations before the Nov. 7 election.

Mr. Ehrlich has said he does not want to debate after mid-October so that he can concentrate on campaigning. Their two previous debates were not televised.

Within hours of the first debate's conclusion, both candidates claimed victory.

The Ehrlich campaign said the governor "convincingly demonstrated that Maryland is better off today than it was four years ago."

The O'Malley campaign said the mayor won by "showcasing new ideas for progress for Maryland's hardworking families."

In both debates, Mr. O'Malley frequently accused the governor of "selling out" working-class families to the profit of "powerful and wealthy special interests."

Mr. Ehrlich called the charges "classic class warfare" and repeatedly dismissed the mayor as a political opportunist who distorts the facts, shifts the blame and makes politically expedient decisions.

"Get the facts right," he told Mr. O'Malley. "Nobody is buying your drive-by attacks."

Mr. Ehrlich touted his record in the debates, noting reforms to the state's troubled juvenile-justice and prison systems.

He also reminded voters that he inherited a $2 billion budget deficit and turned it into a $2 billion budget surplus, all the while spending more on public schools and blocking Democratic lawmakers' attempts to increase state income taxes or sales taxes.

"We were agents of change," Mr. Ehrlich said. "We were given a mandate by the people of Maryland to effectuate change in Annapolis. Maryland is in far better shape today than it was four years ago."

Baltimore's education and crime problems have put Mr. O'Malley's campaign on the defensive, but the mayor continues to lead Mr. Ehrlich in most polls.

Mr. O'Malley says there has been a 40 percent reduction in violent crime in Baltimore since he took office in 1999, but the crime statistics are questionable and the city's homicide rate remains among the highest in the country.

He also points to rising test scores in the public elementary schools. Mr. Ehrlich cites the high dropout rate and 11 middle and high schools that have recorded failing test scores for nine consecutive years.

The candidates also sparred over taxes, the environment, transportation and energy policies.

On nearly every issue, Mr. O'Malley said the governor sided with special interests, including insurance companies on health care and power companies on energy prices.

Mr. O'Malley faulted the governor for increasing taxes, including state property taxes, higher tuition at state universities and a "flush tax" for environmental improvements to wastewater treatment plants.

Mr. Ehrlich defended his tax record, saying he pulled the state out of a deficit without increasing taxes and targeted fees to pay for major road projects and to clean up the Chesapeake Bay.

He pointed out that Mr. O'Malley raised the city's income, property and energy taxes. "Your record is clear," he told the mayor.

"There is no reason for a general tax increase at any time in the immediate or intermediate future," Mr. Ehrlich said, repeating his pledge from four years ago.

Mr. O'Malley said he agreed that a tax increase was not needed, but also said the state's structural deficit persists while the city budget is truly balanced.

"The difference in our budgets is, I pay for you," Mr. Ehrlich said. "Without us, you are done."

He pointed out the state pays for the majority of the city's transportation, social services and education budgets.

Still, attention remains focused on Baltimore's troubles with schools and crime.

The public schools issue re-emerged last week with four days of violent incidents, including a 14-year-old boy being shot in the back Friday at a football game at Frederick Douglass High School.

The violence started Monday when about 100 students from Digital Harbor High School gathered near the school to watch a fistfight between two 15-year-old girls and some of the spectators smashed car windshields.

At Pimlico Middle School, a 14-year-old girl was hospitalized Wednesday after a 13-year-old student stabbed her in the arm with a kitchen knife. That same day, students were locked down at Holabird Elementary School for more than four hours after a shooting nearby.

An 8-year-old boy brought a .22-caliber handgun Thursday to Grove Park Elementary School, and police say another 8-year-old boy accidentally fired the weapon. No one was injured.

Party Games (WP)

HOW COME, when Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) expresses no confidence in state election officials and urges voters to use absentee ballots, Democrats squawk about a conspiracy to suppress the vote, but when Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) says the same thing, there is silence? Given the importance of voting, playing politics in this way isn't forgivable.

Voting problems that Maryland experienced on primary day in September remain a real cause for concern. In Montgomery local election officials inexplicably forgot to deliver the computer cards needed to power the voting machines. Poorly trained workers and no-show judges caused problems in Baltimore City and Prince George's County. Glitches with the electronic poll books used to sign in voters cropped up across the state. Unfortunately, these legitimate issues have become blurred by assertions -- so far unfounded -- that there are problems with the reliability of the electronic voting machines. While we think that a paper trail for electronic voting is a prudent idea, the primary day voting breakdowns did not involve the voting machines, which worked without incident.

It is important that the state's political leaders not add to the confusion with suggestions that paper is the only safe way to vote. Instead of sowing unease that could well give pause to prospective voters, Mr. Ehrlich and Mr. Duncan should be focusing on the constructive steps that they are taking to try to ensure a smooth election. Mr. Ehrlich, for instance, deserves praise for his efforts to recruit state employees to work the polls by offering them administrative leave. Similarly, Mr. Duncan has made it possible for county technical experts to help election officials. There have been other encouraging signs such as the Maryland State Bar Association leading a drive to get its members to volunteer.

No doubt, the attention paid to the voting problems has put state and local election officials on notice as to exactly what is at stake on Nov. 7. And their jobs are the least of it.

With Eye On 2008, Kerry Goes After Bush (WP)

By Dan Balz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. -- Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) barely said hello to the New Hampshire Democrats who filled a banquet room here Friday night before unloading on President Bush.

"This war in Iraq is a disgrace," he said in the second sentence of his speech at a party fundraising dinner.

Thirty-two minutes and 14 standing ovations later, the man who lost the 2004 presidential campaign left little doubt that if he runs again in 2008, he intends to be the chief prosecutor of the record of the Bush presidency.

"A lie, a lie, a lie and a lie," he said after recounting Republican claims that Iraq is not in a civil war, that North Korea's nuclear advancement is former president Bill Clinton's fault and that Democrats were behind the release of salacious e-mails that Mark Foley sent to former House pages.

It was as if the Kerry of 2006 was channeling the Howard Dean of 2003. "What we have in Washington is a house of lies, and in November, we need to clean house," he said.

Kerry spoke to an audience that included many of the activists who helped propel him to the nomination two years ago. But after Bush's victory, many of them are decidedly cooler to a Kerry presidential campaign in 2008.

The University of New Hampshire released a survey Thursday of presidential preferences in the Granite State. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) led the field of Democrats with 30 percent, followed by former senator John Edwards (N.C.) at 16 percent and former vice president Al Gore at 10 percent. Kerry ranked fourth with 9 percent.

None of this seems to discourage the Massachusetts senator. He said he has been getting a far different sense from conversations with Democrats during his travels this fall. "I'm very encouraged," he said in an interview a few hours before his speech. "I know what the conventional wisdom is, and it's had a good record of being wrong."

Kerry believes he was defeated in 2004 in large part because of what he calls two lies from his opponents: one about the way America went to war in 2003, the other far more personal -- the Swift Boat veterans' attacks that challenged his Vietnam War record, crippling his campaign in August 2004.

Democrats still fault Kerry for failing to fight back against those charges, and he says he regrets that he was not more aggressive. "We thought the truth was understood," he said. "We should have done more." But, Kerry added: "I don't think that should disqualify you from being president of the United States, necessarily."

What is disqualifying, he believes, is the Bush administration's Iraq strategy. "This war is utterly disastrous," he said. "It's without parallel in modern American foreign policy history in the incompetence and in the lack of effort to bring elders of both parties together and create an atmosphere of solving it. And I am incensed that young Americans are losing their lives because these guys are arrogant and incompetent."

Those kinds of comments have drawn instant rebukes from critics in the Republican Party, and even Democrats have been reluctant to follow Kerry's recommendations for changing policy by setting a timetable for withdrawing U.S. forces. He predicts that more of his colleagues in the Senate will move his way after the midterm elections.

Kerry said those who have encouraged him to run again believe he can be a viable candidate. "Are there enough people who believe that?" he asked. "Can we put that together? Have I learned the lessons of getting kicked on my butt and dusted up, and can I bring a better experience to the table? I think I've learned a lot of lessons. The question is, can you convey that to people? I don't know. Those are the imponderables."

Bill Clinton Rallies Activists In Iowa (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

Filed at 11:00 p.m. ET

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) -- Former President Bill Clinton said Saturday that voters "know something is wrong" in Washington and urged Democrats to create change in the November elections.

"I have never seen the American people so serious," said Clinton. "I think I know why. People know things are out of whack. The rhythm of our public life and our common life in America has been disturbed."

The former president was the keynote speaker at the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner, the Iowa Democratic Party's biggest annual fundraising event. He drew more than 3,500 activists.

There is speculation that Clinton's wife, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, may seek the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008. She has not been in Iowa during this election cycle, even though other candidates have already begun campaigning in the state that will open the presidential nominating season.

Bill Clinton joked about the speculation. "I am under no illusions as to why I'm here," he said. "You were so desperate for a Democrat with any name recognition at all who isn't running for president that you resorted to the chief caseworker to the junior senator from New York."

Clinton urged activists to focus on the midterm election.

"People are sick of partisanship, they are sick of gridlock and they are coming to us in droves," said Clinton. "People know something is wrong and they want to change."

Clinton called the Bush administration and the Republican-led Congress "unprecedentedly unaccountable" and said tax cuts for the rich have led to huge deficits.

DOJ_NMG_0081588

"This is not class warfare," said Clinton. "I've been poor and I've been rich and I like rich better. I want to pay my share. I don't need another vacation home."

Both the White House and Congress are resistant to scrutiny from the outside, he said.

"In Iraq, which is famous for no-bid contracts, $9 billion has gone missing and there has been no serious congressional investigation," said Clinton. "There's never been a more secretive, unaccountable administration."

SOLON, Iowa (AP) -- Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards on Saturday bashed the Bush administration for "proactive stupidity" by sticking with a failed policy in Iraq and being unable to admit its mistakes.

He predicted the Iraq war and a wave of scandals in the Republican-run Congress will prompt voters to demand change in November.

"There is an underlying current that Democrats are in a strong position, for a lot of reasons," Edwards told The Associated Press. "Some of it is the scandals and corruption that people all across the country are seeing in Washington."

Edwards was spending the weekend in eastern Iowa raising money for Democratic legislative candidates.

He finished a surprising second in Iowa's leadoff precinct caucuses in the 2004 presidential election, and that propelled him to a spot on the ticket with eventual nominee John Kerry. Edwards has left little doubt he's interested in again seeking the party's nomination, and he's been among the most active of the potential candidates campaigning in Iowa.

Danny Diaz, a spokesman with the Republican National Committee, said Saturday that Edwards is a "failed presidential candidate and a rejected vice presidential candidate whose political attacks will be no more successful today than they were two years ago."

Edwards diverted from his campaign schedule to speak at a University of Iowa conference on poverty issues. "We should be for the eradication of poverty in America," he said. "In our party, we need to seize the moral high ground."

Bid For President Called A Long Shot (MJS)

By Katherine M. Skiba

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, October 15, 2006

Thompson launches PAC, considers run for White House

Washington - Political analysts say Tommy G. Thompson faces long odds if he tries for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008.

Aides to Thompson, 64, announced last week that he was launching a political action committee, Forward America, and mulling a run for the White House. That comes after discussions with key advisers and a pair of visits to Iowa, whose caucuses kick off the presidential nominating season.

Ahead, aides said, Thompson plans a trip to New Hampshire, which hosts the first primary of 2008.

Thompson was governor of Wisconsin from 1987 to 2001, longer than anyone in history. He was U.S. Health and Human Services chief from 2001 to 2005 during President Bush's first term.

Today he works for a Washington law firm and a major consulting practice and has a hand in a number of business ventures, many in health care.

Why steep odds if he runs for the highest office in the land?

Although the race is wide open - with no vice president waiting in the wings - Thompson is not well-known nationally or among the top-tier of GOP candidates, generally thought to include Sen. John McCain, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

He's also weighing a run rather late in the game. With the Iowa GOP caucuses planned at the start of 2008, Thompson would have to amass tens of millions of dollars in short order to compete there and in subsequent nominating contests in other states.

He flirted this year with a run against either Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle or U.S. Sen. Herb Kohl - then sat out both contests - just as he reiterated his presidential ambitions. He had weighed a campaign for president in 1996 and again in 2000 but didn't pull the trigger.

Aides said the leadership PAC would let him travel the country to back GOP candidates, spread his ideas and shape the party's agenda.

At the same time, the people on "Team Tommy" - as one adviser called key supporters - tout his work on the state, national and international levels and boast that he's got a track record on public policy issues, fire in the belly, a knack for campaigning and a solid reputation in Iowa, where the nominating season kicks off. Plus his family is now behind the effort, they said.

"The presidency would be the one thing that would interest him at this juncture," former Thompson aide Kevin Keane said. "He is as energized as I've seen him about this." Appealing to the public is key

Political scientist Charles O. Jones, emeritus professor at the University of Wisconsin-Madison and senior fellow at The Brookings Institution, said Thompson's fledgling steps make a potential candidacy difficult to assess.

"And since it's a hard thing to evaluate, you have to say it's among the longer of the long shots," Jones said. "There's a whole process to get people to think about you as a presidential candidate, and that's not really gone on."

David T. Canon, a UW political science professor, said Thompson's reputation as a centrist and his record on social policy and education were strengths. Thompson was a pioneer in welfare reform and private school vouchers.

Talking about McCain, Giuliani and Romney, Canon said: "On policy grounds, Thompson can go toe to toe with any of those guys. The question is, can he get his name out there and appeal to the national party people and other people who contribute to Republican Party campaigns?"

"The next couple of months," Canon said, "are critical."

Keane said Thompson is not daunted by the competition.

"He's a (former) Midwestern governor and cabinet secretary with a track record that, frankly, is going to be tough for any leader to match," he said. "What separates Governor Thompson from the field is turning ideas into workable solutions."

Keane now is senior vice president for communications for the American Beverage Association.

Thompson could not be reached for comment.

At the University of Virginia, political scientist Larry Sabato expects Thompson would have to raise $20 million to $30 million to be taken seriously as a candidate.

"He's a god in Wisconsin, but outside Wisconsin he's not that well-known," Sabato said. "It's tough to take a presidential bid seriously, but he may prove us all wrong."

A recent survey of likely Wisconsin voters by GOP pollster Strategic Vision found 55% of the respondents want Thompson to try for the presidency; others were split between not wanting him to run or being undecided.

When state Republicans in the poll were asked their choice for president in '08, Giuliani was named by 33%, Thompson by 24%, McCain by 17%; others were in single digits. Campaigning in Iowa

According to Tony Jewell, another former Thompson aide, Thompson has traveled twice to Iowa in recent weeks to stump for state legislative candidates. He'll return Oct. 24 for a fund-raiser for House Republican Jim Nussle, who is running for governor.

Iowans have seen no fewer than 11 GOP presidential hopefuls in recent months, said Cullen Sheehan, executive director of the Republican Party of Iowa. He's met Thompson several times - Sheehan was campaign manager for unsuccessful GOP Senate candidate Tim Michels of Wisconsin in 2004 - and thinks Thompson could have a "big impact in a state like Iowa, being a Midwesterner himself."

Talking about the PAC, Jewell said Thompson is using it as a vehicle to support candidates and "stay involved in the national debate on issues that are very important to the future of the country." He named health care, accountability in education, energy independence and foreign policy as top concerns.

Thompson made about 100 speeches in the year after he left the cabinet, often detailing his plan to cover the 45 million Americans without health insurance.

So-called leadership PACs are not unusual. Half of the 10 federal lawmakers from Wisconsin have them, notably Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold, who has been traveling widely and considering a presidential run of his own. The others: House Democrats Tammy Baldwin and Ron Kind and Republicans Paul Ryan and Tom Petri.

Thompson's PAC, whose name borrows from the state's motto, "Forward," has not yet registered with the Federal Election Commission.

At the Washington-based Center for Responsive Politics, which tracks money in politics, Communications Director Massie Ritsch said that although the chief purpose of such a PAC is to support candidates, outlays often benefit the person who controls the PAC.

"They spend a lot of money on what you might call overhead: staff, fund-raising costs, travel, sometimes you see polling, that sort of thing. They can be a pre-presidential committee of sorts," he said.

Fund-Raising Obstacles Imperil N.Y. Bid For '08 Democratic Convention (NYT)

By Diane Cardwell

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

New York City's bid to land the 2008 Democratic National Convention is in jeopardy because Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg is spread so thin with fund-raising commitments that he may not be able to raise the money from private donors needed to pay for it, an official said on Thursday.

The fund-raising worries come as Democrats have been seriously considering bringing the convention to New York rather than to the other competing city, Denver, which offers a politically attractive location, but has logistical problems because of a scarcity of hotel rooms.

A Democratic convention in New York would be likely to give Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton a starring role, even if she is not chosen as the party's presidential nominee.

But now, administration officials are raising "grave concerns" about Mr. Bloomberg's ability to cover the expenses. For 2004, when the city was working to show how it had recovered from the Sept. 11 attack, city officials promised Republicans $73 million for their convention and raised $85 million in a fund-raising drive headed by Mayor Bloomberg. This time around, the budget goal is for nearly $85 million, a figure administration officials say could grow to $100 million.

Given the roughly $250 million Mr. Bloomberg has promised to raise for the World Trade Center Memorial Foundation and for programs recommended by his poverty commission, an administration official who would speak only anonymously said there were "serious concerns" about his ability to hit that target. If Mr. Bloomberg and other host committee officials could not bring in the promised amount, the city would have to make up the difference.

It was not immediately clear whether officials would pull back from the bid or devise a new fund-raising strategy, but the financial issue is dampening what had appeared to be encouraging developments as New York pushed aggressively to serve as host to the Democrats in 2008.

From the beginning, few political analysts greeted New York's attempt to snare the convention with much optimism, arguing that Democrats would be wiser to go to an area of the country where they stood to sway a few fence-sitting states to their side, instead of choosing a state that has long been in the Democratic camp.

But aides to Mr. Bloomberg put together an all-out pitch, promising to decorate the entire city, provide delegates with concierge services and offer the news media free spa treatments and haircuts at Barneys to help them "get excited about their environment," according to a host committee presentation. Mayor Bloomberg even traveled to Chicago to court Democrats, taking along the "Sopranos" star Lorraine Bracco as aides doled out Big Apple martinis and manhattans to party leaders.

Then, New York's effort got a surprise shot in the arm from an unlikely source: the Republicans, who snapped up Minneapolis and St. Paul, which, like New York, had bid for both conventions. That put the Twin Cities out of the running for the Democratic convention, since both events are scheduled just days apart.

Further strengthening New York's chances was the sense among Democrats that while New York, with its large police force, transit system and other logistical advantages, can pull off a successful convention, Denver may not have enough space even to house the delegates. Denver itself has just 19,000 hotel rooms, according the New York pitch, compared with New York's 63,200 hotel rooms.

But Denver offers political advantages that could trump New York, Bloomberg aides concede. The convention offers an opportunity for Democrats to court a region considered increasingly receptive to the party's message, said Seth Masket, an assistant professor of political science at the University of Denver.

"To that extent, geography does matter," he said. "The mountain states are becoming more purple, as they say, and in Colorado in particular the Democratic Party has been doing increasingly well in recent years, and it's looking good for this fall."

That stems, he said, from the migration of voters from more liberal areas along the West Coast, but also from the tenor of the national Republican Party, whose cultural conservatism does not play well with the more individualistic, libertarian strains of the mountain region.

Indeed, senators from Nevada, Montana, New Mexico and Colorado recently sent a letter to Howard Dean, the Democratic Party chairman, urging him to select Denver as a way of increasing the party's chances of winning several Western states that have been increasingly up for grabs.

Conversely, this line of reasoning goes, holding the convention in the politically safe terrain of New York would represent a missed opportunity, especially if the party is nominating a New Yorker like Mrs. Clinton. Although the city is the country's media capital and a national megaphone, said Doug Muzzio, a professor at the Baruch School of Public Affairs, "It's like the Subway Series: it's great for New Yorkers but lousy for everybody else because they're not interested."

New York has a storied history of holding conventions, serving as host when Democrats nominated Jimmy Carter in 1976 and also when Democrats held the longest convention in American political history, when the party took more than 100 ballots to nominate John W. Davis, who went on to lose to Calvin Coolidge in 1924. After the 2004 Republican convention, George Bush went on to victory, and city officials said the event drew $245 million in business during a slow time of the year.

For the city, there is the question of whether New Yorkers would even be interested in a 2008 convention, given the disruptions and the potential for street protests. In 2004, those protests led to mass arrests and detentions, followed by lawsuits against the city that are still winding through the courts. And if the Iraq war remains unsettled and divisive, it could again prove a catalyst for thousands to take to the streets.

"We hope that the city will acknowledge and learn from the mistakes it made handling protests during the Republican National Convention," said Donna Lieberman, executive director of the New York Civil Liberties Union. "Political conventions are lightning rods for protest. That doesn't mean that we will see the breadth and intensity of activity that New York saw during the Republican convention, but the city has to be prepared to respect the right to protest, whatever the point of view."

Call Of The West: Rein In The Judges (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

Conservative ballot measures in many states would check judicial power. South Dakotans seek a right to sue jurists, Montanans to recall.

DENVER — Judges across several Western states could soon face new limits on their authority and threats to their independence, as conservatives campaign for ballot measures that aim to rein in what they describe as "runaway courts."

Frustration among the right has been building for years, especially since the high court in Massachusetts legalized same-sex marriage in 2003. Politicians and pastors have accused judges of ignoring the public will and legislating from the bench.

On Nov. 7, voters will be asked to do something about it.

South Dakota's ballot contains the most radical provision: It would empower citizens to sue judges over their rulings.

Other proposals would make Colorado the first state to impose term limits on top judges and give Montana residents the right to recall judges over any "dissatisfaction." In Oregon, an amendment would require Supreme and Appeals court judges to be elected by geographic district, so they reflect the values of conservative rural communities as well as the liberal legal establishment in Portland.

In three other states, ballot measures would also limit judicial authority, though that is not their primary intent. Proposition 90 in California aims to restrict government's right to condemn private property; it also takes elements of such cases out of judges' hands and entrusts them to juries instead. Nevada has a similar initiative. And a proposal in North Dakota would severely curtail the discretion judges have in settling custody disputes.

Supporters cast their efforts as populist and democratic, a way to make judges answer more directly to the citizens they serve. "This is a very measured and mild response to the perception that our courts are out of control," said John Andrews, a former legislator promoting the amendment to impose term limits in Colorado.

Opponents, however, warn that the initiatives would begin to dismantle the system of checks and balances set up under the U.S. Constitution.

"Judges are there to protect the minority from the tyranny of the majority. They are not there to do the popular will," said Doreen Dodson, a St. Louis attorney who chairs the American Bar Assn.'s committee on judicial independence. "They are accountable to the law and the Constitution."

States have always struggled to balance judicial independence and accountability, said Rorie Spill Solberg, a political scientist at Oregon State University. Lately, she said, that scale has tipped ever more toward accountability — and toward a notion that judges should respect, even represent, the will of the majority.

All but eight states ban partisan elections for judges in an effort to keep politics — and corruption — off the bench. But Solberg and others worry that the latest wave of changes would make judges more vulnerable to pressure from interest groups and even individuals.

"What I see, pretty much across the country, are judges under siege," said former Colorado Supreme Court Justice Rebecca Love Kourlis.

South Dakota's Amendment E would have the most sweeping effect; it has drawn opposition from conservatives and liberals — including, in a rare show of unanimity, every member of the state Legislature.

Under the amendment judges in the state could lose their jobs or assets if citizens disliked how they sentenced a criminal, resolved a business dispute or settled a divorce. "We want to give power back to the people," said Jake Hanes, a spokesman for the measure.

A special grand jury would evaluate citizen complaints against judges — and judges would not be presumed innocent. Amendment E explicitly instructs jurors to "liberally" tilt in favor of any citizen with a grievance, and "not to be swayed by artful presentation by the judge."

This deep suspicion of judges is reflected not only on the fall ballot, but also in the rallying cries of the right, especially Christian conservatives. A summit for "values voters" last spring included a session called "The Judiciary: Overruling God." Mock ballots, circulated online, urge Christians to vote for the judge they'd most like to impeach.

The American Bar Assn. is so concerned about the trend that it recently produced a DVD called "Countering the Critics," to be screened at churches, Rotary Clubs and Chambers of Commerce nationwide. To encourage lawyers to speak up in defense of the judiciary, the ABA has drafted sample speeches, op-ed articles and letters to the editor comparing judges to referees, sworn to uphold the rules, however unpopular.

That analogy does not sit well with Andrews, the former state senator backing term limits in Colorado.

In his view, judges too often let their political views color their decisions. Or they arrogantly "ignore or overrule decisions of the people," he said.

Andrews' campaign has spent more than $300,000 reminding voters in Colorado of rulings that he considers outrageous, such as when judges struck down a school voucher program, canceled a ballot initiative to limit services for illegal immigrants, and voided the death penalty for a convicted murderer because jurors used the Bible to guide their deliberations.

One of his radio ads begins: "Remember that line, 'Here comes the judge?' Amendment 40 has a better idea: There goes the judge."

Andrews, a Republican, acknowledges that term limits won't guarantee rulings he approves. But he says it's better then letting justices sit on the bench for decades, "curdling like old milk."

Under current law, the governor appoints justices in consultation with a bipartisan commission; they can serve until age 72, facing retention elections just once a decade. Amendment 40 would limit the justices to 10 years, with more frequent retention elections.

Five of seven state Supreme Court justices would be forced off within two years if the measure passes. Andrews relishes that symbolism.

"Simply sending this message of profound discontent with a judiciary that used to be respected is very valuable," he said.

The amendment has drawn high-powered — and well-funded — opposition, with public statements coming from many district attorneys, three former governors and Republican Gov. Bill Owens.

"Reasonable people, present company included, will disagree with rulings from time to time, but that does not mean we dismantle an entire branch of government," said former Gov. Richard D. Lamm, a Democrat.

Still, analysts say the measure in Colorado — like those in other states — has a shot at passing because it taps into such widespread anger at the courts.

"How successful they'll be is really hard to know," said Elizabeth Theiss Smith, a political scientist at the University of South Dakota.

"Conservatives in particular have been so upset about judicial rulings, and this is an activist way to deal with activist judges."

Gerry Studds Dies At 69; First Openly Gay Congressman (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

Gerry E. Studds, the first openly gay member of Congress and a demanding advocate for New England fishermen and for gay rights, died early Saturday at Boston University Medical Center, his husband said.

The cause was a vascular illness that led Mr. Studds to collapse while walking his dog on Oct. 3 in Boston. He was 69.

From 1973 to 1997, Mr. Studds (whose first name was pronounced GAIR-ee) represented the Massachusetts district where he grew up, covering Cape Cod and the barnacled old fishing towns near the coast. He was the first Democrat to win the district in 50 years, and over the course of 12 terms, he sponsored several laws that helped protect local fisheries and create national parks along the Massachusetts shore.

A former Foreign Service officer with degrees from Yale, he was also a leading critic of President Ronald Reagan's clandestine support of the Contra rebels in Nicaragua. He staunchly opposed "Star Wars," or the Strategic Defense Initiative, which Mr. Studds once described as "the Edsel of the 1980's" — overpriced and oversold.

His homosexuality was revealed through scandal. In 1983, he was censured by the House for having had an affair 10 years earlier with a 17-year-old Congressional page. For Mr. Studds, formal and dignified, a model of old New England reserve, the discovery sparked intense anguish, friends said.

He had long been unsure of the role his sexuality should play. At the nation's first major gay march on Washington in 1979, he told friends he could neither attend nor stay away.

"His act of courage was to jog within a block of it," said Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts, the congressman from Mr. Studds's adjoining district, who announced his own homosexuality four years later. "He felt that conflicted."

Once outed, however, Mr. Studds refused to buckle to conservative pressure to resign.

"All members of Congress are in need of humbling experiences from time to time," Mr. Studds said at the time. But he never apologized. He defended the relationship as consensual and condemned the investigation, saying it had invaded his privacy.

He went on to win re-election in 1984, surprising both supporters and opponents.

For some, it echoed an earlier, unexpected accomplishment: In 1968, as a 30-year-old teacher at St. Paul's School in Concord, N.H., Mr. Studds was one of two crucial figures who persuaded Senator Eugene McCarthy to bring his antiwar presidential campaign to the state's primary. Members of the campaign partly attributed Mr. McCarthy's surprisingly strong showing there — which helped force President Lyndon B. Johnson out of the race — to the 12-day tour Mr. Studds had scheduled.

"He was a major factor for us in the New Hampshire primary," said Seymour M. Hersh, who was the press secretary for Mr. McCarthy. "Gerry was just there; he was there with ideas, he was there to organize."

Mr. Studds's re-election in 1984 had reverberations of its own.

"In a sense, he became a role model," said Charles Kaiser, author of "1968 in America" and "The Gay Metropolis." "His experience convinced other people that it would now be possible to run as an openly gay person."

Mr. Studds also seemed emboldened by his re-election. He began to demand more money for AIDS research and treatment. He pressed for the right of gay people to serve openly in the military, releasing a previously suppressed Pentagon report in 1989, which concluded that sexuality "is unrelated to job performance in the same way as is being left- or right-handed."

In addition to speaking on the House floor on behalf of gay marriage, he set an example. In 2004, he and his longtime partner, Dean T. Hara, became one of the first couples to marry under a Massachusetts law allowing gay marriage.

"Gerry often said that it was the fight for gay and lesbian equality that was the last great civil rights chapter in modern American history," Mr. Hara said in a statement.

"He did not live to see its final sentences written," Mr. Hara added, "but all of us will forever be indebted to him for leading the way with compassion and wisdom."

Mr. Studds's past had recently resurfaced. In the final two weeks of his life, the two-decade-old controversy surrounding Mr. Studds became an issue in the 2006 midterm election campaign as a new Congressional page scandal unfolded.

Though his name had barely been mentioned in Washington since he retired, the resignation late last month of Representative Mark Foley, a Florida Republican, revived interest in Mr. Studds's own dalliance with a teenage page in 1983.

Across the country, several Republican candidates sought to deflect criticism aimed at their own party by reminding voters about Mr. Studds. The National Republican Congressional Committee chastised Democrats in this year's race for taking contributions from party leaders who had served with Mr. Studds.

In the Oct. 16 issue of The Weekly Standard, printed before Mr. Studds's death, the conservative commentator Charles Krauthammer also invoked the retired Massachusetts congressman as he drew a contrast between Republicans and Democrats. Mr. Krauthammer argued that Mr. Foley had resigned immediately and that Mr. Studds had left Congress only after Democrats had lost their majority, which he called "the political equivalent of dying in your sleep."

Mr. Hara, Mr. Studds's husband, declined to comment on the newest criticism.

A memorial service will be held in November. In addition to Mr. Hara, Mr. Studds is survived by his brother, Colin Studds; his sister-in-law, Mary Lou Studds; his sister, Gaynor Stewart; four nephews; and his English springer spaniel, Bonnie.

Gerry Studds; Gay Pioneer In Congress (WP)

By Yvonne Shinhoster Lamb, Washington Post Staff Writer

Gerry E. Studds, the first openly gay person elected to Congress and a longtime proponent of environmental protection, New England fishermen and human rights, died Oct. 14 at Boston Medical Center, several days after he collapsed while walking his dog. He was 69.

Mr. Studds lost consciousness because of a blood clot in his lung Oct. 3. He later regained consciousness and seemed to be improving, but his condition worsened Friday because of a second clot, according to Dean Hara, who married Mr. Studds in 2004 shortly after same-sex marriage was legalized in Massachusetts.

A 12-term congressman from Massachusetts, Mr. Studds was a ranking member of the House Democratic leadership and popular in his 10th Congressional District in 1983 when he was censured for sexual misconduct with a 17-year-old male page that had occurred 10 years earlier.

Mr. Studds told the House that his affair with the page was "a very serious error in judgment" but that it was "a mutually voluntary, private relationship between adults."

He chose not to fight the charges, saying his right to privacy was more important.

DOJ_NMG_0081595

"It is not a simple task for any of us to meet adequately the obligations of either public office or private life, let alone both," Mr. Studds said on the House floor. "But these challenges are made substantially more complex when one is, as I am, both an elected public official and gay."

The scandal, which also involved Rep. Daniel B. Crane (R-Ill.), who was involved with a female page, highlighted problems in supervision of congressional pages.

Mr. Studds's revelation did not prevent his reelection in 1984, a race he won by a solid majority.

Long a champion of environmental and maritime concerns, Mr. Studds was advocate for the fishing industry and worked to establish a barrier to foreign fishing vessels 200 miles from the U.S. coast. He was chairman of the powerful Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries from 1990 to 1994, the Subcommittee on the Coast Guard and Navigation, and the Subcommittee on Fisheries, Oceans and Wildlife, and was a member of the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment. He was a leader in passing legislation that now protects the Atlantic striped bass, whales, dolphins and porpoises.

"His work on behalf of our fishing industry and the protection of our waters has guided the fishing industry into the future and ensured that generations to come will have the opportunity to love and learn from the sea," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said. "He was a steward of the oceans."

Mr. Studds, who was known for his acidic wit and his mastery of legislative details, also pushed for health-care reform and for increased funding for people with AIDS and for AIDS research. In 1987, he sent a copy of Surgeon General C. Everett Koop's 36-page "Report on AIDS" to every household in his district. He also opposed military intervention in Central America.

He was among the first members of Congress to endorse lifting the ban on gays and lesbians in the military, and in 1994 with Kennedy, he introduced legislation to end discrimination in the workplace based on sexual orientation.

Gerry Eastman Studds was born May 12, 1937, in Mineola, N.Y., the son of a Long Island architect. He grew up in Cohasset, Mass., in the district he would later represent. He graduated from Yale University and received his master's degree in teaching there in 1961.

Shortly after, he came to Washington and joined the State Department as a Foreign Service officer. By 1962, he was working as a congressional liaison for President John F. Kennedy's domestic Peace Corps task force, and two years later he was a legislative assistant to Sen. Harrison A. Williams Jr. (D-N.J.).

Leaving Washington in the mid-1960s, he became a history teacher at St. Paul's School in Concord, N.H., until his opposition to the Vietnam War propelled him back into politics. In 1968, the young teacher and peace activist joined the presidential primary campaign of Sen. Eugene McCarthy (D-Minn.) as a coordinator in New Hampshire, where his political acumen developed.

In the book "1968 in America" (1988), author Charles Kaiser recounted how Mr. Studds and David Hoeh, a political strategist, helped to orchestrate McCarthy's victory in New Hampshire.

"Studds had spent the Thanksgiving recess at home doing some basic statistical research on New Hampshire presidential primaries, and he came to Chicago armed with an analysis of the vote, its percentage in each town and each congressional district," Kaiser wrote. "He presented McCarthy with a twelve-day schedule of campaigning with which the candidate could hit 75 percent of the voters."

The analysis, combined with Hoeh's experience, proved successful. "This would be the hallmark of the New Hampshire campaign: so-called amateurs who turned out to be much better informed about the local electorate than their most entrenched opponents," Kaiser wrote.

Fully engaged in the politics of the day, Mr. Studds went on to serve as a delegate to the tumultuous 1968 Democratic National Convention in Chicago. Two years later, at age 33 and while a student at the Harvard School of Education, he first ran for Congress but lost to the Republican incumbent in a close election.

He spent the next two years studying issues related to the fishing industry and Portuguese, the language of a community in his district of considerable size. In 1972, he won his second bid and became the first Democrat in 50 years to win what was considered a safe Republican seat.

Mr. Studds, who lived in Provincetown, Mass., retired from Congress in 1997 and became a lobbyist for the fishing industry and environmental causes.

Studds, 1st Openly Gay Congressman, Dies (AP-Y)

By Jay Lindsay, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 15, 2006

Former Rep. Gerry Studds, who became the first openly gay member of Congress when his homosexuality was exposed during a teenage page sex scandal, died early Saturday. He was 69.

Studds died at Boston Medical Center several days after he collapsed while walking his dog, his husband said. Doctors determined his loss of consciousness was due to a blood clot in his lung, Dean Hara said.

Studds regained consciousness and seemed to be improving, but his condition deteriorated Friday because of a second blood clot. The origin of the second clot was not immediately determined, said Hara, who married Studds shortly after same-sex marriage was legalized in Massachusetts in 2004.

Hara said Studds gave courage to gay people by winning re-election after publicly acknowledging his homosexuality.

"He gave people of his generation, of my generation, of future generations, the courage to do whatever they wanted to do," said Hara, 49.

Studds was first elected in 1972 and represented Cape Cod and the Islands, New Bedford, and the South Shore for 12 Congressional terms. He retired from Congress in 1997.

In his early career, Studds was known for opposing the Vietnam War and military intervention in Central America. Studds later became an advocate for a stronger federal response to the AIDS crisis and was among the first members of Congress to endorse lifting the ban on gays serving in the military.

In 1983, Studds acknowledged his homosexuality after a 27-year-old man disclosed that he and Studds had had a sexual relationship a decade earlier when the man was a teenage congressional page.

The House of Representatives censured Studds, who then went home to face his constituents in a series of public meetings.

At the time, Studds called the relationship with the teenage page, which included a trip to Europe, "a very serious error in judgment." But he did not apologize and defended the relationship as a consensual relationship with a young adult. The former page later appeared publicly with Studds in support of him.

Hara said Studds was never ashamed of the relationship with the page.

"This young man knew what he was doing," Hara said. "He was at (Studds') side."

Studds told his colleagues in a speech on the floor of the House that everyone faces a daily challenge of balancing public and private lives.

"These challenges are made substantially more complex when one is, as am I, both an elected public official and gay," Studds said at the time.

In Congress, Studds was an outspoken advocate for the fishing industry and was hailed by his constituents for his work establishing a limit for foreign fishing vessels 200 miles from the coast. After leaving Congress, he became a lobbyist for the fishing industry and environmental causes.

"His work on behalf of our fishing industry and the protection of our waters has guided the fishing industry into the future and ensured that generations to come will have the opportunity to love and learn from the sea," Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said in a statement. "He was a steward of the oceans."

In 1996, Congress named the 842-square-mile Gerry E. Studds Stellwagen Bank National Marine Sanctuary after him in recognition of his work protecting the marine environment.

In addition to Hara, Studds is survived by a brother, a sister and four nephews.

A Moral Philosophy For Middle-Class America (NYT)

By David Brooks

Some people are religious conservatives, who believe that policies should align with the transcendent moral order of the universe. Other people are social libertarians, who believe government should be neutral on values issues, and individuals should be guaranteed their own private space to work out their own solutions to moral questions.

But others of us are social traditionalists. We differ from the religious conservatives in that we're not sure about a transcendent moral order. Furthermore, we think it's both too sectarian and too lofty to try to pattern government policies on God's law.

We also disagree with the social libertarians. We don't think government can be neutral on values issues. Nations are held together by shared beliefs. People flourish because they have been encouraged by society to adopt certain habits and behaviors. It's a chimera to believe individuals come up with solutions to moral questions alone; human beings are social creatures whose actions and views are profoundly shaped by the social fabric that binds them.

We traditionalists observe that when policies fail, it's usually because they are based on inaccurate assumptions about human nature. So we don't base our thinking on the abstract arguments of theology. Nor do we base it on economics, with its image of profit-maximizing individuals. We begin our thinking with a study of what human beings in particular places are actually like.

We know, for example, that human beings are wired to form attachments with each other. As Daniel Goleman writes in his new book, "Social Intelligence," the subconscious mind is able to detect nonverbal emotional messages that the conscious mind is not even aware of. Babies cry in sympathy with other infants. Young children use "mirror neurons" to imitate and learn. As adults, our brain and cardiovascular functions are influenced by the people around us, as we instinctively mimic their emotions.

We are engaged, Goleman writes, in endless "protoconversations," and you get these social contagions. A mood or change can sweep through a group or a nation as people subconsciously mold one another's behavior.

All of this was anticipated by Adam Smith nearly 250 years ago. In "The Theory of Moral Sentiments," Smith based his theory of morals on the intense sociability of human beings (rather than on divine law or the idea of maximum individual autonomy). His approach is a starting point for social traditionalists today.

Smith argued that more than just about everything else, people hunger for approval. We feel intense pleasure when we experience the sympathy of others. In a well-structured society, he continues, our desire for sympathy leads us to restrain our selfish or egotistical behaviors.

Furthermore, Smith continues, we not only want to feel praise, we want to feel praiseworthy. We want to act in ways that would deserve praise, if a wise, impartial spectator happened to be watching us. In our best moments, we want to live up to the ideals our society has gradually engraved upon us.

So for Smith, the crucial policy question was: How do you embed people in relationships that will discourage selfish behavior and emotionally reward virtue and self-control?

Today, while the religious conservatives and the social libertarians have their culture war flashpoints — how many crèches can you fit on the head of a publicly funded pin? — the traditionalists are interested in how to strengthen institutions that breed responsible people. How do you encourage marriage at a time when 70 percent of African-American babies are born out of wedlock? How can you embed young men in American cities, or in Iraq, in the constructive world of work, so they won't drift into the world of violence? How can you build preschool programs so children from chaotic homes will have at least one stable place to develop self-control? How can you assimilate immigrants so they will internalize the social norms of the United States? How can parents keep cultural garbage out of their homes?

In the 1980's, Smith was known as the apostle of free-market capitalism. But these days attention has shifted over to his social philosophy. The culture war has become self-parodic, so people are hungry for a morality that is neither absolutist nor nihilistic. As the economy has opened up opportunities, it's become clear many people lack the cultural capital to take advantage of them.

A Republican Party in danger of dividing between religious conservatives on the one side and libertarians on the other might return to these traditionalist values after the coming deluge.

It's Official: To Be Married Means To Be Outnumbered (NYT)

By Sam Roberts

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

Married couples, whose numbers have been declining for decades as a proportion of American households, have finally slipped into a minority, according to an analysis of new census figures by The New York Times.

The American Community Survey, released this month by the Census Bureau, found that 49.7 percent, or 55.2 million, of the nation's 111.1 million households in 2005 were made up of married couples — with and without children — just shy of a majority and down from more than 52 percent five years earlier.

The numbers by no means suggests marriage is dead or necessarily that a tipping point has been reached. The total number of married couples is higher than ever, and most Americans eventually marry. But marriage has been facing more competition. A growing number of adults are spending more of their lives single or living unmarried with partners, and the potential social and economic implications are profound.

"It just changes the social weight of marriage in the economy, in the work force, in sales of homes and rentals, and who manufacturers advertise to," said Stephanie Coontz, director of public education for the Council on Contemporary Families, a nonprofit research group. "It certainly challenges the way we set up our work policies."

While the number of single young adults and elderly widows are both growing, Professor Coontz said, "we have an anachronistic view as to what extent you can use marriage to organize the distribution and redistribution of benefits."

Couples decide to live together for many reasons, but real estate can be as compelling as romance.

"Owning three toothbrushes and finding that they are always at the wrong house when you are getting ready to go to bed wears on you," said Amanda Hawn, a 28-year-old writer who set up housekeeping near San Francisco with her boyfriend, Nate Larsen, a real estate analyst, after shuttling between his apartment and one she shared with a friend. "Moving in together has simplified life," Ms. Hawn said.

The census survey estimated that 5.2 million couples, a little more than 5 percent of households, were unmarried opposite-sex partners. An additional 413,000 households were male couples, and 363,000 were female couples. In all, nearly one in 10 couples were unmarried. (One in 20 households consisted of people living alone).

And the numbers of unmarried couples are growing. Since 2000, those identifying themselves as unmarried opposite-sex couples rose by about 14 percent, male couples by 24 percent and female couples by 12 percent.

Matt Foreman, executive director of the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force, said gay couples were undercounted because many gay people were reluctant to disclose their sexual orientation. But he said that inhibition seemed to be fading.

"I would say the increase is due to people feeling more comfortable disclosing that they are gay or lesbian and living with a partner," he said.

The survey did not ask about sexual orientation, but its questionnaire was designed to distinguish partners from roommates. A partner was defined as "an adult who is unrelated to the householder, but shares living quarters and has a close personal relationship with the householder."

Some of the biggest gains in unmarried couples were recorded in unexpected places. In the rural Midwest, the number of households made up of male partners rose 77 percent since 2000.

The survey revealed wide disparities in household composition by place. The proportion of married couples ranged from more than 69 percent in Utah County, Utah, which includes Provo, to 26 percent in Manhattan, which has a smaller share of married couples than almost anyplace in the country. But Manhattan registered a 1.2 percent increase in married couples since 2000, in contrast to the rest of New York City and many other places.

Among counties, the highest proportion of unmarried opposite-sex partners was in Mendocino, Calif., where they made up nearly 11 percent of all households.

The highest share of male couples was in San Francisco, where, according to the census, they accounted for nearly 2 percent of all households. In Manhattan, they made up 1 percent of households. Hampshire County, Mass., home to Northampton, had the highest proportion of female couples, at 1.7 percent. Some of the highest numbers of unmarried couples were recorded in the South, which as defined by the census, has the largest population of any region.

David Blankenhorn, president of the marriage advocacy group the Institute for American Values, said married couples had become a minority largely because of the growing number of households made up of people who planned to marry or who used to be married.

Steve Watters, the director of young adults for Focus on the Family, a conservative Christian group, said that the trend of fewer married couples was more a reflection of delaying marriage than rejection of it.

"It does show that a lot of people are experimenting with alternatives before they get there," Mr. Watters said. "The biggest concern is that those who still aspire to marriage are going to find fewer models. They're also finding they've gotten so good at being single it's hard to be at one with another person."

But Pamela J. Smock, a researcher at the University of Michigan Population Studies Center, said her research — unaffiliated with the Census Bureau — found that the desire for strong family bonds, and especially marriage, was constant.

"Even cohabiting young adults tell us that they are doing so because it would be unwise to marry without first living together in a society marked by high levels of divorce," Ms. Smock said.

A number of couples interviewed agreed that cohabiting was akin to taking a test drive and, given the scarcity of affordable apartments and homes, also a matter of convenience. Some said that pregnancy was the only thing that would prompt them to make a legal commitment soon. Others said they never intended to marry. A few of those couples said they were inspired by solidarity with gay and lesbian couples who cannot legally marry in most states.

Jennifer Lynch, a 28-year-old stage manager in New York, said she had lived on the Lower East Side with her boyfriend, who is 37 and divorced, for most of the five years they have been a couple.

"Cohabitating is our choice, and we have no intention to be married," Ms. Lynch said. "There is little difference between what we do and what married people do. We love each other, exist together, all of our decisions are based upon each other. Everyone we care about knows this."

If anything, she added, "not having the false security of wedding rings makes us work even a little harder."

With more competition from other ways of living, the proportion of married couples has been shrinking for decades. In 1930, they accounted for about 84 percent of households. By 1990 the proportion of married couples had declined to about 56 percent.

Married couples have not been a majority of households headed by adults younger than 25 since the 1970's, but among those aged 25 to 34 the proportion slipped below 50 percent for the first time within the past five years. (Among Americans aged 35 to 64, married couples still make up a majority of all households.)

"It's partially fueled by women in the work force; they don't necessarily have to marry to be economically secure," said Andrew A. Beveridge, a demographer at Queens College of the City University of New York, who conducted the census analysis for The New York Times. "You used to get married to have sex. Now one of the major reasons to get married is to have children, and the attractiveness of having children has declined for many people because of the cost."

William H. Frey, a demographer at the Brookings Institution, attributed the accelerated trend to the lifestyles of baby boomers.

"It's the legacy of the boomers that have finally caused this tipping point," Dr. Frey said. "Certainly later generations have followed in boomer footsteps, with high levels of living together before marriage, and more flexible lifestyles. But the boomers were the trailblazers, once again, rebelling against a norm their parents epitomized.

"This would seem to close the book on the Ozzie and Harriet era that characterized much of the last century," he said.

Security Council Backs Sanctions On North Korea (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

DOJ_NMG_0081600

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 14 — The Security Council voted unanimously on Saturday to impose strict sanctions on North Korea for its reported nuclear test, overcoming objections from Russia and China by explicitly excluding the threat of military force.

The resolution, drafted by the United States, clears the way for the toughest international action against North Korea since the end of the Korean War. Primarily, it bars the sale or transfer of material that could be used to make nuclear, biological and chemical weapons or ballistic missiles, and it bans international travel and freezes the overseas assets of people associated with the North's weapons programs.

In its most debated clause, the resolution authorizes all countries to inspect cargo going in and out of North Korea to detect illicit weapons.

That power was the sticking point in days of what the Russian ambassador called "tense negotiations" with China and Russia that continued up until just minutes before the final vote early Saturday afternoon. And less than an hour after joining in the Council vote to approve the resolution, the Chinese ambassador, Wang Guangya, said China would not participate in the inspection regime because it would create "conflict that could have serious implications for the region."

Mr. Wang said China supported the resolution as a necessary way to respond to Pyongyang's "flagrant" behavior.

The 15-0 vote came days after North Korea's claim it had tested a nuclear device, reflecting the immediate global alarm that such a weapon could wind up in the hands of terrorists or other rogue states. Indeed, the wording of the resolution hit most of the tough points that the United States and Japan, in particular, had been seeking.

But China's refusal to take part in searches, and Russia's seeming annoyance at the end of the process, immediately raised questions about how effective the resolution's execution could be. And it raised the prospect, too, that similar action sought by the United States against Iran could face a much tougher battle.

After the vote, John R. Bolton, the American ambassador, insisted that China was bound by the resolution's terms and would have to find a way to comply with the inspection provision. "I can't believe that China won't adhere to obligations that the Security Council has imposed," he said.

Ambassador Pak Gil-yon of North Korea told the Council that his government "totally rejected" the resolution, and he accused the panel's members of "gangster-like" action and a "double standards" attitude that neglected the nuclear threat posed by the United States.

He said that if the United States continued to "increase pressure" on North Korea, his government would consider it a declaration of war and take "critical countermeasures."

Mr. Pak then rose from his guest seat at the end of the horseshoe-shaped table and left the chamber.

Mr. Bolton asked to be heard and pointed to the empty chair, saying Mr. Pak's impulsive departure was the equivalent of Khrushchev's pounding his desk in protest in the General Assembly. The Russian ambassador, Vitaly I. Churkin, complained that the reference, even at a moment that he described as Mr. Bolton's "emotional state," was "an inappropriate analogy."

Current and former Bush administration officials, and experts on North Korea, said Saturday that while the sanctions did not go as far as Washington wished, they probably provided the legal justification for the United States and Japan to squeeze the country. It will provide the basis for inspecting ships in ports around the world — though not necessarily on the high seas — and gives Washington a way to expand a program to force banks to halt dealings with the country.

Earlier this year, Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, said that the huge pressure put on one small bank in Macao, Banco Delta Asia, "was the first thing we ever did that got their attention." Today one of his aides said, "Our plan is that Banco Delta is just a beginning."

What the administration did not get was authority to use military force to stop ships in international waters. In order to obtain Chinese agreement, it agreed this week to drop explicit reference to a chapter of the United Nations Charter that authorizes the possible use of military power to enforce sanctions.

"This isn't going to be like the Cuban missile crisis, where we put up a full blockade," said Michael Green, who headed Asia operations on the National Security Council staff until late last year, and is now at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

The big loophole in the resolution concerns policing the North's border with China. The two countries had about $1.7 billion in trade last year. The Chinese declaration Saturday cast doubt on the likelihood that China would inspect, much less stop, much of the trade moving across that border.

Speaking outside the White House on Saturday, President Bush praised the resolution, saying it sent "a clear message to the leader of North Korea regarding his weapons programs. This action by the United Nations, which was swift and tough, says that we are united in our determination to see to it that the Korea Peninsula is nuclear-weapons-free."

In addition to the sanctions and search regime, the resolution demands that North Korea abandon its illicit weapons programs and rejoin the nonproliferation treaty, and it calls on the government to return to the so-called six-nation talks involving South Korea, Japan, China, Russia and the United States.

A ban on the shipment of luxury goods in the resolution was particularly championed by Mr. Bolton and J. D. Crouch, the deputy national security adviser, as a way to harm the North's leader, Kim Jong-il, administration officials said. Mr. Kim does not command the kind of loyalty that his father, Kim Il-sung, the country's father and "Great Leader," did until his death in 1994. So instead, according to North Korean defectors, he buys allegiance with Mercedes-Benz cars, bottles of cognac and plenty of walking-around money.

Mr. Bolton alluded to that this week when he said that one intent of the resolution was to put Mr. Kim, who presides over a starving country but travels on luxurious train cars, on a diet. He said that the resolution left Pyongyang "utterly and totally isolated" and that the government should see its only way back to international acceptance was "abandoning weapons of mass destruction and not continuing to go after them."

Mr. Bolton said the measure was aimed at illicit activities of Pyongyang like "money laundering, counterfeiting and selling of narcotics." Those words, however, were removed this week to gain Chinese and Russian approval.

The final draft also dropped a broad arms embargo in favor of one just on heavy equipment like battle tanks, artillery systems, missiles and warships.

Despite the changes, Mr. Bolton said, "We think this represents essentially what the United States was asking for when it circulated its draft resolution on Monday."

Asked about the effect of Saturday's decision on the debate expected next week over sanctions on Iran for its refusal to suspend its nuclear program, he said, "I think this shows quite strongly that the Council is not going to tolerate proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and Iran should learn from this lesson."

But Mr. Churkin, the Russian ambassador, signaled that an obstacle in the negotiations over North Korea would also arise in the Iran debate, where Russia and China have also been reluctant to approve direct punishments.

Noting that in the cases of both North Korea and Iran, the United States had imposed its own sanctions, he said, "It is unhealthy that when discussing collective measures and trying to be cooperative and forming a unified approach, one country comes out and adopts unilateral measures which also apply to other countries that are participating in the discussion."

He said, "We very much hope that our American colleagues understand, in terms of the problems we have to solve and tackle in the next stage of our work in the Security Council."

U.N. Votes To Impose Sanctions On N. Korea (WP)

By Colum Lynch And Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

Council Demands End To Nuclear Program

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 14 -- The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously Saturday to condemn North Korea and impose stiff sanctions on the communist government in response to its suspected nuclear test.

North Korea's ambassador immediately rejected the council's demand to dismantle its nuclear weapons program and threatened to respond to the escalating pressure on the reclusive government with unspecified "physical countermeasures."

The 15-nation council's action highlighted the outrage that followed North Korea's claim of having tested a nuclear bomb Oct. 9. It also marked a rare willingness by North's Korea council allies, China and Russia, to impose sanctions on Pyongyang.

But to secure their support, the United States was compelled to water down key measures designed to ensure that the sanctions could be enforced. And China -- which shares an 880-mile border with North Korea -- said after the vote that it would ignore a critical provision, which calls on governments to inspect goods entering or leaving North Korea.

Still, President Bush issued a statement welcoming the decision, saying that the United Nations has sent a clear message to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il that the world is "united in our opposition to his nuclear weapons plans."

"There's a better way forward for the people of North Korea," Bush said. "If the leader of North Korea were to verifiably end his weapons programs, the United States and other nations would be willing to help the nation recover economically."

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, meanwhile, warned that the United States would pursue additional penalties against North Korea if it fails to abide by the council's demand that it agree to destroy its weapons of mass destruction.

Resolution 1718 bans North Korean trade in materials linked to its weapons of mass destruction program, ballistic missiles, high-end conventional weapons -- including war planes and battle tanks -- and luxury goods.

It will create a U.N. committee to monitor the sanctions' effectiveness and to draw up a list of individuals and institutions linked to North Korea's weapons programs. They will be prohibited from traveling abroad, and most of their financial assets will be frozen.

But the resolution stops far short of imposing the kind of sweeping trade embargo initially proposed by Japan. It no longer contains a U.S.-proposed provision to give North Korea 30 days to suspend its nuclear program or face "further action."

The text also provides no additional authority to allow inspections of North Korean vessels suspected of transporting illicit weapons. The United States claims that it already possesses that power, but China maintains that such actions violate international law.

Addressing the council chamber in English, North Korean U.N. ambassador Pak Gil Yon told the council that his government "totally rejects" the council's "unjustifiable" resolution. He said it was "gangster like" for the council to impose such "coercive" measures. He walked out of the U.N. chamber before the session ended.

After Pak's speech, Bolton directed the council's attention to the North Korean diplomat's empty chair and suggested that his right to address the council be suspended.

"That is the second time in three months that the representative of the DPRK [The Democratic Republic of Korea], having asked to participate in our meetings, has rejected a unanimous resolution of the Security Council and walked out of this chamber," Bolton said. "It's the contemporary equivalent of Nikita Khrushchev's pounding his shoe on the desk of the General Assembly."

Russia's U.N. ambassador, Vitaly Churkin, took offense at the reference to the former Soviet leader. He appealed to council president Kenzo Oshima of Japan "to use your influence" to discourage the use of such an "inappropriate analogy."

U.S. officials believe the resolution will give them the international tools to put the squeeze on North Korea. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to Japan, South Korea and China later this week to discuss the implementation of the resolution as well as possible actions that could be taken by countries to punish Pyongyang, U.S. officials said.

The Japanese government, the closest ally of the United States on the North Korean issue, has already imposed sweeping economic sanctions on North Korea in response to the nuclear test. Rice will try to persuade South Korea and China -- which have deep economic ties with North Korea and have supported the country even during the nuclear impasse -- to also tighten the vise, officials said.

"There is such a political backlash against North Korea that people are more willing to consider unilateral actions," said a senior State Department official. "The net effect is that the North Koreans find themselves in a substantially different place," even with China.

China is critical to the success of Security Council provisions calling for restrictions on North Korea's trade in illicit items, because most of Pyongyang's trade crosses the Chinese border. China, however, may be resistant to suggestions that it cut off or reduce North Korea's economic lifeline because it has long valued the stability of having North Korea as a buffer state between China's border and South Korea, which has 25,000 U.S. troops.

For the moment, U.S. officials are focused on implementing this resolution and are not contemplating more resolutions, officials said. When President Bush travels to Hanoi next month for an Asian economic summit, there is the possibility that Bush and the leaders from China, South Korea, Japan, Russia and possibly other countries will meet on North Korea and "take stock" of the resolution's effectiveness.

U.S. officials are also exploring whether the six-nation negotiating group that has focused on North Korea can form the basis for a new security organization akin to NATO or other regional forums. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, the administration's point man on North Korea, noted that unlike Europe, Asia has no such institutions.

The administration believes "we can move beyond just the peace in the Korean peninsula," Hill said in a speech Friday, "but also toward creating some multilateral structures that will allow Northeast Asia not only to be the economic juggernaut that Southeast Asia is . . . but also Northeast Asia that can also be exporting peace and a sense of how to get along."

Kessler reported from Washington.

Security Council Vote Is Unanimous On Sanctions (LAT)

By Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

The resolution aimed at depriving North Korea of access to nuclear materials leaves room for diplomacy. China opts out of cargo checks.

UNITED NATIONS — The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously Saturday to impose sanctions on North Korea that are meant to cut off the materials and funding for its nuclear program, although China ruled out participating in inspections of North Korean cargo.

As a result of what Russia's ambassador called "tense negotiations," the resolution does not allow military enforcement of the sanctions and makes it clear that the restrictions will be lifted once North Korea abandons its nuclear program and returns to talks. It also contains exemptions to the sanctions to minimize the effect on civilians.

The decision by all 15 members to punish North Korea while leaving the diplomatic door open was a hard-fought act of unity in the wake of the reclusive regime's defiant Oct. 9 announcement that it had conducted a nuclear test, days after the Security Council warned of "serious consequences."

"The Security Council has adopted one of the most important decisions in recent times on an issue of great concern to the international community, that of nonproliferation," Japanese Ambassador Kenzo Oshima said after the vote.

To prevent North Korea from acquiring or exporting nuclear materials, the resolution calls for a ban on goods related to the nation's weapons programs and a freeze on financial activities that support them, as well as a travel ban for senior North Korean officials. It also would put an embargo on heavy conventional weapons and luxury goods.

But China said Saturday that it would not participate in a key measure that would allow the inspection and seizure of suspected nuclear and missile materials going in and out of North Korea. At China's insistence, the final text was diluted to merely request, rather than require, that countries aggressively inspect North Korean cargo.

"China will implement this resolution, but it will not participate in those inspections," Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya said. "We strongly urge those who think it is necessary to do it with caution, because it could easily lead by one side or the other to a provocation of conflict. That would have serious implications for the region."

China's reluctance to take part in inspections of North Korean cargo throws into doubt how effective the sanctions will be. China is North Korea's neighbor and provides about 70% of its oil and 40% of its food. Beijing doesn't want the sanctions to cause the unstable regime in Pyongyang to collapse, sending refugees flooding across the border into China.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is heading to Beijing, Seoul and Tokyo this week to talk about how to enforce the resolution, and additional measures that the countries can take to contain North Korea.

The inspection measure is based on the 2003 U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative, or PSI, involving a group of 16 core countries that have agreed to take steps to stop the flow of weapons of mass destruction, including boarding ships for inspections.

U.S. officials portrayed the unanimous vote as a political victory for the United States in bringing together countries that had been reluctant to take a hard line on North Korea — in particular, China and Russia.

U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton had pushed hard for a swift and tough resolution after North Korea's missile tests in July and after the declared nuclear test last week, and even managed to get the PSI measure in the resolution.

President Bush described the Security Council resolution as a "clear message" to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il that "the world is united in our opposition to his nuclear weapons plans."

In brief remarks on the South Lawn of the White House, Bush also pledged to help North Korea with its economic recovery if it gave up its nuclear weapons program. "This action by the United Nations, which was swift and tough, says that we are united in our determination to see to it that the Korea Peninsula is nuclear-weapons-free," he said.

The North Korean ambassador, Pak Gil Yon, told the council that his country "totally rejects the unjustifiable resolution" and denounced the "gangster-like" behavior of the Security Council for sanctioning North Korea without addressing the threat that it felt the U.S. posed to his country.

North Korea would not "possess even a single nuke when it is no longer exposed to the U.S. threat," Pak said, but if sanctions are imposed it will "continue to take physical countermeasures, considering it as a declaration of war."

Pak then walked out of the chamber, leading Bolton to suggest to the council that North Korea should be expelled from the United Nations.

Bush: U.N. Action Sends Clear Message (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, October 15, 2006

President Bush said Saturday that the U.N. Security Council had sent a "swift and tough" message to North Korea that its claimed detonation of a nuclear bomb was unacceptable to the world.

Bush spoke shortly after the council unanimously approved a resolution penalizing the reclusive communist nation for its announcement of the test on Oct. 9.

"This action by the United Nations, which was swift and tough, says that we are united in our determination to see to it that the Korean Peninsula is nuclear-weapons free," the president told reporters in brief remarks from the White House's South Lawn. He then left for the presidential retreat at Camp David in Maryland.

Bush said North Korea still had a chance for "a better way forward" and promised economic assistance to the impoverished country from the United States and others if it would verifiably end its nuclear weapons program.

"The message today, however, says to the leader of North Korea that the world is united in our opposition to his nuclear weapons plans," Bush said.

The president took no questions. He never referred by name to Kim Jong Il, whose country Bush had branded a member of an "axis of evil."

The resolution demands that North Korea eliminate all its nuclear weapons and come back to six-party talks, which include the U.S., that are aimed at ending its program.

"This is the strongest resolution, the strongest set of sanctions ever passed on North Korea," said Kristen Silverberg, assistant secretary of state for international organizations.

The U.S. and Japan made several concessions to win support from skeptical council members, particularly China and Russia.

The resolution expressly rules out military action against North Korea. Also, language was dropped from the U.S. proposal that would have imposed a complete ban on the sale of conventional weapons. Instead, the embargo is limited to major hardware such as tanks, warships, combat aircraft and missiles.

The resolution calls on all countries to inspect cargo leaving and arriving in North Korea to prevent any illegal trafficking in weapons of mass destruction or ballistic missiles. The final draft was softened from language saying the council "decides" — which is a stronger authorization.

The measure also bans the import or export of material and equipment that could be used to make nuclear weapons or ballistic missiles. It orders all countries to freeze the assets and ban travel for anyone engaged in supporting North Korea's weapons programs.

Freezing financial assets of North Korean leaders and banning the import of luxury items are considered key pieces of the plan because they would squeeze the nation's elite but spare the ordinary citizen, Silverberg said.

"We hope to change the calculus for individual officials in North Korea," she said.

Despite the softer provisions and no threat of military action to enforce them, Bush pronounced the measure "a clear message" to North Korea.

North Korea immediately rejected the resolution, and its U.N. ambassador walked out of the council chamber. Ambassador Pak Gil Yon said North Korea wants talks but warned that it will consider increased U.S. pressure a declaration of war.

The U.S. has refused to talk one on one with North Korea except on the margins of six-nation disarmament talks that also include China, South Korea, Japan and Russia.

Bush is sending Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to China, South Korea and Japan this coming week to try to ensure there are no fissures between North Korea's neighbors and the United States. Rice and the U.S. ambassador to the U.N., John Bolton, also were appearing on the Sunday morning television talk shows to bolster the U.S. case.

The North Korea crisis was the subject of the president's weekly radio address on Saturday. Democrats responded by saying that the apparent test is evidence Bush's approach to North Korea has failed.

"Under President Bush and this Republican Congress' watch, our country has become less safe — both domestically and abroad," said congressional candidate Patrick Murphy of Pennsylvania. "We have seen the number of terrorist attacks increase around the world. We have seen North Korea and Iran — two members of the president's axis of evil — enhance their nuclear weapons capabilities."

Bush Says UN Needs To Send North Korea Clear Message (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Brendan Murray And Bill Varner

Bloomberg, October 15, 2006

Oct. 14 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush said a United Nations resolution that punishes North Korea for its nuclear activities will help prevent Kim Jong Il's isolated country from building and exporting atomic weapons.

``We will send a clear message to the North Korean regime that its actions will not be tolerated," Bush said in his weekly radio broadcast. The U.S. and other countries ``agree on the need for a strong United Nations Security Council resolution that will require North Korea to dismantle its nuclear programs," he said.

The Security Council today voted 15 to 0 to adopt the resolution, which Bush this afternoon told reporters was ``swift and tough." Agreement came after the U.S. introduced amendments that addressed objections by China and Russia.

China sought greater assurances that the resolution couldn't be used to justify armed seizure of North Korean ships traveling in international waters, while Russia was concerned about the scope of weapons-related items included in the embargo.

Cargo Inspection

The resolution bars the sale or transfer of missile, warships, tanks, attack helicopters and combat aircraft, as well as missile- and nuclear-related goods to the North Korean government, and also calls for UN member nations to conduct inspection of cargo going to of from North Korea.

Bush said in his radio address that the resolution should ``specify measures to prevent North Korea from importing or exporting nuclear or missile technologies" and ``should prevent financial transactions or asset transfers that would help North Korea develop its nuclear or missile capabilities."

North Korea announced Oct. 9 that it had carried out its first nuclear test, drawing condemnation from around the world.

DOJ_NMG_0081606

In a concession to China, the U.S. earlier dropped explicit reference to a part of the UN Charter that would make sanctions militarily enforceable, changing it to Article 41 of Chapter 7, which only authorizes diplomatic and economic sanctions. The Washington Post reported this morning that China wants greater assurances that the resolution couldn't be used to justify armed seizure of North Korean ships traveling in international waters.

Carrot and Stick

``We will give the nations with the closest ties to North Korea -- China and South Korea -- a framework to use their leverage to pressure Pyongyang and persuade its regime to change course," Bush said in his radio address. The president told reporters this afternoon that if North Korea verifiably ends its weapons program, the U.S. and other nations will provide economic help.

Bush said the U.S. will keep consulting with allies in the region.

``In response to North Korea's provocation, we will seek to increase our defense cooperation with our allies, including cooperation on ballistic missile defense to protect against North Korean aggression, and cooperation to prevent North Korea from importing or exporting nuclear or missile technologies," Bush said in the address.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to Beijing, Seoul and Tokyo Oct. 17-22 to talk about the resolution and ``how to go about actually implementing that resolution," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters yesterday in Washington.

Radioactivity Detected

The U.S. notified South Korea today that it had detected evidence of radioactivity near the site where North Korea claims it conducted the nuclear test.

``The U.S. informed us of its findings," said Chun Ki Seok an official at the public affairs division of the Defense Ministry in Seoul. ``The detection of radioactivity means the North conducted a nuclear test. But we are still unaware of whether the test succeeded."

``With its actions this week, the North Korean regime has once again broken its word, provoked an international crisis, and denied its people the opportunity for a better life," Bush said.

U.N. Imposes Trade Embargo On N. Korea (WT/AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 15, 2006

NEW YORK -- The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously yesterday to impose punishing sanctions on North Korea for reportedly carrying out a nuclear test, declaring that the test posed "a clear threat to international peace and security."

North Korea immediately rejected the resolution, and its U.N. ambassador walked out of the council chamber after accusing its members of a "gangsterlike" action that neglects the nuclear threat posed by the United States.

"The Democratic People's Republic of Korea is ready for talks, dialogue and confrontation," Ambassador Pak Gil-yon said, using the conventional long form of his country's name.

"If the United States increases pressure upon the Democratic People's Republic of Korea persistently, the DPRK will continue to take physical countermeasures, considering it as a declaration of war."

The vote came after the United States, Britain and France overcame last-minute differences with Russia and China during what the Russian ambassador called "tense negotiations."

The resolution demands North Korea eliminate all its nuclear weapons, but expressly rules out military action against the country -- a point demanded by the Russians and Chinese.

U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton warned Pyongyang, however, that if it continues pursuing nuclear weapons, the United States would seek further measures.

The Security Council condemned the nuclear test that North Korea said it conducted Monday. It demanded that North Korea immediately return to six-party talks aimed at persuading Pyongyang to dismantle its weapons program without precondition.

It imposed sanctions for the North's "flagrant disregard" of the council's appeal not to detonate a nuclear device and demanded that North Korea "not conduct any further nuclear test or launch of a ballistic missile."

The resolution bans the import or export of material and equipment that could be used to make nuclear weapons or ballistic missiles. It orders all countries to freeze the assets and ban travel for anyone engaged in supporting North Korea's weapons programs.

"This action by the United Nations, which was swift and tough, says that we are united in our determination to see to it that the Korean Peninsula is nuclear-weapons free," President Bush said.

In a measure aimed at North Korean leader Kim Jong-il and the country's tiny elite, the resolution bans the sale of luxury goods to the country.

To meet Russian and Chinese concerns, the U.S. eliminated a complete ban on the sale of conventional weapons. Instead, the resolution limits the embargo to major hardware such as tanks, warships, combat aircraft and missiles.

The resolution calls on all countries to inspect cargo leaving for and arriving from North Korea to prevent any illegal trafficking in unconventional weapons or ballistic missiles.

China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, said after the vote that this provision allowing the boarding of ships to inspect cargo was still unacceptable to Beijing, and it would not carry out inspections.

Nonetheless, Mr. Wang hailed what he called a "watered-down" resolution.

He told reporters that he did not consider the North Korean ambassador's response the official reply from Pyongyang, which he awaits.

"The important thing is not what they say here," Mr. Wang said. The overriding issue, he said, is "how we work together for peace and security in the region."

Russia's U.N. ambassador, Vitaly Churkin, said Moscow got what it wanted -- a strong resolution but one that is also aimed at "prevention of a further escalation of tension."

North Korea's Mr. Pak told the Security Council that the reported nuclear test was not inconsistent with the country's goal of a denuclearized Korean Peninsula.

"The DPRK clarified more than once that it would feel no need to possess even a single nuke when it is no longer exposed to the United States' threat, after it has dropped its hostile policy to the DPRK and confidence has been built between the two countries," he said.

Mr. Bolton said North Korea's reported test "unquestionably poses one of the gravest threats to international peace and security that this council has ever had to confront."

Following Mr. Pak's speech, Mr. Bolton took the floor again saying: "I'm not going to waste any of our time responding."

But he noted that North Korea had done yesterday exactly what it did in July after the council adopted limited sanctions for its ballistic-missile tests -- immediately reject the resolution and walk out.

"It is the contemporary equivalent of Nikita Khrushchev pounding his shoe on the desk," Mr. Bolton said, referring to the Soviet leader's legendary act of protest at the U.N. General Assembly in 1960.

Mr. Bolton told reporters afterward that the next step is to start work on implementing the resolution.

On Friday, U.S. officials said an air sampling after North Korea's claimed nuclear test detected radioactive debris consistent with an atomic explosion. However, the Bush administration and congressional officials said no final determination had been made about the nature of Monday's mystery-shrouded blast.

N. Korean Nuclear Conflict Has Deep Roots (WP)

50 Years of Threats and Broken Pacts Culminate in Apparent Atomic Test

Democrats and Republicans have been quick to use North Korea's apparent nuclear test to benefit their own party in these final weeks of the congressional campaign, but a review of history shows that both sides have contributed to the current situation.

There is more than 50 years of history to Pyongyang's attempt to gain a nuclear weapon, triggered in part by threats from Presidents Harry S. Truman and Dwight D. Eisenhower to end the Korean War.

In 1950, when a reporter asked Truman whether he would use atomic bombs at a time when the war was going badly, the president said, "That includes every weapon we have."

Three years later, Eisenhower made a veiled threat, saying he would "remove all restraints in our use of weapons" if the North Korean government did not negotiate in good faith an ending to that bloody war.

In 1957, the United States placed nuclear-tipped Matador missiles in South Korea, to be followed in later years, under both Republican and Democratic administrations, by nuclear artillery, most of which was placed within miles of the demilitarized zone.

It was not until President Jimmy Carter's administration, in the late 1970s, that the first steps were taken to remove some of the hundreds of nuclear weapons that the United States maintained in South Korea, a process that was not completed until 1991, under the first Bush administration.

It is against that background that the North Korean nuclear program developed.

North Korea has its own uranium mines and in 1965 obtained a small research reactor from the Soviet Union, which it located at Yongbyon. By the mid-1970s, North Korean technicians had increased the capability of that reactor and constructed a second one. Pyongyang agreed in 1977 to allow the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) to inspect the first reactor.

It was in the 1980s that the North Korean weapons program began its clandestine growth with the building of a facility for reprocessing fuel into weapons-grade material and the testing of chemical high explosives. In 1985, around the time U.S. intelligence discovered a third, once-secret reactor, North Korea agreed to sign the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT).

Five years later, U.S. intelligence discovered through satellite photos that a structure had been built that appeared to be capable of separating plutonium from nuclear fuel rods. Under pressure, North Korea signed a safeguards agreement with the IAEA in 1992, and inspections of facilities began. But in January 1993, IAEA inspectors were prevented from going to two previously unreported facilities. In the resulting crisis, North Korea attempted to withdraw from the NPT.

The Clinton administration responded in 1994 that if North Korea reprocessed plutonium from fuel rods, it would be crossing a "red line" that could trigger military action. The North Koreans "suspended" their withdrawal from the NPT, and bilateral talks with the Clinton administration got underway. When negotiations deadlocked, North Korea removed fuel rods from one of its reactors, a step that brought Carter back into the picture as a negotiator.

The resulting talks led to the 1994 Agreed Framework, under which North Korea would freeze and eventually dismantle its nuclear weapons program. In return, it would be supplied with conventional fuel and ultimately with two light-water reactors that could not produce potential weapons-grade fuel.

However, a subsequent IAEA inspection determined that North Korea had clandestinely extracted about 24 kilograms of plutonium from its fuel rods, and U.S. intelligence reported that was enough material for two or three 20-kiloton plutonium bombs.

During the next six years of the Clinton administration and into the first years of the current Bush administration, the spent fuel from North Korea's reactors was kept in a storage pond under IAEA supervision. As late as July 5, 2002, in a letter to Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), then-national security adviser Condoleezza Rice said the administration was continuing with the 1994 agreement but holding back some elements until the IAEA certified that the North Koreans had come into full compliance with the NPT's safeguards agreement.

In November 2001, when the Bush administration was absorbed in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, intelligence analysts at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory completed a highly classified report that concluded North Korea had begun construction of a plant to enrich uranium. A National Intelligence Estimate of the North Korean program confirmed the Livermore report, providing evidence that Pyongyang was violating the agreement.

Nonetheless, the Bush administration waited until October 2002 before confronting the North Koreans, who at one meeting confirmed they were following another path to a nuclear weapon using enriched uranium.

Soon thereafter, the United States ended its participation in the 1994 agreement. North Korea ordered IAEA inspectors out, announced it would reprocess the stored fuel rods and withdrew from the NPT. Earlier this year, Pyongyang declared it had nuclear weapons.

The Bush administration then embarked on a new approach, developing a six-nation strategy based on the idea that bilateral U.S.-North Korea negotiations did not work and that only bringing in China and South Korea, which had direct leverage over the Pyongyang government, would gain results.

In South, Most Call For New Policy, Own Nukes (WT)

By Andrew Salmon, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 15, 2006

SEOUL -- In less than a week since North Korea claimed to have tested a nuclear weapon, public opinion in the South has turned sharply against a South Korean policy of engaging the enemy in the belief it will eventually bring peace on the divided peninsula.

A JoongAng newspaper poll, several days after the reported nuclear test Monday, found 78 percent of respondents thought South Korea should revise its policy, and 65 percent said South Korea should develop nuclear weapons to protect itself.

Protesters have held nightly candlelight vigils, and some have burned North Korean flags.

"We worry about a war because the regime is so thoughtless," librarian Lee Young-sook said at one rally. "The South Korean people are being held hostage."

North Korea faces United Nations sanctions, approved yesterday in a unanimous vote of the 15-nation Security Council.

South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun has conceded the "sunshine" policy of engagement with North Korea is under threat because of the nuclear test.

A Korea Opinion Institute poll found approval for the opposition Grand National Party (GNP) at 40.1 percent, compared with an approval rating of 11.4 percent for Mr. Roh's ruling Uri Party.

The GNP has demanded that industrial and tourism projects with the North be shut down.

Even the left-wing newspaper Hankyoreh titled its editorial on the nuclear test "Shock and poor judgment."

The architect of South Korea's engagement with the North, former President Kim Dae-jung, remained unmoved by the test.

In a speech at a university Wednesday, he advised the United States to enter bilateral talks with North Korea, blamed American hard-liners for the crisis and said engagement must continue.

Andrei Lankov, a North Korean specialist at Seoul's Kookmin University, said a key weather vane of North-South ties points to North Korea's Mount Kumgang (Diamond Mountain), a resort for South Korean tourists inside the communist state.

"If the government stops the tours to Mount Kumgang, that will really send a message that they are serious," Mr. Lankov said.

The resort, run by South Korean conglomerate Hyundai Asan, has welcomed more than 1 million tourists from the South since 1998, earning the impoverished North hundreds of millions of dollars in foreign currency.

Business has continued at the engagement policy's second flagship project, the joint North-South industrial complex at Kaesong, just inside North Korea.

Fifteen South Korean companies are established in the Seoul-funded project, but South Korea halted expansion after the North tested missiles on July 4 and, on Wednesday, it indefinitely halted further land sales at the site.

U.N.'s Next Leader Urges North Korea (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, October 15, 2006

South Korea's foreign minister, who has promised to make peace with North Korea a top priority as the new U.N. secretary-general, said Saturday the global community must engage the reclusive country in talks over its nuclear program, not just punish it with sanctions.

Ban Ki-moon, who was appointed Friday to succeed Kofi Annan on Jan. 1, said in an interview with the Associated Press that he welcomed the U.N. Security Council's "very clear, strong and unified message to North Korea" in the resolution it adopted Saturday, declaring Pyongyang's claimed nuclear test unacceptable.

The resolution demanded that North Korea give up nuclear weapons, and banned the country from exporting or importing any material for its weapons or ballistic missile programs. It also called on all countries to inspect cargo to or from the North to interdict weapons smuggling, and ordered governments to freeze all assets and ban the travel of anyone involved in illegal trafficking.

"I hope that North Korea will comply with this resolution," Ban said. "I hope that all member states of the United Nations will fully implement this resolution."

The resolution expressly rules out military action against North Korea, and Ban stressed in the interview that "we need a two-pronged approach at this time," relying not only on sanctions but on dialogue and talks.

He urged the North Koreans to return to six-nation talks which Pyongyang has boycotted for 13 months to protest financial measures imposed by the United States for alleged counterfeiting and money-laundering. The boycott began just after an agreement in September 2005 in which the North agreed to give up its nuclear weapons in exchange for security guarantees and aid.

"North Korea should return to the six-party process immediately without any preconditions," Ban said. "We need to have the North Koreans get on board with the negotiations."

"We hope that the North Koreans will take a more reasonable and practical approach for the future. A much brighter future lies ahead if they implement the joint statement adopted last year," he said, referring to its September 2005 pledge to abandon its weapons program.

Ban said he was "very much disappointed" at Saturday's statement by North Korea's U.N. Ambassador Pak Gil Yon, who rejected the resolution and accused the council of a "gangster-like action."

Pak said Pyongyang conducted the nuclear test "to protect its sovereignty" in the face of escalating U.S. threats and sanctions. He added that North Korea would give up its nuclear weapons if it didn't face continued threats from the U.S., stressing the country is ready for dialogue but prepared for confrontation if U.S. pressure intensifies.

"I am very much frustrated at the path North Korea has taken of testing nuclear weapons in violation of all existing regulations and conventions and treaties to prevent the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction," Ban said.

The test was conducted "in total disrespect" of South Korea's humanitarian aid, exchanges and cooperation with the North, he said.

Ban said last month that if he became secretary-general, he would use his authority to further peace, inter-Korean reconciliation, and a peaceful resolution of the North Korean nuclear issue. He also said he wanted to go to North Korea, something Annan never did.

Asked when he would visit the North, Ban said, "First of all I have to see how the situation develops."

"As the Security Council has adopted a very strong resolution, we will see how the resolution is implemented," he added.

Negotiations Must Follow UN's North Korea Action, Analysts Say (BLOOM)

By Jeff Bliss And William Varner

Bloomberg, October 15, 2006

Oct. 15 (Bloomberg) -- The United Nations Security Council resolution punishing North Korea for a suspected nuclear test will only be effective if the Bush administration backs it with negotiations to end the weapons program, some national-security analysts said.

Stephen Bosworth, a former U.S. ambassador to South Korea under President Bill Clinton, said the administration should be congratulated for quickly unifying world opinion against the Oct. 9 test. Yet sanctions alone won't be enough to pressure a government that already is economically and diplomatically isolated, he said.

The resolution is ``an admirable demonstration of international sentiment against what the North Koreans have done," said Bosworth, now dean of the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy at Tufts University in Medford, Massachusetts. ``Will it change North Korea's behavior? Very unlikely."

The resolution, adopted 15-0 yesterday, bans the sale or transfer of missiles, warships, tanks, attack helicopters and combat aircraft, as well as missile- and nuclear-related goods to the North Korean government. It calls for UN member nations to conduct ``inspection of cargo" going to or from North Korea.

President George W. Bush must overrule those in the administration who are reluctant to talk directly with the North Koreans, said Joseph Cirincione, a senior vice president for national security at the Center for American Progress in Washington.

`Important Prods'

The sanctions ``can be very important prods that bring North Korea back to the negotiating table," he said. ``It will be important for the U.S. to be there ready to negotiate."

Those talks could be conducted within the multilateral discussions involving North Korea's neighbors -- Russia, China, South Korea and Japan -- on which the Bush administration has insisted, Cirincione said.

John Tkacik, a former U.S. diplomat in China, said the UN resolution may force the North Koreans back into those talks. If it fails to do so, the crisis might ``persist indefinitely," he said.

``The North Koreans are finding themselves friendless in the world," said Tkacik, now a senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation, a Washington-based research organization. ``Their strategy of defiance is not really working, especially with China and Russia signing into this agreement. This is going to put the squeeze on North Korea even harder."

The latest diplomatic crisis on the Korean peninsula was touched off by North Korean claims that it had conducted an underground nuclear test in the country's mountainous northeastern region.

Radioactivity

The U.S. notified South Korea yesterday that it had detected evidence of radioactivity near the site where North Korea said it conducted the nuclear test. U.S. intelligence officials have said they haven't come to a definitive conclusion about whether a nuclear bomb was exploded.

Bush said the resolution sends a ``clear message" to North Korean leader Kim Jong-Il that he should cease developing nuclear weapons in exchange for help in reviving his country's destroyed economy.

``This action by the United Nations, which was swift and tough, says that we are united in our determination to see to it that the Korea peninsula is nuclear-weapon-free," Bush said at the White House.

Congressional Republicans praised the resolution's passage and highlighted the role of John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the UN. Bolton has been criticized by lawmakers such as Senator Christopher Dodd, a Connecticut Democrat, who say he's brusque and undiplomatic.

``I'm pleased the UN has demonstrated that there are consequences to North Korea's reckless actions," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a Tennessee Republican.

North Korean Response

North Korea, formally known as the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, ``totally rejects" the resolution, Ambassador Pak Gil Yon said yesterday. ``If the U.S. increases pressure on the DPRK, persistently, the DPRK will continue to take physical countermeasures, considering it as a declaration of war."

Pak yesterday walked out of the Security Council chamber when South Korea's envoy began to speak, an action that Bolton compared with Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev pounding his shoe on a desk in the General Assembly in 1960. Bolton suggested that the UN should consider expelling North Korea.

The diplomatic atmosphere is so charged that a mediator such as a high-ranking Chinese official or new UN Secretary-General Ban Ki Moon will be needed to persuade countries to resume negotiations, Cirincione said.

Different Interpretations

Some of the resolution's language is open to interpretation, showing the perils of using the UN to stop nuclear proliferation, said Lee Feinstein, a senior fellow for U.S. foreign policy and international law at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington.

The final text says nations are only ``called upon" to inspect cargo coming from or bound for North Korea ``as necessary."

While Bolton said nations are legally bound to follow through on the provision, Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya said his country doesn't approve of the inspections.

``Even when you get unanimity, you have members like China instantly repudiating key provisions of the resolution they just approved," Feinstein said.

The resolution condemns North Korea's test, says that its nuclear program must be verifiably eliminated and demands that it not conduct any more tests and adhere to the Nuclear Non- Proliferation Treaty.

Freezing Assets

The measure also establishes a Security Council committee to identify people whose financial assets will be frozen because they contributed to North Korea's nuclear and ballistic missile programs. Foreign travel by the designated people would be banned.

Exceptions were made for delivery of humanitarian aid to North Korea.

Adoption of the text comes three months after the Security Council adopted a resolution barring North Korea from acquiring or selling missile technology. That measure was in response to North Korea's July 5 test of seven ballistic missiles.

Whatever the U.S. and its allies decide is their next move, they must act soon, Cirincione said. ``The more they test, the harder it is for them to stop," he said.

What Do We Do Now? (NSWK)

Newsweek

Newsweek, October 15, 2006

Four experts outline their visions for how the world should deal with North Korea and its nuclear threats. WEB EXCLUSIVE

North Korea is a geostrategic nut that—as diplomats from Beijing, Seoul and Washington have learned—is not easily cracked. What might be done to rein in North Korea's nuclear program? NEWSWEEK asked a handful of experts with first-hand knowledge of North Korea for their views on what the U.S. policy toward Pyongyang should be. Excerpts:

President of South Korea (1998-2003) and winner of the Nobel Peace Prize (2000)

The United Nations is contemplating actions against North Korea's nuclear test. The preconditions for any measure should be that we mustn't abide North Korea having nuclear weapons even though they tested one. [Their program] must be completely dismantled. The first option is the use of force, but the United States doesn't have the capability, and neighboring countries like Korea, China, Russia and even Japan are not considering this. The second option is economic sanctions, but there is no guarantee they will bring about the desired result. North Korea's economy could collapse. Another concern is that North Korea might try to sell its nuclear know-how to countries like Iran or Venezuela, two oil producers with a lot of money. The third option is dialogue. I cannot understand why the U.S. is still saying it won't [talk] because North Korea is evil. You can have dialogue even with the devil if necessary. In the past, President Nixon went to China and had dialogue with Mao Zedong. President Reagan called the Soviet Union an "evil empire" but still pursued dialogue. President Eisenhower pursued dialogue with Pyongyang during the Korean War, and because of that there was an armistice that [maintained] peace on the peninsula for the last 50 years. From a country that is very much responsible for world peace, the United States' refusal to talk is quite unacceptable. (Read NEWSWEEK's complete interview with Kim Dae Jung.)

Dean of the Fletcher School at Tufts University and the former U.S. Ambassador to South Korea (1997-2000)

The first thing we need to do is draw a collective deep breath and seek calm. Over time, I think there is going to be mounting pressure on us to engage more directly with the North Koreans. I am not at all confident that any conceivable combination of pressures on North Korea from us, South Korea or China are going to bring about a change of direction on the part of Pyongyang.

If we've learned anything about negotiating with the North Koreans over the last 25 years, it's that they do not react well to pressure. They believe that a crisis atmosphere benefits them; it creates openings [between] other countries that they can exploit, and they believe they're better than anyone else at managing this kind of crisis.

It seems to me there are three possible outcomes: One, we could try to negotiate a package of security assurances and economic goodies for North Korea that would be sufficient to convince them to roll back their nuclear-weapons programs and do so in a verifiable fashion.

The second alternative is that we put increasing pressure on them, including the use of military force, to destroy or at least disrupt their nuclear programs. The problem is that once you cross that path, you have no assurance that you're going to be able to contain the ensuing situation. It is stupid to assume that we could strike North Korea without provoking a counter-strike from them in some fashion. And while we may be willing to contemplate that—our national territory is a long way away from them—we do however have troops and lots of American civilians in Korea and Japan. What may seem to be a tolerable price to pay for destroying [North Korea's] nuclear programs would probably not seem so tolerable to South Koreans and Japanese. Added to that is the complicating factor that I doubt we have any real idea where their remaining nuclear devices or materials might be located.

The third outcome is that we learn to live with a nuclear North Korea. To do that, we would obviously have to have very close and careful cooperation with the parties in the region. We would have to lay down some very explicit red lines as to what would be tolerable or intolerable, including selling or exporting materials to other countries or other organizations. Two or three years ago, I had a significant level of confidence that a negotiated outcome was feasible, but I am no longer quite that confident.

We've got to listen to the North Koreans as they tell us what they think they want—that is, direct contact with the United States, not simply through the six-party process, but they want direct contact of the sort that we had under Bush One and under Clinton. To say we've tried that and it failed, as the president did [Thursday]—I simply don't agree with that. What is the disadvantage? Rewarding their bad behavior? That's patent nonsense. We talk all the time to people who behave badly.

Hans Blix

Veteran Swedish diplomat who headed the U.N.'s Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission. From 1981 to 1997, he served as director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, during which time he oversaw inspections of Iraq's nuclear program. Today he chairs the Stockholm-based Weapons of Mass Destruction Commission.

[For Washington,] I think the latest statement from [President] Bush is relatively conciliatory. The [administration's] anger is understandable, but you have to convince and reassure [the North Koreans], too. You have to understand that when most countries turn to nuclear weapons, whether it's Iran or Pakistan or China, it's because of their perceptions of their own security. In the case of North Korea, it is reasonable to guess that while once they felt supported by Russia or China, now they no longer feel that way. And for a long time they have felt under threat from the United States—and they have seen what has happened in Iraq. Whether you can now say that the [conciliatory] "Sunshine Policy" [adopted by South Korea] has now failed, I am doubtful. In fact, I think it's the continued waving of the stick that may be dangerous.

The North Koreans now have a choice: they have to decide what would protect them better—paper assurances or nuclear weapons. To persuade them to go down the paper assurance route, I think you have to put some more carrots on the table. There's the possibility of offering diplomatic relations, for example, or [that] they could get more [aid] from the World Bank. As others have said, too, they should get assistance and gradually abandon their disastrous economic structure—not for a free market economy but for something like Vietnam's or China's.

We have to decide on our priority too. Is it human rights or making the regime in North Korea step back from nuclear weapons? A lot of valuable time has been lost by our ambivalent attitude in the past. We are harvesting what we have sown. The constraint is domestic policies in the West. With the elections coming up in America, Bush wants to be seen as firm, to look macho. In [an earlier crisis] in 1994, when I was at the IAEA, [former President] Jimmy Carter went to Pyongyang and met Kim Il Sung. Maybe another such trick is needed today.

Gordon G. Chang

Author of "Nuclear Showdown: North Korea Takes on the World" (Random House 2006)

I think it's important to disarm Kim Jong Il, because if you do that it will go a long way to also stopping the Iranian weapons program, too. For years, the Iranians have been watching the North Koreans and, more important, they have been watching the international community's reaction to Kim Jong Il's increasingly provocative behavior.

How do we stop both of those programs? I think there is a common tactic for North Korea and Iran. Both countries have two primary sponsors: North Korea has China and South Korea, and Iran has China and Russia. Historically, the Chinese have stood up to the U.S. when they've had [diplomatic support from other countries], and they have been accommodating when they've been isolated. So the real trick for American diplomacy is to isolate China, because that puts China in a position where it has no choice but to be responsible and to do the right thing.

Right now in Beijing there are many officials and analysts who believe it is in China's interest to be cooperative with the United States and to help disarm Kim Jong Il. And China can do that because it supplies 90 percent of North Korea's fuel oil, 80 percent of its consumer goods and somewhere between 40 and 45 percent of North Korea's food. If China wanted to, it could disarm Kim Jong Il next week: there would be no nuclear weapons program, no missiles program and indeed there would be no North Korea, and the North Koreans know this.

But there is no consensus in Beijing to change the focus of their foreign policy-supporting Kim Jong Il because there are many Chinese who maintain close ties with their North Korean counterparts, especially in the military. It's important for the United States to create the conditions under which the more progressive forces in Beijing are going to win out. The Chinese are ruthlessly pragmatic, and if we apply leverage, I believe that China will fall into line—especially so if we are able to solidify our military alliance with South Korea, because then that leaves China in a very difficult position. Ultimately, they value their relationship with us more than they value their relationship with North Korea.

The first issue is the U.N. Security Council deliberations right now. We have to make it clear to China that it's now or never. They're either stakeholders in the international system or they're adversaries of it. There is just no middle ground when the world is at such risk.

The Bush administration put sanctions in place about a year ago [to stop] North Korea's currency counterfeiting program. They've been surprisingly effective in constricting the flow of funds in and out of North Korea. They are really starting to hurt the regime. I don't think it's the time to loosen them; on the contrary, I believe the sanctions should be tightened. There is a concern about how sanctions would hurt the North Korean people, but by maintaining the regime, we maintain a repressive system, which is going to cause suffering for even more North Koreans in the future.

Hazel Smith

Professor in international relations at Warwick University in Britain. She spent two years in North Korea earlier this decade, helping to run the United Nations' food-relief program. Her latest book is "Hungry for Peace: International Security, Humanitarian Assistance and Social Change in North Korea."

The U.S. has to cut the rhetoric and get on with [diplomacy]. That means it has to have something to offer the North Koreans rather than just beating them about the head. All the other parties in the six-party talks now want America to start direct talks [with Pyongyang] and it could be done without loss of face in the context of multilateral negotiations. If America stops tightening the screws, the North Koreans will give. That's diplomacy.

What the North Koreans want is recognition—the buzzword is 'normalization.' And [in return] they might accept tight verification as part of some form of disarmament deal. They are utterly pragmatic. What they really want is money for economic redevelopment. The trouble is that America is paralyzed—with parts of the State Department wanting to negotiate while others refuse because they believe it's a moral issue.

Could sanctions succeed? It all depends on whether China and South Korea join in. The North Koreans' only substantial trade—including illicit trade—is with China. The complication is that so much of the trade is on a concessionary basis, and if sanctions covered fertilizers you would see starvation within months. North Korean agriculture isn't up to subsistence level. They are already on the brink.

China will probably go for a harsh form of words [denunciation of North Korea] at the United Nations. What they want to avoid is a resolution so wide open that it gives the United States cover for any form of military action. The real space to watch is the bilateral relationship between China and North Korea. What little development that's taking place in North Korea is all down to Chinese businesses. Just by cutting off oil, they could shut down the whole North Korean transport network.

The real danger is not the bomb. The North Koreans are not stupid enough to drop it on anyone. The real danger is that there will be a nuclear accident. They know the physics but they have no quality assurance systems and no engineering skills.

Their culture is one of make-do-and-mend. Basically they have a homemade bomb and a homemade nuclear reactor of the same type as at Chernobyl. If there was an accident they have no capacity to deal with it, and are unlikely to call in help from outside until it is too late.

Worldview | Why Talks With N. Korea Eventually Must Resume (PHI)

By Trudy Rubin

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 15, 2006

North Korea's apparent test of a nuclear weapon has provoked another debate over whether it's worth negotiating with rogue states.

I believe this is not the moment for a U.S. dialogue with Pyongyang. This dangerous regime, with its track record of illegal weapons sales, must be disabused of any idea that it can get a free pass to the nuclear club. Strong U.N. economic sanctions are crucial, backed by a united front of U.S. and Asian powers. Also crucial is President Bush's warning that North Korea will be held accountable if it passes nuclear materiel to other states or groups.

But then what? I've talked to no one - dove, hawk or owl - who believes sanctions alone will force Kim Jong Il to give up his arsenal. Nor does anyone believe military force is a viable option (provided Kim doesn't sell his plutonium to al-Qaeda or Iran).

Unless sanctions are crafted to prod North Korea back to the table, it's hard to see any chance of curbing Pyongyang's nuclear program. But can talks with North Korea work?

Republicans contend that the Clinton-era negotiations with North Korea were a failure and demonstrate why talks are pointless. But that assessment stands history on its head.

In 1994, North Korea was threatening to quit the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and turn spent reactor fuel into bomb-grade plutonium. The Clinton administration prepared for a possible military strike, but then turned to former President Jimmy Carter as negotiator in Pyongyang.

The result was the 1994 Agreed Framework, under which North Korea sealed its Yongbyon reactor and fuel rods and put them under U.N. inspection. Had that reactor not remained frozen until 2002, it could have produced enough fuel to make dozens of bombs.

On taking office, President Bush labeled North Korea part of the "axis of evil" and made clear he was more interested in "regime change" than talks. Then in 2002, U.S. officials found evidence that North Korea was cheating on the agreement, by pursuing a secret effort to enrich uranium. The United States drew back from the Agreed Framework, and North Korea expelled U.N. inspectors and started making nuclear weapons.

Yet a simple cost-benefit analysis shows that the Agreed Framework had still been a success. Clinton's negotiations stopped a program that was already capable of making bomb materiel. The secret uranium program, by contrast, is a long-term undertaking, and there are no signs that it has produced weapons materiel.

True, the Clinton administration's negotiations didn't end North Korea's nuclear program - but they did delay the production of weapons for eight years. Some on the Bush team now advocate bombing Iran's nuclear energy facilities - at terrible risk - just to delay the Iranian program perhaps three to five years.

Since the collapse of the Agreed Framework on the Bush watch, North Korea has produced about six to 12 nuclear weapons.

President Bush finally decided, during his second term, to try negotiations in concert with our Asian allies. He finally let U.S. negotiator Chris Hill meet directly with North Korea officials within those six-nation talks. This direct dialogue led to a promising joint statement in September 2005, in which Pyongyang pledged to dismantle its nuclear program in return for security guarantees and aid.

Those talks eventually fell apart, too. Many experts believe that a key cause was disagreement within the administration over whether the U.S. goal should be to change North Korea's regime or its behavior. Just as the joint statement was signed, U.S. officials were pursuing international bank sanctions against North Korea. These may have been justified in principle - the Pyongyang regime is a notorious counterfeiter and smuggler - but the timing seemed designed to kill any deal.

Now, North Korea has tested a weapon and is poised to make more bombs. Once again, the White House must choose its approach to this recalcitrant regime.

Talks with North Korea are horribly frustrating, and it is unclear whether Kim will ever give up his weapons. He may have taken the lesson from the Iraq invasion (as Iran has) that nukes are his guarantee of keeping power. There is strong Bush resistance to talks - especially direct talks - or sending a U.S. emissary along the lines of a Carter. And the chances of success are much slimmer now than under Clinton.

But at some point, the White House will have to decide whether it wants to pursue the small chance of freezing Pyongyang's program, or at least limiting the number of weapons. As Gary Samore of the Council on Foreign Relations says: "If they only have enough materiel for six bombs, they are less likely to sell it than if they have enough for 24 bombs."

Perhaps Bush will listen to his father's key adviser, James Baker 3d, who is already tasked with reassessing America's Iraq strategy. Baker recently said, "I believe in talking to your enemies. It's got to be hard-nosed, it's got to be determined. You don't give away anything, but in my view, it's not appeasement to talk to your enemies."

Baker has already spoken with an Iranian representative.

Pyongyang next?

China Buys The Soft Sell (WP)

By Joshua Kurlantzick

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

North Korea may have conducted a nuclear test last week, but it was China that went a little ballistic. Beijing condemned its longtime ally, denouncing North Korean leader Kim Jong Il's "flagrant and brazen" violation of global norms. Pyongyang, China declared, had "defied the universal opposition of international society."

Other nations joined the chorus of concern over North Korea's apparent entry into the nuclear club. But China remains the one country that can do more than fume and condemn. It now has the chance to wield the diplomatic influence it has carefully been amassing in recent years as it pursues a new strategy in Asia and elsewhere in the world. Call it Chinese power, 21st-century-style.

While Washington has focused on the fight against terrorism, China has quietly reoriented its foreign policy to emerge as a new advocate of "soft power" -- a combination of diplomatic outreach, cultural attractiveness and economic might that helps a nation persuade other countries to follow its lead.

North Korea is a case in point. China has lately become Pyongyang's major trading partner and source of aid. Chinese leaders have taken Kim on tours of their booming south to suggest how he might boost his backward economy, and they have trained North Korean officials in economic management. It was Beijing that helped persuade Pyongyang to come to the negotiating table for the six-party talks on North Korea's nuclear program.

It's all part of an international charm offensive that could threaten U.S. interests abroad, but could also -- if properly exploited by other nations -- transform the Asian giant into a more responsible member of the world community.

Beijing has embraced the concept of soft power with vigor. In recent years, it has dispatched more than 2,000 volunteer language instructors all over the world to teach Mandarin; upgraded its diplomatic corps (half of the country's 4,000 diplomats are reportedly younger than 35); boosted its foreign aid to match the United States as a donor in some countries; increased overseas investment; promoted the study of Chinese culture worldwide; and launched a frenzy of trade initiatives, developing more than 10 free-trade deals in the past five years.

China has even created its own version of the Peace Corps -- the China Association for Youth Volunteers. Like its U.S. counterpart, it sends young people to developing countries such as Burma, Ethiopia and Laos to work on long-term community-assistance projects -- and to polish China's global image in the process.

While it initially concentrated on the immediate neighborhood of Southeast Asia, China has lately expanded its soft power play into Latin America, Central Asia and Africa. Thousands of young professionals from sub-Saharan Africa now travel to China on scholarships provided by Beijing. Trade between the continent and China grew by more than 260 percent between 2001 and 2005. China offers Africa about $2.7 billion annually in loans and grants.

Beijing has also been busy planning Confucius Institutes -- Chinese language and culture schools attached to universities -- in key African nations such as Kenya, as well as countries such as Uzbekistan and the Philippines. And Chinese officials shrewdly advertise these initiatives at new summits such as the China-Africa Cooperation Forum, which was established in 2000, and the upcoming China-Africa summit next month.

The Chinese leadership's decision to go soft was a conscious one, a reaction to Western shunning after the Tiananmen Square crackdown in 1989 and the failure of China's attempts in the 1990s to use its growing military force to intimidate its neighbors into choosing Beijing over Washington. And it has yielded some dazzling success.

A BBC poll last year of 22 nations found that nearly all believed that China played a more positive role in the world than the United States. Today, Southeast Asian officials compete for junkets and training in China. "We have no money, and this is the only training we can get," a top official in Laos's Foreign Ministry told me. Chinese aid funds roads and hospitals across Asia, and neighboring countries orient their commerce toward Beijing: Growing trade with China has transformed Chiang Saen, a formerly sleepy Thai village on the Mekong River. Today, container vessels arrive with crates of Chinese apples that are unloaded into trucks lined up at the town's port, while Chinese traders gather at flashy massage parlors to barter with importers.

China's newfound popularity could raise a host of problems internationally. Its emergence as a donor country may allow aid recipients to play Beijing off against organizations such as the World Bank. Just this summer, Chad moved toward evicting two oil companies, Chevron Corp. and Malaysia's Petronas, from a project backed by the bank, which had insisted that some of the oil profits be spent on improving social welfare. There's a chance that Chad may replace the oil firms with Chinese companies; at the same time that it was kicking out Chevron and Petronas, it was breaking relations with Taiwan and establishing ties with China. China's growing foreign investment could also contribute to environmental destruction, because Chinese firms have little experience with green policies at home.

Worse, as Beijing charms the world, it could persuade other developing nations to choose a Chinese growth model -- promoting gradual economic change but clamping down on any political opening. Many foreign leaders, even in democracies, undeniably want to emulate China's breakneck development. "There's great admiration for China," says Dewi Fortuna Anwar, former assistant minister for foreign affairs in Indonesia. Even the head of the African Development Bank told the World Economic Forum in January that Africa can learn from the Chinese.

But as Beijing's profile rises, its foreign policy will also come under greater scrutiny. Its leaders will have to do more to maintain the country's appeal -- and this could be the opportunity the West needs to bend China toward becoming a more responsible international power and moving away from some of its more roguish friends, such as North Korea, Iran and Venezuela.

On core issues such as regime survival or vital oil and gas fields, change is unlikely. But there has been some positive movement on other fronts. Though China once disdained treaties, it has lately proved increasingly willing to work with multilateral institutions. Its image improved significantly in Asia after it signed the Association of Southeast Asian Nations' Treaty of Amity and Cooperation, the landmark agreement in the region.

Burma is another example of how China might be prodded to look beyond its narrowest interests. Burmese activists are adopting a strategy of quietly emphasizing to China that reflexive support for the regime in Rangoon will only exacerbate instability on China's borders and stir up anti-China sentiment among ordinary Burmese. They have a point. In Chinese towns near Burma, heroin junkies sleep in alleys, waiting for drug shipments from across the border. Inside Burma, domestic instability has made it easy for armed Burmese thugs to kidnap Chinese business people in the country.

And the strategy shows some signs that it's working. Chinese officials have begun cultivating relations with exiled Burmese dissidents, a step unthinkable only five years ago. At the same time, Chinese Prime Minister Wen Jiabao has prodded Burma to engage with its democratic opposition, and China has allowed the U.N. Security Council to take up Burma's human rights and security crises, suggesting that Beijing might also be willing to accept tough U.N. action against North Korea.

Similarly, Chinese diplomats say that Beijing became serious about using its influence to fight disease only after the SARS and bird flu crises made the government recognize how cross-border disease could produce instability. In response, China held a donor conference on bird flu this year that raised $2 billion in pledges.

In other cases, activists and foreign governments could try to convince Beijing that soft power exercised irresponsibly will hurt Chinese companies operating abroad. If local populations see China's soft power as undermining their freedom and social welfare, top Chinese corporations will never become competitive international players. Instead, Chinese businesses will suffer the kind of guilt by association that tars American companies such as McDonald's, which can at least draw upon massive advertising budgets to combat the United States's poor global image.

Beijing desperately wants to prevent Chinese firms from facing the kind of security threats that Western companies confront, but it's beginning to happen. Though China recently promised Nigeria $4 billion in new investment, armed militants have warned Beijing to stay away from the Niger Delta, where they think oil firms are destroying the waterways and Chinese companies could contribute to environmental damage.

In other countries, such as South Africa and Zambia, workers have protested Chinese firms' labor policies. Locals had celebrated several years ago when China revitalized Zambia's decrepit Chambishi copper mine. But when 49 miners died in an accident in April 2005, their families received no compensation; the resulting anger was so great that Chambishi's Chinese managers stayed away from the workers' funerals for fear of being attacked.

In the recent Zambian election, opposition candidate Michael Sata played on this anger, accusing Chinese companies of exploiting local workers and threatening to evict the Chinese firms if he won. When Sata lost, his supporters rioted in the Zambian capital, targeting Chinese businesses.

But China's growing soft power most needs checking as Beijing begins using its leverage to meddle in other countries' domestic politics. Before Sata lost, China's ambassador to Zambia had warned that Beijing might cut off diplomatic ties to the country depending upon whom Zambians chose for president. In interviews across Asia, Africa and Latin America, activists, politicians, writers and other opinion leaders expressed to me their fears that growing Chinese influence in their countries could stifle political change, though they simultaneously hope that Beijing can use its diplomatic influence to restrain Asia's most dangerous actors, such as North Korea.

China has amassed impressive soft power -- now it has to prove that it's willing to use it wisely.

Restraints Fray As Nuclear Age Grows Globally (NYT)

By William J. Broad And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

The declaration last Monday by North Korea that it had conducted a successful atomic test brought to nine the number of nations believed to have nuclear arms. But atomic officials estimate that as many as 40 more countries have the technical skill, and in some cases the required material, to build a bomb.

That ability, coupled with new nuclear threats in Asia and the Middle East, risks a second nuclear age, officials and arms control specialists say, in which nations are more likely to abandon the old restraints against atomic weapons.

The spread of nuclear technology is expected to accelerate as nations redouble their reliance on atomic power. That will give more countries the ability to make reactor fuel, or, with the same equipment and a little more effort, bomb fuel — the hardest part of the arms equation.

Signs of activity abound. Hundreds of companies are now prospecting for uranium where dozens did a few years ago. Argentina, Australia and South Africa are drawing up plans to begin enriching uranium, and other countries are considering doing the same. Egypt is reviving its program to develop nuclear power.

Concern about the situation led the International Atomic Energy Agency to summon hundreds of government officials and experts from around the world to Vienna in September to discuss tightening restrictions on who is permitted to produce nuclear fuel.

“These dangers are urgent,” Sam Nunn, an expert on nuclear proliferation and a former Democratic senator, told the group. “We are in a race between cooperation and catastrophe and, at this moment, the outcome is unclear.”

But even the atomic agency itself exemplifies some of the underlying tensions inherent in the development of nuclear energy.

For decades, the I.A.E.A., known as the world's nuclear policeman, has pursued its other mandate — to promote safe nuclear power — by running technical aid programs with roughly a hundred states. Some of that knowledge could be useful in a weapons program, though the aid is meant exclusively for civilian use.

The agency still helps Pakistan, which exploded a nuclear bomb in 1998. It also helped North Korea until a decade ago. Even today, it is assisting Iran, which many experts fear is close to mastering the basics of making a bomb. It has 14 programs under way with Iran, including a study on upgrading a nuclear research laboratory, as well as helping it start up its Bushehr reactor.

North Korea's reported test has shaken the nuclear status quo and raised anew the question of whether Asia will be the first to feel a nuclear "domino effect," in which states clandestinely hedge their bets by assembling the crucial technologies needed to make a bomb, or actually cross the line to become new weapons states. In the Middle East, the confrontation with Iran has focused new attention on countries like Saudi Arabia and Egypt, both of which fear that an Iranian bomb would make Tehran the greatest power in the region.

Mohamed ElBaradei, the director general of the I.A.E.A., has estimated that up to 49 nations now know how to make nuclear arms, and he has warned that global tensions could push some over the line.

"We are relying," he said, "primarily on the continued good intentions of these countries — intentions which are in turn based on their sense of security or insecurity, and could therefore be subject to rapid change."

Worry about proliferation is hardly new. In March 1963, President John F. Kennedy said, "I am haunted by the feeling that by 1970, unless we are successful, there may be 10 nuclear powers instead of 4, and by 1975, 15 or 20." That timetable proved to be inaccurate. But in recent years there has been a sense around the globe that President Kennedy's prediction is about to come true, three decades late.

Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary general, said this year that "the international community seems almost to be sleepwalking" down a path where states, after long living without nuclear arms, now feel compelled to revisit their logic.

He warned of a new arms race — not one of superpowers, but of regional powers. "Perhaps most damaging of all," he concluded, "there is also a perception that the possession of nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction offers the best protection against being attacked."

A New Nuclear Vision

Democrats and Republicans spent the past week arguing over who lost control of North Korea, Bill Clinton or George W. Bush. But seeds of the problem were planted by President Dwight D. Eisenhower, just months after the armistice ended the fighting on the Korean Peninsula in 1953.

"It is not enough to take this weapon out of the hands of soldiers," President Eisenhower told the United Nations that year, just as his administration was completing a series of 11 nuclear tests. "It must be put in the hands of those who will know how to strip its military casing and adapt it to the arts of peace."

His program was called Atoms for Peace, and soon involved dozens of nations, all seeking to unlock the magic of nuclear power. The first generation of nuclear reactors sprang up around the globe, as did a huge supporting industry and an international overseer, the I.A.E.A.

But almost from the start, evidence accumulated that countries were using the civil alliances and reactor technologies to make bombs. By 1960, France had joined the United States, Britain and the Soviet Union as a nuclear weapons state. China conducted its first test in 1964. Israel had the bomb by 1967, India by 1974, South Africa by 1982 (it has since given up its weapons) and Pakistan by 1998.

All but the original three built their weapons by exploiting at least some technologies that were ostensibly civilian, nuclear analysts say. They enriched uranium beyond the low level needed for power reactors. Or they mined the spent fuel of civil reactors for plutonium — the path that North Korea started taking in the late 1980's or early 1990's, according to American intelligence officials.

The international atomic agency, which still inscribes Atoms for Peace on its business cards, has worked hard to fight this kind of cheating while also helping with the basic technology. In the 1980's, it aided Iran's hunt for uranium.

Even today, Iranian technicians fly to Vienna and agency experts go to Iran to lend a hand. In August, two experts went to review progress at the Bushehr reactor, which is scheduled to go critical next year.

"It's helping establish that the plant is run in a safe and secure manner, which is in everybody's interest," said M. Peter Salema, an agency official. "Look at Chernobyl. That's the whole point."

Many of the agency's cooperative projects use nuclear science to humanitarian ends, like fighting disease and treating cancer. But others involve more basic atomic skills.

"We provide expert services," Dr. Salema said, "so they can learn to do things for themselves."

The Technology Boom

The Manhattan project scientists who built the first atom bomb predicted that the diffusion of their secret knowledge was inevitable. It was just a question of time. Now, after decades of scholarly digging, government declassification, open research in uranium and plutonium metallurgy and the rise of the Internet, much of that information is freely available.

"The general concepts are widely known," said Robert S. Norris, the author of "Racing for the Bomb." "Still, it's another thing to actually do it. That still requires certain skills of engineering and chemistry and physics."

The hardest part, experts agree, is not acquiring the weapons blueprints but obtaining the fuel. That is becoming easier because of developments both overt and covert.

Abdul Qadeer Khan, a chief architect of Pakistan's nuclear arms program who went on to establish the world's largest atomic black market, sold the secrets of how to make centrifuges for enriching uranium to Libya, Iran and North Korea. Tehran insists its intentions are entirely peaceful, though most analysts judge that all three countries bought from the black market because they wanted to make nuclear arms.

Dr. Khan sold plans and parts for Pakistan's first-generation centrifuge, the P-1, as well as the next generation, the P-2, which can spin faster to enrich uranium more rapidly.

Investigators are still trying to learn where else Dr. Khan may have planted his nuclear seeds. They discovered outposts of his network in Dubai, Malaysia and South Africa and found that before his downfall in 2004 he visited at least 18 countries, including Egypt, Niger, Nigeria, Sudan, Syria and Saudi Arabia.

The worrisome enrichment trends involve not just stealthy military advances but also soaring demands for nuclear power, driven by rising populations, dwindling oil supplies and fears that the combustion of fossil fuels is warming the planet.

"The nuclear renaissance is gaining momentum," said George B. Assie, vice president for business development at Cameco, the world's largest publicly traded uranium company, based in Canada.

In London, the World Nuclear Association says 28 new reactors are under construction, 62 planned, and 160 proposed, most in Asia. The required uranium, it estimates, could run to more than 65,000 tons.

While it is not clear if the expansion of the world's civilian atomic infrastructure will ultimately lead to a rise in the number of countries building nuclear arms, it could give more countries the means to do so.

There are two main ways to turn civilian technology to military use. The first is to enrich uranium fuel from its usual level of 5 percent for reactors to the 90 percent needed for a bomb, a modest step that requires longer processing in centrifuges. The second is to take spent reactor fuel and mine it for plutonium, the other main fuel for a bomb.

The Brazilian military, for example, worked hard for decades to develop centrifuges to enrich uranium fuel for a bomb, a secret program it renounced in the 1990's.

In May, Brazil, despite growing pressure to give up indigenous production, inaugurated its first uranium enrichment plant — an assembly of advanced centrifuges in Resende, in the state of Rio de Janeiro. While Iran has aroused global suspicions for erecting a similar plant, Brazil managed to reassure other nations, and the international atomic agency, that its aims are peaceful.

"We have an urgent need to expand the electric system," said Leonam dos Santos Guimarães, an official of Electronuclear, which operates nuclear power plants in Brazil.

Forecasting the size of the revitalized global industry is difficult. Even so, the predictions can be staggering. Hans-Holger Rogner, an economist at the international atomic agency, said that many forecasts for the 21st century foresaw huge expansions beyond the 443 power reactors now operating globally.

"An increase to 5,000 reactors is well within the range of many of the longer-range studies," Dr. Rogner said, adding: "People are positioning themselves. There seems to be a race coming and nobody wants to be left out."

A Complex Game

A day after North Korea's nuclear test, Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, vowed not to abandon Japan's commitment to reject and never possess nuclear weapons, a cornerstone of Japanese foreign policy since Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

But, even so, Japan already has all the component parts. It has many tons of plutonium left over from the operation of its reactors, according to a 2004 government report to the I.A.E.A. A small nuclear warhead requires only 10 pounds.

Japan is the ultimate example of a "nuclear option" state, a country that the world knows could become an atomic power virtually overnight, if need be. "They could be very far down the road toward a virtual deterrent and not be in violation of any of the existing international treaties," said Robert L. Gallucci, the former chief American negotiator with North Korea, and now dean of Georgetown University's school of foreign service.

South Korea has also vowed not to pursue nuclear weapons. But it has an extensive network of nuclear power reactors and a few years ago, I.A.E.A. inspectors found evidence of undeclared experimentation to make highly enriched uranium. In the early 1990's, South Korea signed an agreement to keep the Korean Peninsula nuclear-free — but it signed the accord with North Korea.

Iran's nuclear rise has prompted concerns that the Middle East could experience similar pressures. In the region, only Israel is believed to possess nuclear arms, although it has never confirmed that. If Iran — a Shiite state — does indeed build nuclear weapons, there are fears that Sunni powers like Saudi Arabia or Egypt will be tempted to make their own bombs.

Egypt, which long ago sought to build nuclear arms, may be starting to rethink its earlier renunciation. The 1998 nuclear tests by India and Pakistan shook Cairo. "Egypt's leaders had placed their bet clearly in favor of the Middle East and the world moving away from nuclear weapons," said Robert J. Einhorn, a former senior State Department nonproliferation official. "But here was a disquieting indication that movement might be in the opposite direction."

Recently, the international atomic agency found that Egypt had kept some of its old and new efforts cloaked in secrecy, including a continuing project to acquire uranium ore in the Sinai desert. In September, Cairo announced plans to revive its stalled program to build reactors for generating nuclear power. It gave no sign of whether it, like Iran, planned to make reactor fuel on its own.

So the question now is whether North Korea's test, and Iran's challenge, will change the calculus. "When additional countries get the bomb, it does create new pressures," said Matthew Bunn of the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard, who tracks the spread of nuclear technology. "But each country is unique and there's little risk that the dominoes will fall quickly, especially if we take steps to prevent it."

New Ground Rules

When atomic specialists gathered in Vienna in September to discuss new ground rules for a second nuclear age, their proceedings were fueled by the fear that some of the old restraints — both technological and political — are fraying.

The central proposal debated at the I.A.E.A.'s headquarters sounded simple: No longer should nations be permitted to develop their own means of enriching uranium to make reactor fuel, which Iran and other developing states have claimed as their inalienable right under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. Nearly 40 years after the treaty was drafted, the dangers simply seem too great.

Instead, the argument went, nations should band together to make multinational fuel banks where they could watch one another, making sure no fuel is diverted for bomb production.

"A threat exists," said Sergei Kirienko, director of the Russian Federal Atomic Energy Agency. "We understand that only those solutions that are resolved together, that ensure access for all nations today, will be successful."

Russia took the lead, proposing an international fuel bank that it would set up on its own soil by next year — and from which it could potentially extract billions of dollars in sales. But the big splash came when Warren E. Buffett, the billionaire philanthropist, pledged $50 million for a fuel bank to be run by the I.A.E.A., making the United Nations body a "supplier of last resort" for any country that forsakes making its own fuel. The Bush administration has backed similar plans.

But while there is agreement on the problem, solutions bogged down in bickering — from weapons states that want to maintain their capacity and from developing nations that sniff a conspiracy to deny them the same nuclear rights that large powers have long enjoyed.

"We should guard against the notion that sensitive technologies are safe in the hands of some, but pose a risk when others have access to them," said Buyelwa Sonjica, the energy minister of South Africa, which wants to restart its enrichment program and build up to six reactors.

Few parties involved in the debate are optimistic about reform, and some say the enterprise is doomed to failure.

"Nuclear power is inextricably linked with nuclear proliferation," the environmental group Greenpeace said in a recent statement. "None of the schemes being promoted will solve this problem. In fact, they will make it worse."

So far, though, the countries that the world most wants to stop from enriching say they have seen no reason to do so.

At a dinner in New York in September, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran looked supremely confident as he batted away the idea that other countries could be relied upon to provide him with the nuclear fuel he said he needed.

"Before stopping enrichment by others, why don't you stop building the next generation of nuclear weapons?" he asked his American hosts. Then, smiling, he suggested that the United States just buy its nuclear fuel from Iran's new facilities. He would sell it to Washington, he said, "with a 50 percent discount."

A New Global Nuclear Order (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

North Korea ... Iran ... and the list is growing. The treaty that once limited the spread of atomic weapons know-how is unraveling.

PARIS — When North Korea announced its nuclear test last week, it was just the latest sign that the effort to contain the spread of atomic weapons was breaking down: Several countries are on the verge of beginning uranium enrichment programs, and others have already started such efforts, policymakers and experts say.

Brazil recently inaugurated an industrial-scale uranium enrichment plant, and Argentina and South Africa are interested in similar projects. Australia, which has large supplies of natural uranium, is also considering an enrichment program. Iran has defied requests by the international community to suspend its program to enrich uranium, the first step toward making the fissile material suitable for a bomb.

North Korea's announcement of a test follows ones by India and Pakistan in 1998. The rise of a new generation of nuclear states has led to increasing concerns that others could follow, and fueled fears that the more countries with nuclear capability, the greater the risk that fissile material will fall into terrorist hands.

"We are, at present, at the unraveling of the nonproliferation regime and the global nuclear order that we've taken for granted," said Graham Allison, a former assistant secretary of Defense under President Clinton, who directs the Belfer Center for Science and International Affairs at Harvard University. "This is a huge event whose importance may only become evident in five years….

"In terms of global order, global nuclear order, this is a nuclear blast," he said.

On Saturday, the United Nations Security Council unanimously adopted a resolution imposing sanctions on North Korea for its declared nuclear test Monday.

But China's reluctance to take part in inspections of North Korean cargo to help stop the flow of weapons materials throws into doubt how effective the sanctions can be.

Policymakers point to three levels of problems with the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, which has been in force for 36 years: weaknesses in the treaty itself, at the political level in the Security Council, and at the technical level in the ability of nuclear inspectors to detect undisclosed nuclear programs.

Countries that had nuclear weapons when the treaty went into effect — the United States, Russia, Britain, France and China — were allowed to keep them, whereas others were asked to forswear them.

The "haves" made the commitment to reduce and eventually eliminate their arsenals, and the "have-nots" agreed not to seek atomic weapons as long as they could have the advantages of nuclear technology for peaceful purposes.

The International Atomic Energy Agency, the United Nations' nuclear watchdog, was put in charge of making sure countries refrained from taking steps toward making fissile material suitable for bombs. But the treaty, in effect, permitted any country that wanted nuclear weapons capability to go down that road.

Nuclear technology is such that once a country masters uranium enrichment, it is relatively easy to go from low-level enrichment, which produces fuel for nuclear power plants, to high-level enrichment, which produces material used for a bomb.

Although 187 countries have signed the treaty, some developing nations are skeptical of the intentions of the five original nuclear states and are reluctant to give up the option of enriching uranium, leaving the door cracked to nuclear weapons capability.

Immediately after the Cold War, the United States and Russia reduced their nuclear arsenals by thousands of weapons. Since then there has been a standstill.

There are now about 27,000 nuclear warheads worldwide — the vast majority in the U.S. and Russia. And most of the five original nuclear states have moved to modernize or, in China's case, expand their arsenals.

Countries that have pursued nuclear capability outside the treaty or by hiding their programs have, after an initial distancing by the international community, gone unpunished over the long term.

Three countries — India, Pakistan and Israel — refused to sign the treaty. Pakistan and India have developed nuclear weapons, and Israel is thought to have them.

All three enjoy the favor and respect of world leaders, setting an example of what countries can get when they acquire nuclear weapons.

India and Pakistan, initially sanctioned over their nuclear tests, have seen the bans diminish, and India has been offered a multibillion-dollar deal with the United States that includes nuclear technology. The agreement has not been approved by the U.S. Senate.

Two other countries have refused to abide by the treaty, although they signed it: Iran and North Korea. The latter withdrew from the treaty three years ago. Neither nation has suffered significant consequences for refusing to comply.

That is because until Saturday, the five veto-wielding members of the Security Council could not agree on a punishment. At least one of the five has had national interests that superseded its intention to bring the countries to heel.

The only early-warning system to detect countries that are going down the nuclear weapons road appears unable to do its job. The International Atomic Energy Agency has failed to detect cheating by countries at an early stage in part because it lacks the authority to do necessary investigations.

It also has no enforcement power to stop what it discovers and can only report to the Security Council, which has had trouble agreeing on appropriate punishments.

"This has been an accident waiting to happen for a long time. The stresses and strains in the nonproliferation architecture have been apparent for many years," said a senior Western official from a nonnuclear weapons nation who is involved in his country's nuclear policy. "You can point the finger pretty much at anybody and they have a part in the blame."

Western countries with nuclear arsenals want to work within the system, which allows them to keep their weapons. Their policymakers insist that, overall, the system is working pretty well. They note that, under the treaty, several countries have given up nuclear weapons, including Libya, South Africa and the former Soviet republic of Kazakhstan.

"I don't agree that the problem is that there hasn't been disarmament by the nuclear weapons countries. The [treaty] is about security, and countries signed up for it because they thought their security was served by giving up nuclear weapons as long as their neighbors gave them up too," said a senior diplomat from a country with nuclear weapons.

A senior U.S. official involved in nuclear policy noted that "there are about three dozen countries that have the intellectual, technological capabilities to have and develop a nuclear weapons capability but have chosen not to. For those, such as Japan and Germany, it wouldn't take them long to make that transition, but they haven't, and the [treaty] is part of the reason."

Developing nations say they don't want to give up their rights to uranium enrichment and don't trust the United States or other nuclear countries to be consistent suppliers of the nuclear material they would need to run their power plants. Moreover, they say there is no guarantee that one of the nuclear counties won't attack them.

"There's a big credibility gap because of the double standard. You can't say, 'It's OK for you to have the weapon, but for everybody else it's wrong,' " said an ambassador to the International Atomic Energy Agency from one of the most influential of developing countries.

In the negotiations between the European Union and Iran over the Islamic Republic's uranium enrichment program, some people close to the negotiators say that unless the United States forswears efforts to change Iran's leadership, there will never be a deal.

Daniel Pinkston, a nuclear security expert at the Monterey Institute of International Studies, said the countries that had pursued nuclear weapons secretly or by refusing to sign the treaty were in tense neighborhoods — the Middle East or Asia — where they thought they could easily be attacked.

"Nuclear weapons can be attractive for the security benefits, and those might outweigh the benefits from participating in the nonproliferation regime," Pinkston said. "So unless you can resolve the security dilemma, you aren't going to resolve the problem."

The United States has helped to discourage some of its nonnuclear allies from going the weapons route by guaranteeing their security.

In Japan, where there is a political faction that would like the nation to develop atomic weapons, the majority of policymakers are willing to rely on the United States for protection. Taiwan and South Korea also fall into that category.

The problem is that once a country in a troubled area obtains nuclear weapons capability, others may get nervous, and the situation becomes hard to control.

Most worrisome to some nuclear countries and their allies is that the International Atomic Energy Agency has proved incapable of detecting transgressions by member states at an early stage.

Although Libya and South Africa gave up their nuclear weapons programs, the agency was not aware of the Libyan program until the day Moammar Kadafi announced the country was giving it up.

The Iranians had a program for 18 years that went undetected until it was disclosed by an anti-government group.

"Countries are big — they can hide some things; they learn how to hide from other countries," said the senior U.S. official involved in nuclear policy. "And there's one thing you can't easily erase, and that's knowledge."

Who's Next To Go Nuclear? (WP)

By Andrew Grotto

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

North Korea announced its first test of a nuclear device last week, setting off hand-wringing around the world that a newly armed Pyongyang might sell nuclear weapons to rogue states or terrorists.

But another threat, more likely and more dangerous, may emerge. Pyongyang's test could encourage "near-nuclear" proliferation -- a world in which states master key technologies that are ostensibly for harmless energy-related purposes but can be quickly adapted for deadly, offensive ends.

Indeed, governments aspiring to join the small but growing club of nuclear states don't need to consider testing nukes or withdrawing from the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. Instead, their first step could involve learning how to enrich uranium or separate plutonium; that technology can produce fuel for nuclear energy reactors -- or bombs.

Under common interpretations of the NPT, governments are allowed to acquire such technology for peaceful purposes. Once states perfect these techniques, though, they will have overcome the greatest obstacle to getting the bomb -- access to nuclear fuel.

These aren't hypotheticals: Iran has claimed that its fledgling uranium enrichment program is intended to diversify its energy supply by producing fuel for reactors. This year, Egypt and Turkey announced interest in nuclear energy as well.

A world in which countries have the capability to go nuclear on short notice is fraught with peril. Over the next decade, keep your eye on five nations in particular that may pursue that path:

JAPAN . Japan's stockpile of more than 40 tons of plutonium -- which it keeps for use in energy reactors -- is enough fuel for 3,000 to 5,000 nuclear weapons. It also has the technical capacity to produce a sophisticated nuclear arsenal on short notice that could rival the Chinese arsenal.

The Japanese public is traditionally anti-nukes, but politicians such as former prime minister Yasuhiro Nakasone have openly suggested that Japan may need to reconsider its nuclear options.

SOUTH KOREA. Since 1998, South Korea has followed a "sunshine policy" toward North Korea, emphasizing engagement over isolation. Nuclear weapons play no role in this approach. However, North Korea's test has prompted some anger in the south. Seoul's attitude toward Pyongyang may be shifting.

Seoul had a nuclear weapons program in the early 1970s, but joined the NPT in 1975. In 2004, however, South Korea admitted that it had conducted secret experiments with uranium enrichment and plutonium separation beginning in the late 1970s. Like Japan, South Korea could acquire a credible nuclear arsenal on relatively short notice.

IRAN . Flush with oil revenue, Iran has emerged as a newly assertive and ambitious player in the Middle East. If isolated and impoverished North Korea can get away with developing and testing nuclear weapons, better-positioned countries such as Iran may be emboldened to think they can, too.

EGYPT. Egypt once had a nuclear weapons program, but gave it up in the 1970s and joined the NPT. Since Iran's 1979 revolution, relations between the two countries have been strained. Iran bridles at Egypt's recognition of Israel, and is still sore about Egypt's siding with Saddam Hussein during the 1980-1988 Iran-Iraq war. Until 2004, a street in Tehran was named after the assassin of Egyptian president Anwar Sadat. Relations have improved in recent years, but suspicions still run deep.

Last month, Gamal Mubarak, son of Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and widely viewed as next in line for the presidency, suggested in a speech that Egypt pursue nuclear energy. In a thinly veiled reference to Iran, he noted that Egypt "is not the only country that is thinking about this alternative to save on energy sources."

SAUDI ARABIA. Like Egypt, Saudi Arabia regards Iran's nuclear program and growing clout with suspicion, and is also nervous about the precipitous decline in U.S. influence in the Middle East. Saudi Arabia helped finance Pakistan's nuclear program, and its leaders are rumored to have met with A.Q. Khan, the father of Pakistan's nuclear bomb and the mastermind of a global black market in nuclear technology. The Saudis couldn't develop a nuclear arsenal now, but a shortcut is possible. They could obtain a weapon from Pakistan, or invite Pakistan to station some of its weapons at Saudi bases. This could be legal under the NPT, just as the United States stations nuclear weapons at European bases.

More North Koreas? Get Used To It (LAT)

By William Langewiesche, William Langewiesche, International Correspondent For Vanity Fair, Is The Author Of "Atomic Bazaar:

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

Bad as a nuclear hermit kingdom is, the U.S. just can't control proliferation.

THERE IS NO DOUBT that the acquisition of atomic weapons by North Korea is the worst development yet in the ongoing story of nuclear proliferation by upstart states. The regime in Pyongyang is arguably the spookiest in the world today — bellicose, repressive, unstable and so mentally isolated that it sometimes appears to be outright insane. A nuclear North Korea is definitely a dangerous place; it increases the chances in Asia for all sorts of trouble and threatens to kick off a regional arms race. This needs to be acknowledged.

Nonetheless, what's done is done, and though we may protest and bluster, there is very little the U.S. can do to stop it from proceeding. Rather than making a show of our weakness, we would do well to calm down. After all, this was not unexpected; the fact is, the spread of nuclear weapons is, and always has been, inevitable.

A little perspective might help. In the months after World War II, a group of men responsible for producing the atomic bomb — including Albert Einstein, J. Robert Oppenheimer, Niels Bohr, Leo Szilard and others — created the Federation of American (Atomic) Scientists, or FAS, to educate the public about this new breed of weapon. Washington at the time harbored the illusion that it possessed a great secret and could keep the bomb for itself.

The founders of the FAS disagreed. They argued that with the destruction of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, any engineering doubts had been emphatically answered and, because the basic science of nuclear reactions was already widely known, other nations could invest in nuclear programs and be certain of the returns. There were any number of physicists and engineers worldwide capable of guiding them through the process. FAS members warned the American people in stark and simple terms. In essence, they said that the whole world would soon be nuclear-armed. There is no secret here, they said, and there is also no defense. The Nuclear Age is upon us, and it cannot be undone.

They got the timing wrong. Nuclear proliferation did proceed, but for 50 years it was slowed (and in some cases stopped) by diplomacy and, more fundamentally, by the Cold War itself, with the guarantees it offered to nonnuclear nations of surrogate nuclear strength under the U.S. and Soviet retaliatory "umbrellas."

Since then, however, the umbrellas have frayed, and the world has become a more fractured and complicated place, no longer bound by the old alliances, where independent nuclear arsenals have greater meaning than before. Paradoxically, the desire for nuclear weapons is spreading in inverse relation to the lowered risk of an all-out global nuclear war. This is a trend that began even before the fall of the Soviet Union, but it is accelerating in a world where countries must turn to themselves for protection and where the U.S., especially after the invasion of Iraq, is seen as an aggressor and a threat. For these reasons and others, new nuclear players are emerging to challenge the rules of the game.

What the new players have in common is that they are poor and undeveloped nations, with weak economies and precarious political systems. If this seems counterintuitive, consider the fact that nuclear weapons are not only simple but cheap.

Earlier this year in Moscow, a Russian nuclear official put it this way to me: "Nuclear weapons technology has become a useful tool, especially for the weak. It allows them to satisfy their ambitions without much expense. If they want to intimidate others, to be respected by others, this is now the easiest way to do it." Once a country decides to become a nuclear weapons power, he said, it will do so regardless of international sanctions or incentives.

Oppenheimer warned of this implicitly 60 years earlier. He wrote in 1945: "Atomic explosives vastly increase the power of destruction per dollar spent, per man-hour invested; they profoundly upset the precarious balance between the effort necessary to destroy, and the extent of the destruction…. None of the uncertainties can becloud the fact it will cost enormously less to destroy a square mile with atomic weapons than with any weapons hitherto known to warfare."

Oppenheimer talked about it in terms of the "evil that a dollar can do," but of course, one person's definition of evil may be another's definition of self-defense — or, more generally, a demand for equality among nations. The most succinct criticism of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty came from the Argentines when they refused to sign it, that it amounted to "the disarmament of the disarmed."

In Islamabad, an official close to the nuclear-armed Musharraf regime said to me: "The best way to fight proliferation is to pursue global disarmament. Fine, great, sure — if you expect that to happen. But you cannot have a world order in which you have five or eight nuclear weapons states on the one hand, and the rest of the international community on the other. There are many places like Pakistan, poor countries which have legitimate security concerns — every bit as legitimate as yours. And yet you ask them to address those concerns without nuclear weapons, while you have nuclear weapons, and you have everything else? It is not a question of what is fair, or right or wrong. It is simply not going to work."

The man was right. When focused on the U.S., his point becomes an argument not for standing down from the diplomacy of nonproliferation but for finding the courage to accept the dangers of a changing world in which new countries have acquired nuclear weapons, and some may actually use them.

Has North Korea joined the ranks of nuclear powers? If so, so be it. There will be other nuclear newcomers in the decades to come. Iran will be next, but it will not be the last. Turkey, Syria and Saudi Arabia are believed to be interested and could easily proceed, depending on regional events. So could Algeria. So could Brazil and Venezuela. The future is unknowable, but there is no limit to where these weapons could spread.

The good news, however perversely, is that no nuclear-armed regime (and certainly not Iran's) is likely to be as reckless as North Korea's. In that sense, the developments in North Korea can serve as an exercise not in stopping nuclear proliferation but in learning how to live with it after it occurs. The ideal, of course, would be to desist from policies of preemptive invasion and to engage the upstart powers respectfully through economic and diplomatic ties.

If that is not feasible, however, other options exist, based on the premise that nuclear weapons are defensive in nature and that regimes even as strange as Pyongyang's are generally fairly conventional players with infrastructures at risk and subject to restraint through the guarantee of retaliatory strikes.

There is one move we can make right now that would sharply reduce, if not eliminate, another risk: that a regime like North Korea's or Iran's might hand off a functional bomb to stateless terrorists who, with nothing to lose, would have every reason to use it. We can make it emphatically clear that if we or our most important friends are ever hit by terrorists with a ready-made nuclear device, we will immediately devastate whatever regime is to blame.

Ultimately, however, it is important to recognize that the spread of nuclear weapons is a condition over which we do not have control and for which there is no solution. It does no good to bemoan the folly of it all or to belabor the fact that we are the ones who ushered in the Nuclear Age. The world is an unsafe place, and we have no choice but to live in it. Pretending otherwise, or imagining that we can impose order when we lack the power to do so, is the surest recipe for self-destruction and disaster.

Bush Unleashes The Nuclear Beast (LAT)

By Joseph Cirincione, Joseph Cirincione Is A Senior Vice President At The Center For American Progress. His New Book, "Bom

If the administration won't abide by time-tested nuclear treaties, why should anyone else?

IN THEIR THIRD PRESIDENTIAL DEBATE, in October 1960, John F. Kennedy went after Vice President Richard Nixon, blasting him as weak on national security for not stopping the spread of nuclear weapons. France had just tested its first nuclear device, joining the United States, the Soviet Union and Britain as the world's first nuclear powers. Kennedy warned "that 10, 15 or 20 nations will have a nuclear capacity — including Red China — by the end of the presidential office in 1964."

As president, Kennedy sought to fight that dark vision, telling the United Nations: "The weapons of war must be abolished, before they abolish us." He restarted talks on a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty, began pursuit of a global nonproliferation pact and signed a treaty with the Soviet Union to ban atmospheric nuclear tests. Although Kennedy did not live to finish the job, in 1968, Lyndon Johnson signed what became the diplomatic crown jewel of his presidency: the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, or NPT. President Nixon secured its ratification.

The NPT is now considered one of the most successful security pacts in history. Every nation in the world is a member except Israel, India, Pakistan, and North Korea. Most of the 183 member states that do not have nuclear weapons believe what the treaty says: We should eliminate nuclear weapons.

The treaty became the hub around which liberals and conservatives built an interlocking network of agreements that deterred, though didn't altogether stop, the spread of nuclear weapons. As a result, by 2000, only three other countries — Israel, India and Pakistan — had joined the original five nuclear nations. With the success of these agreements, and the end of the Soviet-American nuclear standoff at the close of the Cold War, it seemed that the nuclear threat that had haunted the world for so many years might finally be receding.

But now, suddenly, the threat is back. In the last six years, we seem awash in nuclear threats: First it was Saddam Hussein, then North Korea and Iran. How did it happen? Is nuclear restraint dead?

At the heart of the problem is the strategy George W. Bush chose, which rejects international treaties as the solution to proliferation. He and his advisors saw these agreements as limiting U.S. flexibility and viewed the United Nations and other global gatherings as arenas where the world's Lilliputians could tie down the American Gulliver.

Bush scuttled the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, walked away from the nuclear test ban treaty secured by President Clinton, opposed efforts to enforce the treaty banning biological weapons, mocked the U.N. inspectors before the Iraq war and sent low-level officials to critical negotiations, including last year's NPT conference. The world now believes that the chief architect of the global nonproliferation system has abandoned its creation.

Instead, the administration preferred to rely on U.S. military might and technology, such as anti-missile systems, to protect the United States. Rather than negotiate treaties to eliminate weapons, it forged a strategy to eliminate the regimes that might use them against us. The Bush team felt they knew who the bad guys were, and they aimed to get them — one by one.

But the strategy has backfired. Both Iran and North Korea accelerated their programs, making more progress in the last five years than they had made in the previous 10. Now North Korea's test threatens to trigger an Asian nuclear-reaction chain that could prompt South Korea, Taiwan and even Japan to reconsider their nuclear options.

And it is not just the threats from small nations such as North Korea that could fuel a new atomic arms race. It is the continued existence of huge nuclear arsenals in the United States, Russia and other states. The importance of nuclear weapons as a cornerstone of U.S. defense had been declining since the Cold War ended. Though the U.S. never ruled out their use, Clinton and George H.W. Bush made it clear that they believed they were unusable, except perhaps in retaliation.

But the current president's policies have elevated the role of these weapons. The 2002 Nuclear Posture Review detailed plans to build new, more usable "low-yield" nuclear weapons and created missions for them. Bush decided to retain about 6,000 weapons and to research a new generation of nuclear missiles, bombers and submarines.

What's the relevance of this to proliferation? Simple. U.S. intelligence officials concluded as early as 1958 that other nations' nuclear appetites could not be curbed without limiting the superpowers' stockpiles. That judgment was confirmed by subsequent administrations.

As the superpowers cut their weapons from a Cold War high of 65,000 in 1986 to about 27,000 today, other countries took note. In the 1960s, 23 countries had nuclear programs, including Australia, Canada, Egypt, Japan, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and West Germany. Most ended any weapons programs. Brazil and Argentina stopped research in the 1980s, and South Africa, Belarus, Kazakhstan and Ukraine gave up their bombs in the 1990s.

We now know that U.N. inspectors ended Iraq's nuclear program in 1991. In 2003, Libya abandoned its secret program. Until last week, no nation had tested a nuclear weapon for eight years — the longest period in the Atomic Age. The outrage that greeted the North Korean test shows how strong anti-nuclear sentiment has become.

Many political and military leaders recognize the limited military utility of weapons whose use would kill thousands of innocent civilians. Rep. David L. Hobson (R-Ohio), a solid Midwest conservative, led the effort last year to kill the administration's proposed "nuclear bunker buster," a new weapon designed to go after conventional targets. Former Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara advocates greatly reducing the U.S. and Russian arsenals and then working to eliminate them completely, just as countries have done with chemical and biological weapons. Even former Bush advisor Richard Perle has said the U.S. could cut to well below 1,000 warheads. "The truth is we are never going to use them," Perle said. "The Russians aren't going to use theirs either."

By clinging to our own nuclear arsenal, and touting the importance of these weapons to our own security, the Bush administration has sent the world a schizoid message: Nuclear weapons are very, very important and useful — but you cannot have them. This double standard is impossible to maintain.

Last year, International Atomic Energy Agency Director Mohamed ElBaradei said that until the world was committed to eradicating nuclear weapons, "we will continue to have this cynical environment that all the guys in the minor leagues will try to join the major leagues…. They will say, 'If the big boys continue to rely on nuclear weapons, why shouldn't I?' "

Bush administration officials have proved expert at smashing the agreements their predecessors so painstakingly built, but in doing so they broke the bars that had caged the nuclear beast. Those who will have to repair the damage would do well to look back at the handiwork of the past. They might learn a thing or two.

Will Nukes March Across Asia? (NSL)

By Michael Moran

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), October 15, 2006

Since the very early years of the Cold War, two of Asia's most important and progressive countries Japan and South Korea have predicated most of their defense and foreign policy decisions on the assumption they would be protected, in the final analysis, by America's nuclear umbrella.

To an even greater extent than Western Europe, where Britain and France insisted on their own small nuclear deterrent forces in spite of America's guarantee, these two sophisticated Asian economic powers agreed to forswear nuclear weapons altogether. For decades, that contributed not only to the stability of Asia, but also to America's relative leverage in the region. With the decision of North Korea to test a nuclear weapon, those days may now be numbered.

The early results of North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear tests may, ironically, work against the Stalinist regime in Pyongyang, convincing South Korea and China, for instance, to drop the petty historical dispute that has prevented them from uniting against a mutually perceived threat to peace in their backyard. Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, in fact broke a five-year moratorium on meetings with the South Korean and Chinese leaders the very week the North chose to gatecrash the nuclear club. There is hope in Washington of finally convincing key players -- and especially China, which alone has real leverage on the North -- to slap the kind of political and economic sanctions on the regime that force it to heed world opinion.

In the longer term, however, the North Korean test could prove an important nail in the coffin of America's five-decade dominance of Asian security issues. The nuclear test shakes Japanese and South Korean faith, which has already eroded over the past several years, in the basic Cold War bargain and will transform their attitudes about their own security.

As a South Korean diplomat at the United Nations put it to me last year, "Much of our thinking for the past two decades, and in Japan, too, I would say, has been based on the idea that we are under the U.S. nuclear umbrella. If the U.S. cannot prevent North Korea from testing a nuclear weapon, how can it deter North Korea from using one? That's the basic question being asked today."

So far, the reaction of North Korea's Asian neighbors has been moderate: careful condemnations, calls for sanctions, pledges to work for a peaceful solution, etc. This certainly is a far cry from Pakistan's tit-for-tat, nuke-for-nuke response to India's 1998 nuclear test. But those who make a living tracking proliferation threats remain concerned. Both South Korea and Japan are signatories of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, the treaty North Korea renounced in 2003 before its final push for nuclear weaponry began. Yet, of all the non-nuclear states that have pondered, secretly or openly, the wisdom of going nuclear, none is more capable of fielding an actual arsenal as quickly and completely as Japan and South Korea are.

As the only nation ever to suffer a nuclear attack, Japan has repeatedly vowed in the years since 1945 to never "develop, use, or allow the transportation of nuclear weapons through its territory." It later emerged Japan had, in fact, studied the idea during the 1960s. By and large, however, Japan has been true to its word. Yet Japan, more vulnerable than any other major industrial nation to oil crises, also developed a civilian nuclear power industry larger than any outside France and the United States. This expanding network of nuclear plants, which Japan hopes will produce over 40 percent of national electricity needs by 2010, also produced spent plutonium at levels which alarm nonproliferation experts. While this is not "bomb-grade" plutonium in the strictest sense, experts believe Japan could quickly field an arsenal if it so chose. Michael Levi, an expert in arms control and proliferation at the Council on Foreign Relations, says Japan could nuclearize its military "in a matter of months, if not sooner." This has led some to deem Japan a "paranuclear" state.

Such thoughts would have been quickly dismissed a decade ago given the lingering taboo and trauma caused by the Hiroshima and Nagasaki bombings. In recent years, however, particularly since North Korea test-fired a missile in 1998 that crossed Japanese territory before splashing into the Pacific Ocean, some politicians have called for a rethinking of the pacifism imposed on Japan by the United States after World War II. Yasuhiro Nakasone, a former prime minister, told a reporter last month

Japan needed "to study the issue of nuclear weapons." Japan's new prime minister, before winning power, expressed the opinion that nothing in the country's constitution specifically forbids development of a nuclear deterrent. Abe has been careful since the North Korean test to say Japan is not planning to go nuclear. But he clearly is aligned with those who feel a nuclear arsenal to be on the table for study.

As with Japan, South Korea's sophisticated domestic nuclear power industry is poised to nuclearize if it so chooses. From the 1950s until the late 1980s, in South Korea's official accounts, Seoul pursued a nuclear weapons program as vigorously as its communist archrival to the north. In fact, International Atomic Energy Agency inspectors who visited South Korea in 2003 discovered research on enriching plutonium continued until at least 2000. While the IAEA found no evidence of any military motive, it was a reminder of how little we may actually know about such activity there and elsewhere.

Ever since Amy Carter raised the issue with her presidential daddy in the late 1970s, nuclear nonproliferation has loomed like Oz in the thoughts of diplomats and policymakers -- particularly those in the nations which made up the relatively stable Cold War- era "nuclear club," the U.S., Russia (then the Soviet Union), France, Britain, China, and, with a wink and a nod because they have nukes but won't publicly admit it, Israel. Like Oz, though, the concept of nonproliferation always looked better from afar.

The closer any nation came to completing the nuclear fuel cycle, the more clearly futile efforts to prevent the next step turned out. In the end, those which came close and decided against actually testing and fielding nuclear arms -- South Africa, Brazil, Argentina, for instance -- shied away for reasons of national interest, the strain on their scientific infrastructure, or the pure financial burden. Even Libya, which renounced its own nuclear designs in 2003, had little to show for its efforts and much to gain from dropping them.

Japan and South Korea certainly have the scientific prowess and financial ability to move in this direction, and no one, not even in Washington, contends they are wrong to feel threatened. Like China, India, Pakistan, and now North Korea, all of whom blasted their way into the nuclear club in past decades, these two economically minded powers may eventually find the benefits outweigh the slap on the hand such actions brought to previous gatecrashers. Until someone proves the consequences to be more serious than that, the temptation of going nuclear, and of having a permanent seat at the world's big table as a result, may prove too much to resist.

Nukes And More Nukes (WP)

Proliferation will continue as long as Russia and China treat it as a secondary priority.

THE MOST critical question following North Korea's reported nuclear test is whether anything can be done to stop other states or terrorist groups from acquiring such weapons in coming years. Can North Korea be prevented from exporting its nukes? Is the world entering an era in which nuclear war will be virtually inevitable? Based on the response to North Korea last week, the outlook isn't good.

Weaker countries, such as Libya, can still be bribed or bluffed into giving up a weapons program that hasn't advanced very far. A new international protocol on the production of nuclear materials is a possibility worth pursuing. But states such as North Korea and Iran can be stopped only if a powerful coalition of countries emerges against them, combining the United States and Europe with Russia, China and regional powers.

The five countries that have tried to bargain with North Korea over its nuclear program -- China, South Korea, Russia, Japan and the United States -- could have stopped the North Korean program and could reverse it still: Among them they have the capacity to force the collapse of the Kim Jong Il dictatorship. A similar coalition probably could stop Iran. But to do so, nuclear counterproliferation has to become those governments' highest priority. They have to be willing to make sacrifices and take risks.

As the diplomacy at the United Nations last week once again demonstrated, neither China nor Russia regard stopping the spread of nuclear weapons as essential. Both voted yesterday in support of a resolution imposing sanctions on North Korea, and talks will begin this week on a sanctions resolution aimed at Iran. But both Beijing and Moscow have worked to water down the measures, narrowing the list of sanctions and eliminating references to force. In doing so they have illuminated the priorities that for them matter more than limiting the spread of nuclear weapons.

China, though angry at North Korea, still finds it more important to preserve Mr. Kim's regime than to disarm it. Chinese officials reasonably worry about a destabilizing flood of refugees in the event the Kim dictatorship collapses. More cynically, they continue to see the regime as a means of containing U.S. influence in Asia. Beijing's view of Iran is similarly instrumental: It is a valuable source of energy and a check on the United States.

Russia is even less responsible as a partner in counterproliferation. The government of Vladimir Putin seems to have returned to the Soviet view of international relations as a zero-sum game with the United States. Any gain for U.S. policy is to be resisted or balanced with a concession in return.

So Russia agreed Thursday to support the U.N. sanctions resolution on North Korea -- but only after extracting U.S. agreement to another Security Council resolution about its neighbor, Georgia. The resolution extended the mandate of U.N. observers -- and legitimized the continued presence of Russian troops -- in two breakaway regions of Georgia and referred to "militant rhetoric and provocative actions" by Georgia's pro-Western democratic government.

In fact, it is Mr. Putin who is engaged in a militant and provocative campaign against his tiny neighbor: He has banned trade, closed transportation links and cracked down on Georgian-owned businesses in Moscow. He's willing to make a gesture toward preventing a world that bristles with nuclear weapons, but only if he can get some help in his attempt to crush a government that resists Russia's neo-imperialism. If such politics continue to underlie counterproliferation, we can expect a much more dangerous world.

TEHRAN (Agence France-Presse) -- Iran said yesterday a year-old offer from President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for foreign countries to handle its uranium enrichment activities still stands as a way to break the deadlock over its nuclear program.

Foreign ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini also said a suggestion made by Iran earlier this month for a French-led consortium to enrich uranium for Iran on Iranian soil remained "appropriate."

The spokesman made his comments as the five U.N. Security Council permanent members plus Germany discuss imposing sanctions against Iran over its failure to halt enrichment, a process the West fears could be diverted to making a nuclear bomb.

"Mr. Ahmadinejad in his speech last year to the U.N. General Assembly proposed that other countries participate in the uranium enrichment and this proposal still stands," Mr. Hosseini said, according to the Web site of state broadcaster IRIB.

"We have received proposals from partners, but the final decision has not been made yet," he said later in an interview with state television. He did not specify who the partners were.

Mr. Ahmadinejad had proposed in his 2005 U.N. speech to "engage in serious partnership with private and public sectors of other countries in the implementation of the uranium enrichment program in Iran."

His proposal was revived earlier this month when a top Iranian nuclear official said France should form a consortium that would manufacture uranium on Iranian soil and thus break the deadlock. However, on both occasions his idea was met with a cool reception from Western powers, who object to enrichment done in Iran. Enriched uranium can be used to power nuclear reactors or atomic bombs.

"The Iranian nation is not scared of possible sanctions and is determined to go on its way to the peaceful use of nuclear energy," Mr. Hosseini said.

Germany: No Prospect Of Talks With Iran (AP-Y)

By Geir Moulson, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 15, 2006

Germany's foreign minister on Saturday said there is currently no prospect of successful nuclear talks with Iran but that pressure on the country would be applied gradually, leaving the door open to future negotiations.

Repeated attempts by the U.N. Security Council's five permanent members and Germany to entice Iran into negotiations on its nuclear program foundered earlier this month over Tehran's refusal to give up uranium enrichment.

The six powers have agreed to start working on U.N. sanctions against Iran next week, diplomats and officials have said, but still have to bridge differences on how harsh the penalties should be.

Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier gave no details of sanctions that might be taken against Tehran. However, he noted that a package of incentives aimed at persuading Iran to halt uranium enrichment is still being offered.

"We do not at the moment have a situation in which negotiations can be held with prospects of success, so the Security Council must take up its efforts" to work toward possible sanctions, Steinmeier said on Inforadio.

"But we have made equally clear that our offer for cooperation with Iran remains on the table," Steinmeier said. "That means we are ready to return to the negotiating table any time if Iran declares its readiness to recognize the conditions for negotiations," he said.

"Iran must understand that, if we negotiate, the building of further centrifuges must stop," he said.

Steinmeier said the six powers had talked about a "catalog of possible sanctions" in the summer but did not elaborate on what measures might be applied.

"We agreed that not all possibilities should be used immediately, but that we naturally seek a process in which, as far as it is necessary, pressure against Iran can be increased slowly," he added.

"The Security Council members will calculate sanctions with responsibility (in mind) for this route back to the negotiating table and the fact that it remains open, and I am relatively sure that we will reach an agreement," Steinmeier said.

Iran on Saturday called threats of sanctions "psychological warfare" and said it would not be intimidated.

Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini repeated his country's pledge to continue pursuing its nuclear program, according to a state-run television report on its English Web site.

While the United States favors a tough line on Iran, Russia and China have advocated less severe measures. Steinmeier argued, however, that both countries have reason to feel angered by Iran's brusque rejection in the past of proposed compromises.

"The Iranian leadership should not count on the economic interests that both states certainly have automatically determining the position of their governments toward the Iranian nuclear conflict," he said.

Uranium enriched to low levels is used to produce nuclear fuel. It can be used to develop nuclear weapons if enriched at higher levels.

Though Iran contends its nuclear program is for generating electricity, the U.S. and some of its allies allege it is trying to develop atomic weapons.

Israel Steps Up Attacks To Halt Palestinian Rockets (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

JERUSALEM, Oct. 14 — The Israeli military killed seven Palestinian militants in fighting Saturday as tanks and other armored vehicles rolled into areas east of Gaza City in a stepped-up effort to halt Palestinian rocket fire.

Backed by helicopters and pilotless planes, Israeli troops have staged ground operations in eastern Gaza in the last three days, killing 20 Palestinians and wounding about 30. Most of the dead were Hamas militants who were targets of airstrikes, but several civilians also died.

The incursion appears to be yet another in a series of periodic escalations since an Israeli soldier was seized on June 25 and Israeli forces, which withdrew from the territory last year, moved back into Gaza.

The Israelis have concentrated their forces in open areas in the southeast corner of Gaza over the last several months. They have carried out frequent offensives, and since Thursday have been moving into more populated areas, looking for smuggling tunnels and trying to stop the rocket fire, the military says.

In recent weeks, Israeli political and security officials warned that they were prepared to respond more aggressively to the continuing Palestinian rocket fire out of Gaza. Israeli radio reported Saturday that Defense Minister Amir Peretz had given the go-ahead for broader operations, but provided no additional details.

Palestinian militants have been firing rockets from Gaza into southern Israel for more than five years, and the attacks continued after the Israeli withdrawal last year. The rockets have caused damage and injuries in many instances, though deaths have been rare.

Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman for the Palestinian Authority government, accused Israel on Saturday of "going ahead with evil plans for a bloody military escalation and seeking the highest possible Palestinian losses."

The latest incursion started after Palestinian militants fired three rockets from northeastern Gaza Friday night and lightly wounded three Israelis in the town of Sderot, which is just beyond Gaza's perimeter fence.

Shortly afterward, more than a dozen Israeli armored vehicles charged into the areas where the rockets had been launched, and ground clashes erupted. The Israeli forces came under fire from automatic rifles and at least one antitank missile, the military said.

An Israeli airstrike killed four Hamas militants taking cover in a house, according to the military and Palestinian medical workers. Two more Hamas gunmen were killed in the clashes, and several Palestinians were wounded.

The Israeli Air Force also bombed a house in the southern Gaza town of Rafah that concealed a smuggling tunnel, the military said. The military called residents and told them to evacuate before the strike, and no casualties were reported.

On Saturday afternoon, an Israeli airstrike on a vehicle in Gaza City killed one militant from Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades and wounded three more from the group, according to the military and Palestinian medical workers.

On Thursday and Friday, Israeli troops searched for tunnels and battled Palestinian militants in and around the village of Abassan, in southeastern Gaza, but the forces pulled back overnight, the military said Saturday.

Since the Israeli soldier was seized nearly four months ago, the Israelis have kept the Gaza crossing points into Egypt and Israel closed most of the time. Food, medicine, fuel and other essential supplies are allowed into Gaza, but few Palestinians are allowed in or out of the coastal territory to sell goods or do other business and the already feeble economy has largely ground to a halt.

Israel is demanding the release of the soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit; the Palestinians are seeking an exchange that would include freedom for a large number of Palestinian prisoners held by Israel.

The two main Palestinian factions, Hamas and Fatah, are deadlocked in their efforts to form a national unity government. Ahmed Yousef, a top adviser to the Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya of Hamas, called for neighboring Egypt to renew its mediation efforts.

Sudan's Government Signs Peace Accord With Rebel Group In East (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

KHARTOUM, Sudan, Oct. 14 — The Sudanese government signed a peace deal on Saturday with a small rebel movement in the eastern part of the country, an agreement intended to end fighting that has lasted 10 years though with nowhere near the intensity of the conflict in Darfur.

According to state-run news media, Mustafa Osman Ismail, a government negotiator, and Mussa Mohammed Ahmed, chief of the Eastern Front, signed the deal at the presidential palace in Asmara, Eritrea.

According to Agence France-Presse, Sudan's president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, called it an example of "Africans solving an African problem without foreign help," a clear reference to his government's continuing refusal to allow United Nations peacekeepers into Darfur.

The rebels in eastern Sudan never posed the threat to the military dictatorship that Darfur's insurgents have, though they conducted hit-and-run guerrilla attacks on government forces for some of the same reasons. Eastern Sudan, like Darfur, is a poor, neglected area where many people feel disenfranchised.

Under the accord, the Eastern Front will get more representation in the national and regional administrations, including high-ranking posts in Khartoum, the capital.

The Darfur crisis, meanwhile, continues, with more fighting in El Fasher, one of Darfur's bigger towns, and reported clashes along Sudan's lawless border with Chad.

President Bush's special envoy for Sudan, Andrew S. Natsios, arrived in Khartoum on Friday night to begin meetings with top Sudanese officials. Few here expect President Bashir to back down from his refusal to allow United Nations peacekeepers to patrol Darfur.

Darfur is patrolled by African Union peacekeepers who are underfinanced and have failed so far to stop the bloodshed. The African Union has agreed to keep its peacekeepers through the end of the year in the hope that a bigger and better-equipped United Nations force will replace them.

Sudan, Eastern Rebels Sign Peace Deal (AP)

By Mohamed Osman

AP, October 15, 2006

The Sudanese government signed a peace deal Saturday with a group of rebels from eastern Sudan, ending a deadly strife that has been overshadowed by the conflict in the country's western Darfur region.

The Eastern Rebel Front has fought an intermittent war with the Sudanese government for 10 years. The signing of the agreement is considered a relief to Khartoum, which has been struggling to put down rebellions on both sides of the country, as well as to keep a shaky peace after a civil war with the south.

The conflict in Sudan's east bore some similarities to the more publicized strife in Darfur. In 2005, the U.N. World Food Program said the malnutrition rate in the east had grown worse than in Darfur.

On Saturday, Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir reiterated his opposition to allowing U.N. peacekeepers in Darfur.

The U.N. wants to send 20,000 U.N. troops to Darfur to replace an ill-equipped and understaffed African Union force that has not been able to quell the violence. More than 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million have been displaced since rebel groups rose up against the Khartoum government in early 2003.

Sudan "will never be the first African country to allow re-colonization of the continent to begin on its soil," al-Bashir said in the capital of neighboring Eritrea, Asmara, where the peace deal was signed. "But we are for a United Nations role that would provide logistical and material assistance to the African Union to carry out its role."

Al-Bashir and First Vice President Salva Kiir had traveled Eritrea to sign the deal with leaders of the Eastern Rebel Front under supervision of Eritrea's government.

Al-Bashir promised Saturday that all the money that was being spent on war will be paid for development.

The final peace deal was set to call for a cease-fire, the lifting of a state of emergency in Sudan's east and the deployment of Sudanese forces to the region, according to the official Sudanese news agency, SUNA.

Some $600 million also would be allocated to health and water programs in the area over the next five years, SUNA reported.

The Eastern Rebel Front has claimed responsibility for a number of attacks on Sudan's infrastructure, including an oil pipeline, and has ambushed cargo convoys and passenger buses. It also has threatened a vital road linking Khartoum with the country's main seaport on the Red Sea in eastern Sudan.

Some Darfur rebels also have fought in the east, and Eritrea has a history of supporting both the eastern and western Darfurian rebels.

In Somalia, Islamic Law Is Far From Uniform (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

'They don't all have the same vision,' an official says of the courts that control the south.

MOGADISHU, Somalia — The public execution was set for 9 a.m., and thousands of men, women and children raced toward a sandy dune where the previous regime killed its political enemies.

A man accused of fatally shooting a Mogadishu businessman in a dispute over a cellphone two weeks earlier knelt and prayed in front of an eight-man firing squad, as impatient spectators whistled, hooted, stood on cars and scrambled up trees for a better view. The death sentence had been imposed swiftly by a local Islamic court. No attorney. No appeal.

The first blast of gunfire didn't do the job, so an officer stepped forward and shot the accused in the head. Then the crowd broke through security lines and rushed toward the body, many yelling, "Allahu akbar!" or "God is great!"

Four months after they seized control of Somalia's capital, Islamists have won widespread praise for reestablishing order and stability in Mogadishu and surrounding areas after 15 years of anarchy.

But the Islamists are by no means uniform in their application of justice. In Islamist-run southern Somalia, how you live, and sometimes whether you live, depends largely on where you live.

In one Mogadishu neighborhood, court officials banned cinemas and satellite television as immoral, and have punished criminals with public lashings and executions, such as the one last month.

Under a different court less than a mile away, residents can view pornographic films at night and are free to watch CNN and Hollywood movies. Islamic leaders there have no stomach for public punishment, instead sentencing criminals to prison.

"They don't all have the same vision," said Mogadishu Mayor Mohamed Hassan Ali, who was appointed by Somalia's U.N.-backed transitional government but has struggled for authority under the Islamists. "They don't even know each other that well. Now they're trying to set an agenda, and it's creating some culture shock."

After their surprising victory over U.S.-backed warlords in June, the Islamic Courts Union reopened the airport and seaport, dispatched uniformed security officers who won't take bribes, and reintroduced consumer protection laws, such as halting the import of spoiled food, which unscrupulous businessmen had been dumping in Somalia for years.

But a clash of ideologies has emerged between leaders of the Islamist union and nearly three dozen smaller, semiautonomous courts that function as local governments throughout southern Somalia. These clan-based courts, some of which have their own militias, sometimes pursue distinct and competing interpretations of Islamic law.

On big issues, such as opposition to bringing foreign peacekeepers to Somalia and strategies to reach a power-sharing agreement with the transitional government based in Baidoa, the Islamists show few signs of discord. Most also support, in theory, the installation of an Islamic-based government.

But as Somalis begin debating how to implement such a system, cracks are beginning to show.

In Jawhar, north of Mogadishu, the local court last month banned love songs and Western music on the radio, though such fare still plays in the capital.

After an Italian nun and her bodyguard were shot to death in Mogadishu on Sept. 17, moderate court leaders accused a group of young fundamentalist fighters, known as Shabbab, of shielding one of the killers. The court leaders threatened to break from the union if the suspect was not handed over, two court sources said.

In an interview at his modest home in Mogadishu, with laundry hanging across the courtyard and children playing, Islamic Courts Union leader Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys insisted that differences within the movement were minor.

"There may be some division," he said. "But there is no challenge to the authority and administration of the court. Our ideology is one." He denied any internal friction over the case of the nun's slaying.

Aweys heads the 91-person shura, a de facto parliament that includes representatives of various factions and clans. He shares power with Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, a former teacher who serves in a presidential role for the union. Ahmed is thought to represent the moderate side of the courts, though he has rarely differed from the more hard-line Aweys in public.

Both men said the disputes were being magnified by outsiders, including the Bush administration and Ethiopian government, who Aweys said were plotting to "divide and conquer" the fledgling alliance.

"The U.S. government accuses anyone who disagrees with it of being a terrorist, especially when they see a Muslim who wants to form an Islamic government," Aweys said.

Ibrahim Hassan Addou, who serves as foreign minister for the union, expressed disappointment that the more extreme actions by lower courts seemed to get the most attention in the news media.

"It seems that the extremists here are getting the focus and overshadowing us," said Addou, who worked as an administrator at American University in Washington before returning to Somalia in 1999. "We're wasting our time and resources closing movies and things like this. Minor things like this have to wait."

Islamic leaders said they planned to disband the local courts and replace them with one body that would provide consistency throughout Islamist-controlled regions.

"There are mistakes being made by individuals who lack experience," Addou said. "These decisions should be made by scholars and the shura council."

In recent weeks the shura has attempted to reverse or rein in lower court actions, issuing edicts such as a ban on attacks against foreigners or civil society groups. The council chastised one lower court for seizing control of a former police station, and it apologized to the families of some World Cup fans who were killed by local militiamen.

But to avoid alienating either side, Islamist leaders have skirted thorny issues, such as cinema and radio closures, leaving lower courts free to continue issuing and enforcing religious rulings as long as they don't conflict with the council.

"As a court we are free to make our own decisions," said Sheik Hussein Omar Hussein, a former tea seller who is chairman of one of Mogadishu's new lower courts in Hamarweyne district.

His recent rulings included a ban on cinemas and satellite television in public places. For a young woman accused of selling marijuana, he ordered 40 lashes in a public square.

North of the city is a court leader with a far different view of justice. Mahad Mohammed, chairman of Wanlaweyn court, studied economics in Pakistan and returned several months ago to pursue a career in politics.

He said he supported an Islamic government for Somalia, but believed there was room for interpretation.

He said he enjoyed music and movies. When faced recently with a man accused of theft, he said, he couldn't bring himself to order the man's hand amputated, as prescribed by some Islamic law. Instead he tossed the thief in jail.

"We can be flexible," Mohammed said.

But Aweys believes there is no room for compromise under Islam.

When asked what sort of model he would use to govern Somalia, Aweys said he would turn back to the 7th century. "Our model is to go back to the government during the life of the prophet Muhammad," he said.

To him, that includes amputating limbs of robbers, executing killers in public and stoning adulterers to death — a far more conservative vision of Islam than has ever been practiced in Somalia.

Nevertheless, support for the courts union remains high on the streets of Mogadishu. Many residents say they are willing to tolerate some limits on their freedom of expression in exchange for peace and normality.

But there is growing anxiety over how far it will go.

"They've done so much for Mogadishu, no question," said businessman Said Abdi Elye, who returned three years ago from Fairfax, Va. "The real question now is: Where are they taking us?"

Looking For Islam's Luthers (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

Islam sometimes comes across the airwaves in the West as the faith of medieval fanatics wielding swords and wearing explosive vests. Western doubts are bolstered when the pope accuses Islam of violence and fundamentalists protest by killing a nun.

But the public images of Islam we sometimes see — the violence in the name of God, the intolerance, the obsession with the past — represent only some stones in a complex mosaic. And those images can't explain why Islam appears to be in percentage terms the fastest-growing major religion in the world today.

Islam is on the rise for many of the same reasons evangelical Christianity is surging: they provide a firm moral code, spiritual reassurance and orderliness to people vexed by chaos and immorality around them, and they offer dignity to the poor.

While the thread of fundamentalism is real in Islam, so is the thread of reform. The 21st century may become to Islam what the 16th was to Christianity, for even in hard-line states like Iran you meet Martin Luthers who are pushing for an Islamic Reformation. One of the most surprising elements of this push for reform has to do with the emergence of a school called "feminist Islam."

I've written often about the honor killings and other abuses suffered by women and girls in some Muslim countries, and many Westerners think Islam is inherently misogynistic. But Muslim women themselves naturally resent that kind of Western paternalism, for they want opportunities and equality — and yet they frequently don't want to discard their faith (or even their head scarves).

"Yes, sexism exists in our culture, but that is not due to Islam," says Rima Khoreibi, an author from Dubai who wrote a children's book about an Islamic superhero who is female — Iman, a teenage girl with a cape, head scarf and deep religious convictions. That book, "The Adventures of Iman" (www.theadventuresofiman.com), was so successful that she is publishing a sequel in December.

Ms. Khoreibi says that she wrote "The Adventures of Iman" because of her "passion to promote Islamic feminism." She cites Koranic verses that promote gender equality and call for treating sons and daughters equally.

A Koran-quoting female caped crusader is part of a broad ferment for more gender equality in the Muslim world. Islamic feminists often argue that the Koran generally raised the status of women compared to earlier Arabian society — banning female infanticide, for example, and limiting polygamy — and that what is needed today is that larger spirit of progress and enlightenment rather than precise seventh-century formulations that would freeze human society.

Often the battles are over Koranic verses. For example, some note that the Koran permitted up to four wives as a way to care for orphans after wars that had left many women widowed. So they turn the verse on its head and say that in today's world where that situation doesn't apply, the Koran actually bars polygamy.

Likewise, Saudi women sometimes argue that since the Prophet Muhammad's wife drove camels, they should be able to drive cars.

"Islam, like any religion, is subject to interpretation," Shirin Ebadi, the Nobel Peace Prize laureate from Iran, writes in her autobiography. "It can be interpreted to oppress women or to liberate them."

Female Muslim scholars like Fatima Mernissi of Morocco have also turned up evidence that Prophet Muhammad's youngest wife (and the person he said he loved most in the world), Aisha, vigorously contested the chauvinism of early clerics. Indeed, she sometimes comes across as the first Islamic feminist.

A well-known statement once attributed to Prophet Muhammad says that a man's prayers are ineffective if a woman, dog or donkey passes in front of the believer. Aisha denounced that as nonsense: "You compare us now to donkeys and dogs. In the name of God, I have seen the Prophet saying his prayers while I was there."

Likewise, Aisha denied various suggestions that her husband considered menstruating women to be unclean.

Aisha had prepared a series of corrections to early Islamic writings, but these have been largely ignored. Finally, these days, they are beginning to get a hearing.

All this underscores that Islam is much more complex than the headlines might suggest. The violence and fundamentalism gets the attention — and should be more loudly condemned by ordinary Muslims — but we would be close-minded ourselves if we ignored the more hopeful rumblings that are also taking place within the vast Islamic world ... including, perhaps, steps toward a Muslim Reformation.

Chavez Spreads Wealth To Aid U.N. Cause (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

MONTEVIDEO, Uruguay (AP) -- As Venezuela lobbies for a U.N. Security Council seat, President Hugo Chavez has bolstered its chances by spreading petrodollars across the Americas and beyond -- extending an airstrip on a Caribbean island, sending emergency food aid to Africa, fixing a rundown hospital in Uruguay.

Chavez's international support will be put to the test on Monday as Venezuela goes up against U.S.-backed Guatemala in a General Assembly vote. At the same time, Chavez is confronting accusations at home that his generosity has been excessive, and has argued it's a modest amount of aid for nations he sees as suffering from U.S. domination.

At Uruguay's Hospital de Clinicas, a state-of-the-art transplant unit is being built with Venezuelan money. The emergency ward's leaky roof and exposed cinderblocks have given way to freshly painted walls, windows in rust-corroded frames are being replaced, and new elevators are on order.

Hospital director Graciela Ubach put a hand over her heart to show her gratitude to Chavez.

"I thank him with my soul," she said. "Honestly, it's been a dream for the country."

The public hospital struggled for funding for years until Venezuela came through with $20 million -- half in donations and the other half to be paid off in reciprocal training and other services.

Other Chavez pledges include: $260 million in financing to repave a Jamaican highway and $17 million in upgrades to airports on the Caribbean islands of Antigua and Dominica.

Chavez also came up with $5 million for an Uruguayan tire plant, glass business and leather factory as part of a $400 million flow of aid since March 2005, when Uruguay's leftist President Tabare Vazquez took office, according to the Venezuelan Embassy in Uruguay.

According to the U.S. State Department, which tracks the bulk of foreign aid, $3.3 billion was allocated in financial and development aid to Latin America and the Caribbean for all of 2005 and 2006, including military and anti-narcotics programs. Other estimates, which include aid not tallied by the State Department, put that figure closer to $4 billion.

A consolidated figure for Venezuelan aid is harder to come by, but a review of public pledges by its government suggest Venezuela, with an economy one-ninetieth the size of America's, has offered at least $1.1 billion since the beginning of 2005 in loans, donations and financial aid in the region.

U.S. aid to Jamaica for 2005-2006 is listed as $42 million; the Chavez-financed highway job is six times costlier. The Venezuelan figure of $400 million for Uruguay compares with U.S. aid of $49,000 through the State Department plus an estimated $800,000 in military education and counter-drug assistance. No U.S. money was specifically set aside for Dominica.

In the case of Bolivia, the State Department estimates about $117 million in aid for 2006 compared with $140 million in Venezuelan donations and loans for scholarships and other programs.

Some of the aid involves relatively small sums aimed at highly symbolic targets, such as the tire-making cooperative in Montevideo that was abandoned three years ago by a U.S. company which ran into economic troubles. The factory was restarted with money from Chavez.

"The Venezuela government has given us a big hand," said worker Wilson Tolotti, 57. "We will always be grateful."

Venezuelan bulldozers have already begun clearing land at Dominica's Melville Hall Airport for a longer runway to boost tourism. Under Petrocaribe, a deal bringing Venezuelan oil to needy Caribbean countries, the island has received asphalt, fuel storage tanks, university scholarships and $12 million for housing.

Dominica has supported Venezuela's U.N. bid despite lobbying by Guatemala, and its foreign minister, Charles Savarin, has acknowledged that Venezuela's aid "cannot go unnoticed" as a factor in the decision.

Both Venezuela and Guatemala say they have a majority in the 192-member General Assembly ahead of Monday's poll, but either would need two-thirds to win. If after repeated ballots neither side is able to muster that many votes, the 33-nation Latin American group might decide to put up another candidate.

It's a secret ballot, and countries aren't obliged to make known their preference, though much of the Caribbean and South America -- including Uruguay -- have voiced support for Venezuela.

U.S. officials, however, have spoken out against Venezuela and lobbied for Guatemala, which has the support of Colombia, apparently most of Central America, Europe and other countries.

The 53 countries in the African group are expected to tilt toward Venezuela, while Asia's 54 nations are said to be split.

Ten of the Security Council's 15 seats are filled by the regional groups for two-year stretches. The other five are occupied by its veto-wielding permanent members: Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States.

Chavez's aid pledges, meanwhile, have come under attack ahead of Venezuela's Dec. 3 presidential vote by opposition candidate Manuel Rosales, who says poor Venezuelans need the money.

Chavez points to government-funded improvements at Venezuela's universities, medical clinics, subsidized food markets and train lines, and insists his foreign aid is aimed at countering the effects of U.S.-inspired capitalism.

Ironically, this aid is bankrolled in large part by oil sales to the United States.

Venezuela also bought or pledged to buy more than $3.6 billion in bonds from Argentina, Ecuador and Bolivia to help them cover deficits. Most of that -- $3.5 billion -- went to Argentina, helping a leftist ally pay off its World Bank and International Monetary Fund debts. Venezuela then recycles the bonds though its own banks and ends up with a profit that between early last year and July 2006 totaled $200 million.

It's difficult to quantify the value of Chavez's many oil supply agreements under preferential terms to at least 17 countries across the region, including Cuba. Venezuela says it sells the fuel at market prices but offers low-cost financing and accepts partial payment in goods from cows to bananas.

The state oil company even offered an unspecified sum this year to a Brazilian samba group that won first prize in the Rio de Janeiro carnival parade. "It made us very happy and feeling like we are part of the triumph," Chavez said later.

The U.S. is the world's largest overall aid donor, though far less generous than Japan and European countries, given the size of its economy. Venezuela's largesse, meanwhile, goes far beyond the Western Hemisphere.

Last year it gave a total of $3 million in emergency food aid to Burkina Faso, Mauritania and Niger. It pledged to sell oil under preferential terms for London's trademark red buses in return for the leftist-run city's expertise in transport, housing and other areas. It is expanding its program in the United States to provide discounted heating oil to the poor.

Chavez says he's helping to build a "multipolar" world to counter U.S. dominance, lining up allies against what he calls a perpetual threat from Washington. A U.N. Security Council seat would give this ambition a sharp boost.

Associated Press correspondents Katie Burford in Mexico City, Ellsworth Carter in Roseau, Dominica, and Nick Wadhams at U.N. headquarters in New York contributed to this report.

Mexican Leftists Watching Tabasco Election (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

Today's gubernatorial vote may determine the political fate of former presidential candidate Lopez Obrador and that of his movement.

TACOTALPA, Mexico — If you ask Cesar Ascencio, there isn't much to cheer about in this sun-baked southern town. Jobs are scarce and even shade is hard to come by after trees in the central plaza were chopped down for a renovation that's stalled halfway to nowhere.

"We live in one of the worst pueblos in Mexico," the 72-year-old retiree said. "This place is dead."

A couple of hours later, it came to life, if only for a little while, when hundreds of townspeople gathered at the plaza to hear leftist politician Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador promise to bring help to the nation's poor and vengeance on its rich. The crowd roared.

Lopez Obrador, who lost the July 2 presidential election to free-market candidate Felipe Calderon, isn't running for office. But his political future, and that of his fledgling leftist movement, may rest on today's gubernatorial election in Tabasco, Lopez Obrador's home state. He has spent the last several weeks campaigning for Cesar Raul Ojeda, a fellow member of the Democratic Revolution Party, or PRD, who's making an uphill third bid for governor.

A win by Ojeda, 54, would also be a triumph for Lopez Obrador, whose followers barricaded Mexico City's main boulevard for weeks this summer to protest the national election. Lopez Obrador, who says Calderon won by fraud, plans to install himself as the "legitimate" president in an unofficial inauguration next month. But his fight may be an uphill one too, against perceptions that he'll bring Mexico more trouble than hope.

Support for Lopez Obrador has dwindled since protesters closed down their Mexico City encampments a month ago after judges rejected demands for a national recount. So the former Mexico City mayor returned to Tabasco and has since filled plazas in his bid to secure a victory for Ojeda — and keep his message alive.

"Lopez Obrador is trying to use Tabasco as a catapult for his movement," said Andres Granier, the 58-year-old former mayor of Villahermosa, the state capital, and Ojeda's opponent. "But it's not going to work."

Granier, who holds a lead of 9 percentage points in polls, is a candidate of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI, which has run the state for seven decades. He has waged an aggressive campaign and was a well-liked mayor, but that doesn't fully explain his advantage.

Lopez Obrador won 56% of the presidential vote in Tabasco and remains wildly popular here. The trouble is, his so-called campaign of civil resistance has scared people off, including admirers such as Gilberto Macias.

Macias was in no mood to talk politics as he waited for his overheated car to cool down off a road just outside town. But he quickly rattled off a wish list for the next governor: better salaries, more jobs, safer streets, more hospitals, new roads.

"The minimum wage here is 44 pesos a day [about $4], and food is expensive, electricity is expensive, toll roads are expensive," he said. "We all want help, but now people are afraid of the 'hard left.' We're not sure anymore if we're talking about Allende in Chile or some kind of totalitarian state."

The takeover of the capital of nearby Oaxaca state this summer by striking teachers has people rethinking their support of Mexico's emerging left, he said. "We don't want any kind of trouble like that here," the 53-year-old taxi driver said.

Another Tabascan, Ciro Perez Gomez, said Lopez Obrador was "a good man who's taken the wrong road."

Ojeda said a vote for him was a vote for Lopez Obrador and for the fight to steer Mexico toward a moderate left that uses government spending and private investment to make jobs, that pays subsidies to farmers to keep them from fleeing to the United States.

"It's a modern left," he said, "with government shouldering its responsibility to the people. How can the state have so much money and yet have so many poor?"

He disagreed that losing the election would hurt Lopez Obrador.

"This movement has its own life," Ojeda said. "A loss would give opponents the chance to say it's over, but I believe the roots are deep."

His PRI opponents, he said, were up to the same old political shenanigans that had kept them in power and soured voters on the party's presidential candidate, former Tabasco Gov. Roberto Madrazo, who finished a distant third in the national election.

Ojeda supporters posted a video on YouTube.com that shows a warehouse with hundreds of new bikes that they allege the PRI had planned to give to voters. The video, indexed under "mapacheo," slang for vote-buying, shows the warehouse being emptied within minutes by passersby after its discovery by Ojeda campaigners.

A PRI spokesman said voter giveaways — which included cooking pans and food — were humanitarian aid. He would not say whether the bicycles were the PRI's.

"They think they can buy the vote of the people," Ojeda said. "But we have more dignity than that."

The PRI warned last week that Lopez Obrador and the PRD had recruited more than 2,000 radicals to start trouble at the polls. On Friday, authorities announced the arrests of several out-of-state PRD supporters who acknowledged that they had planned to disrupt voting. One man was injured in a jailhouse fall before his confession, police said.

Granier has campaigned on a platform of unity and promises to bring potable water, as well as jobs, schools and clinics to outlying towns.

"There are two distinct roads: ours, which is one of accord; and theirs, of provocation," he said Wednesday in his closing campaign speech.

Later that night, Lopez Obrador boarded the last flight to Mexico City. An aide brought him a cup of coffee and Lopez Obrador begged off a last interview.

"It's over, and I'm tired," he said.

He answered one question: Does he really believe he and his movement will survive a loss in Tabasco?

"Yes, I do," he said. "I believe it in my heart."

China's New Leftist (NYT)

By Pankaj Mishra

DOJ_NMG_0081641

One day earlier this year I met Wang Hui at the Thinker's Cafe near Tsinghua University in Bejing, where he teaches. A small, compact man with streaks of gray in his short hair and a pleasant face that always seems ready to break into a smile, he arrived, as he would to all our subsequent meetings, on an old-fashioned bicycle, dressed in dark corduroys, a suede jacket and a black turtleneck that would not be amiss on an American campus.

Co-editor of China's leading intellectual journal, Dushu (Reading), and the author of a four-volume history of Chinese thought, Wang, still in his mid-40's, has emerged as a central figure among a group of writers and academics known collectively as the New Left. New Left intellectuals advocate a "Chinese alternative" to the neoliberal market economy, one that will guarantee the welfare of the country's 800 million peasants left behind by recent reforms. And unlike much of China's dissident class, which grew out of the protests in Tiananmen Square in 1989 and consists largely of human rights and pro-democracy activists, Wang and the New Left view the Communist leadership as a likely force for change. Recent events — the purge of party leaders on anticorruption charges late last month and continuing efforts to curb market excesses — suggest that this view is neither utopian nor paradoxical. Though New Leftists have never directed government policy, their concerns are increasingly amplified by the central leadership.

In the last few years, Wang has reflected eloquently and often on what outsiders see as the central paradox of contemporary China: an authoritarian state fostering a free-market economy while espousing socialism. On this first afternoon, he barely paused for small talk before embarking on an analysis of the country's problems. He described how the Communist Party, though officially dedicated to egalitarianism, had opened its membership to rich businessmen. Many of its local officials, he said, used their arbitrary power to become successful entrepreneurs at the expense of the rural populations they were meant to serve and joined up with real estate speculators to seize collectively owned land from peasants. (According to Chinese officials, 60 percent of land acquisitions are illegal.) The result has been an alliance of elite political and commercial interests, Wang said, that recalls similar alliances in the United States and many East Asian countries.

As he spoke about how market reforms have widened the gap between rich and poor, between rural and urban areas, smartly dressed students browsed through a highbrow collection (Leo Strauss, Jürgen Habermas), checked their e-mail and sipped their mochas. At the privately owned Thinker's Cafe and the adjoining All Sages bookshop, Wang seemed to be famous. Students greeted him reverentially; the staff was extra attentive. Yet Wang still belongs to a minority. Recoiling from the excesses of Maoism and the failures of the old planned economy, most Chinese intellectuals, even those with no connection to the state, see the market economy as indispensable to China's modernization and revival. Zhu Xueqin, a history professor at Shanghai University who is one of China's best-known liberal intellectuals, told me that he wants more, not fewer, market reforms. For him, China's present instability is caused not by economic forces but by a politically repressive regime that has prevented the emergence of a representative democracy and a constitutional government.

Wang readily acknowledges that China's efforts at economic reform have not been without great benefits. He applauds the first phase, which lasted from 1978 to 1985, for improving agricultural output and the rural standard of living. It is the central government's more recent obsession with creating wealth in urban areas — and its decision to hand over political authority to local party bosses, who often explicitly disregard central government directives — that has led, he said, to deep inequalities within China. The embrace of a neoliberal market economy has meant the dismantling of welfare systems, a widening income gap between rich and poor and deepening environmental crises not only in China but in the United States and other developed countries. For Wang, it is the task of intellectuals to remind the state of its old, unfulfilled obligations to peasants and workers.

Despite his invocation of socialist principles, Wang was quick to tell me that he dislikes the New Left label, even though he has used it himself. "Intellectuals reacted against 'leftism' in the 80's, blaming it for all of China's problems," he said, "and right-wing radicals use the words 'New Left' to discredit us, make us look like remnants from the Maoist days." Wang also doesn't care to be identified with the radical intellectuals of the 60's in America and Europe, to whom the term New Left was originally applied. Many of them, he said, had passion and slogans but very little practical politics, and not surprisingly, more than a few ended up with the neoconservatives, supporting "fantasy projects" like democracy in Iraq.

Wang prefers the term "critical intellectual" for himself and like-minded colleagues, some of whom are also part of China's nascent activist movement in the countryside, working to alleviate rural poverty and environmental damage. Though broadly left wing, Dushu publishes writing from across the ideological spectrum. Wang's own work draws on a broad range of Western thinkers, from the French historian Fernand Braudel to the globalization theorist Immanuel Wallerstein. "Intellectual quality is important to me," Wang said. "I don't want to run just any left-wing garbage." The magazine has carried abstract debates on postcolonial theory as well as, he claims, some of the most interesting analyses in China of how the government's urban-oriented reforms have damaged rural society. There are restrictions on what Dushu can publish, of course, and Wang is frank about them. As with all intellectual journals in mainland China, authors and editors at Dushu have to exercise a degree of self-censorship. Articles cannot directly criticize the leadership or deviate much from the official line on subjects that the Chinese government considers most sensitive — Taiwan or restive Muslim and Buddhist minorities in Xinjiang and Tibet.

"I get asked in Western countries, 'How do you define your position?'" Wang said. "'Are you a dissident?' I say no. What is a dissident? It is a cold-war category. And it has no meaning now. Many of the Chinese dissidents in America can return to China. But they don't want to. They are doing well in the U.S. To people who ask me if we are dissidents, I say, we are critical intellectuals. Some government policies we support. Others, we oppose. It really depends on the content of the policy."

Born in Yangzhou in the southeast province of Jiangsu, Wang was just 7 and entering primary school when the Cultural Revolution began in 1966. The decade-long chaos, which traumatized older generations, seems to have left benign memories for Wang. He remembers being taken by his school to work in the villages for a week or two during the school year. "My generation of urban intellectuals," he said, with a hint of pride, "is the last to have firsthand experience of conditions in the countryside."

He counts the 20 months he spent working in factories around Yangzhou after middle school as a valuable experience. In 1977, he took the first university entrance exams to be held after the Cultural Revolution, during which many universities were either shut or would admit only peasants, workers and soldiers. "Thousands of aspiring students," he reminisced, "were competing for a single place."

When he moved from Yangzhou to Beijing to begin his doctoral studies in the mid-80's, Wang found himself part of an even more privileged class. "Intellectuals," he said, "had been targeted during Mao's time; now, post-Mao, they were the elite again." And by then, Wang said, they all agreed on what needed to be done: China had to abandon its "feudal" and socialist traditions and catch up with the capitalist West. Scarred by the Cultural Revolution, intellectuals saw socialism in China as a failure. Consequently, they had, Wang argues, no real debate on whether a Western-style consumerist society could be successfully recreated or was environmentally sustainable in China. The West, especially the United States, was idealized.

Wang first began to develop his own views on contemporary China while working on a dissertation about one of the most admired of modern Chinese writers, Lu Xun (1881 1936). Lu Xun, Wang explained to me, was a writer of the left, but he was very critical of left-wing writers and activists. He criticized Chinese tradition, but was also an excellent classical scholar. He welcomed the Western idea of progress, but was also skeptical of it. The paradoxes in Lu Xun helped Wang to see that Chinese modernity could not be a simple matter of abandoning the old and embracing the new — as it had been for both Maoists and free-market capitalists.

For Wang, the problems associated with China's uneven development were first identified by the demonstrators in Tiananmen Square in 1989. Wang himself was one of the last protesters to leave the square on the morning of June 4, 1989, as the tanks of the People's Liberation Army closed in. Normally rather brisk and matter-of-fact, he grew animated as he described in fluent, if occasionally idiosyncratic, English how a "broad social movement" began to grow out of the distress caused by the shock therapy of market reforms. The students demanding freedom of speech and assembly were certainly the most visible. But there were, he said, many more Chinese in the cities — workers, government officials and small businessmen — demanding that the government control corruption and inflation, which had shot up to 30 percent after price controls on basic commodities were lifted.

In the spring of 1989, Wang was a fellow at the prestigious Chinese Academy of Social Sciences. Wang told me that he saw "democratic potential" in the protests and felt obliged to participate even though he had reservations about the students' lack of "theoretical or methodological coherence." For Wang, the student leaders recalled the Chinese intellectuals of the early 20th century, who were never more united than when they radically rejected everything in the past. Nevertheless, after the government sought to crush dissent by declaring martial law on May 20, 1989, Wang was drawn deeper into the movement. On the night of June 3, when the tanks and armored cars charged through Beijing, killing hundreds of unarmed resisters and injuring thousands more, Wang was among those assembled in the center of Tiananmen Square. He could hear the gunfire, but some of the more radical among the students still refused to leave.

Wang decided to stay and to try to persuade the students not to sacrifice their lives. "I knew," he said, "that if the result was violence, it would be disastrous for the whole country." Wang said that his fears were proved right: violence shrank the space for political debate, and the Chinese government used the period of intellectual silence that followed to begin dismantling more aspects of the welfare state, like the state-owned enterprises, that had long offered cradle-to-grave benefits to workers.

Eventually, the students advocating peaceful retreat prevailed and persuaded the People's Liberation Army to give them safe passage in the southeast corner of the square. Just before dawn, hundreds of students left the square through a narrow corridor, jostled and taunted by hostile soldiers. Within minutes, the students dispersed. Some of them were arrested and sentenced to long prison spells; others fled to Hong Kong and eventually to the West; many others, like Wang, disappeared for a few weeks.

When Wang returned to Beijing in late 1989, the authorities were waiting for him. "That was the most difficult time for me," he said. He was asked repeatedly: "What was your organization? Who were your associates?" After interrogations lasting for many months, he was sent to the northwestern province of Shaanxi, where dozens of other young scholars from Beijing were already undergoing — in the uniquely Chinese way — "re-education" by exposure to rural conditions.

In Wang's case, punishment by pedagogy seems to have been more successful than Chinese authorities could have anticipated. He dates his "real education" to the time he spent in Shaanxi, one of the poorest regions of China. He was shocked by the obvious disparity between the coastal cities, then enjoying the first fruits of economic reform, and the provinces. He was shocked, too, by his own ignorance and that of his colleagues in the 1989 social movement. "We had no idea that the old order in much of rural China was in deep crisis," he said.

The commune system in Shaanxi was dismantled as part of Deng Xiaoping's reforms, and land was redistributed. But the area produced nothing of much value, not even enough food. Deepening poverty led to a sharp increase in crime and social problems; violent conflicts broke out over land; men took to gambling, beating up, even selling, their wives and daughters. Wang lived in a low-lying village where his dormitory was frequently flooded while he slept. Much of his daily work consisted of writing didactic pamphlets warning peasants against gambling and crime; he also worked on the reconstruction of a primary school that had been destroyed by floodwaters. "It was during that year," Wang said, "that I realized how important a welfare system and cooperative network remained for many people in China. This is not a socialist idea. Even the imperial dynasties that ruled China kept a balance between rich and poor areas through taxes and almsgiving.

"People confine China's experience to the Communist dictatorship and failures of the planned economy and think that the market will now do everything. They don't see how many things in the past worked and were popular with ordinary people, like cooperative medical insurance in rural areas, where people organized themselves to help each other. That might be useful today, since the state doesn't invest in health care in rural areas anymore."

Many poor people Wang met during his year in Shaanxi saw him as the educated man from Beijing who would tell the mandarins of the central government to send them some help. "I felt burdened by this role," Wang said. "I couldn't tell them that I was in no position to do anything." Wang returned, he told me, from his 10-month exile with a keen sense of the gap between the worlds of intellectuals and ordinary people.

During his time in Shaanxi, the influential Journal of Literary Review denounced his research on Lu Xun as an example of "bourgeois liberalization." Nevertheless, Wang had no trouble returning to academic life.

Wang doesn't like to talk much about 1989. He complains about the "stereotype" of China in the Western media conjured by Tiananmen. Nonetheless, our conversation about Tiananmen was unusual. While traveling through Chinese cities, I had found it hard to get people to talk about it. When Deng Xiaoping sought to bury the ghosts of Tiananmen for good by calling for speedy market reforms in 1992, he may well have calculated that the prospect of personal wealth — and access to Western brand-name goods — would compensate many newly enriched people for the lack of political democracy. If so, he seems to have been proved right. The largest public disturbance in China since Tiananmen occurred in August 1992, when hundreds of thousands of Chinese tried to buy shares in the newly opened stock exchange of Shenzen.

The effort to create wealth in urban areas through export-oriented industries — part of the "let some get rich first" policy announced by Deng Xiaoping and affirmed by his successors — has given the Chinese economy an average growth rate of 10 percent and made it the fourth largest in the world. Yet China remains one of the world's poorest countries. More than 150 million people survive on a dollar a day. About 200 million of the rural population are crowding the cities and towns in search of low-paying jobs. More than four million Chinese participated in the 87,000 protests recorded in 2005, and these statistics may not fully convey the rage and discontent of Chinese living with one of the world's highest income inequalities and deteriorating health and education systems, as well as the arbitrary fees and taxes imposed by local party officials. Much of this, Wang said, could be laid at the feet of the "right-wing radicals" or neoliberal economists who cite Milton Friedman and Friedrich Hayek (advocates of unregulated markets who inspired Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher in the 80's) and who argue for China's integration into the global economy without taking into account the social price of mass privatization. And it is they, Wang added, who have held favor with the ruling elite and have dominated the state-run media.

Only in the last decade, Wang said, have intellectuals of the New Left begun to challenge the notion that a market economy leads inevitably to democracy and prosperity. Wang, who helped found an academic journal called Xueren (The Scholar) after returning from exile in 1991, was well placed to observe those intellectuals. As they came into greater contact with Western academics and scholars, they became more aware of problems not just in European and American societies but also in post-Communist countries that were trying to bring their planned economies closer to neoliberal models. China's intention to join the World Trade Organization (which it did in 2001) provoked unexpectedly sharp debates among scholars. As Wang described it, the terms of the debate had changed: "Many people knew by then that globalization is not a neutral word describing a natural process. It is part of the growth of Western capitalism, from the days of colonialism and imperialism." Which is not to say that the New Left embraced an easy antiglobalist position; it has been critical of recent anti-Japanese and anti-American outbursts among urban, middle-class Chinese — of what Wang dubbed "consumer nationalism." That, Wang said, was the same kind of globalization that America advocates: "It is really a form of hypernationalism, which is why you hear talk of tariffs and penalties on China when American economic interests are hurt."

Wang paused and then added: "Many people also learned that the reason the Chinese economy did not collapse like the Asian tiger economies in 1997 was that the national state was able to protect it. Now, of course, China with its export-dominated economy is more dependent on the Western world order, especially the American economy, than India."

In January of this year, Wang published a long investigative article exposing the plight of workers in a factory in his hometown, Yangzhou, a city of about one million. According to Wang, in 2004 the local government sold the profitable state-owned textile factory to a real estate developer from the southern city of Shenzen. Worker-equity shares were bought for 30 percent of their actual value, and then more than a thousand workers were laid off after mismanagement of the factory led to losses. In July 2004, the workers went on strike. In what Wang calls an agitation without precedent in the history of Yangzhou, the workers obstructed a major highway, halted bus traffic and attacked the gates of local government buildings.

Wang told me that he was helping the workers to sue the local government. He had spent time working in a nearby factory before college and this, he said, made him feel a particular connection to them. He remembered that his pay had been low — less than $2 a month by current exchange rates — but, he said, what was crucial was that the workers he knew then felt secure in their jobs. "People claim," he said, "that the market will automatically force the state to become more democratic. But this is baseless. We only have to think about the alliance of elites formed in the process of privatization. The state will change only when it is under pressure from a large social force, like the workers and peasants."

Wang's story about Yangzhou is not unique. There are many accounts of how local government officials controlling public property have amassed fortunes by privatizing state assets. According to a recent report by the activist Liu Xiaobo, more than 90 percent of the 20,000 richest people in China are related to senior government or Communist Party officials.

For Wang, democracy is not just a simple matter of expanding political freedom for the middle class or creating legal and constitutional rights for a minority already substantially empowered by market reforms. Democracy in China, he said, has to be based upon the active consent and mobilization of the majority of its population, and be able to ensure social and economic justice for them.

Yet for some New Left intellectuals, like Cui Zhiyuan, a close friend and collaborator of Wang's who teaches political science at Tsinghua University, there is opportunity in the collision of capitalism and socialism. "There is more space here for new ideas," Cui told me as he described why he had returned to China after many years in the United States. "The capitalist system is fixed in the West, but things are still in flux in places like China and India. We have a historic opportunity to build a better, more just society than the West." For Cui, it is important to clarify the concepts first. "It is not helpful," he said, "to see socialism and capitalism as opposed and separate. Both have traveled together in the 20th century. Not just European welfare states, even American capitalism has a socialist component, which was arrived at after compromise with the trade unions."

In recent years, Cui has found a receptive and powerful audience on an issue that lies at the very foundation of the Chinese socialist state: the collective ownership of property. Liberal Chinese economists argue that private property is sacred and inviolable in a market economy, a radical idea in the Chinese context. In an article he published in Dushu in 2004, Cui challenged this notion, emphasizing the essentially communal nature of property ownership. He cited Thomas Jefferson's decision to reword John Locke's principles of life, liberty and property with life, liberty and happiness in the Declaration of Independence.

"Jefferson recognized," he said, "that property rights emanate from society, not from nature. That's why there was no specific article on property rights in the U.S. Constitution and it had to be brought in later through the Fifth Amendment." Cui went on to relate with something close to glee that his article had circulated widely among legislators in the National People's Congress, China's Parliament, in 2004. It had helped, he said, to provoke a debate that led the Congress to adopt a compromise amendment to the constitution, similar in wording to the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, which simply states that no person "be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law."

This spring it began to become clear that the New Left's advocacy of a welfare state is being echoed within the Communist leadership, which is fearful of social instability and is keen to consolidate its power and legitimacy. In March, a few weeks before I met with Wang, the National People's Congress convened in Beijing and unexpectedly became a forum for the first open ideological debate within the party for years. Legislators accused government officials of selling out China's interests to market forces. Such was the antimarket mood that a bill to defend private property and grant land titles to farmers — one that both foreign investors in China and Chinese businessmen had been lobbying for — was not even discussed. Describing major new investments in rural areas, the Chinese premier, Wen Jiabao, emphasized that "building a socialist countryside" was a "major historic task" before the Communist Party. He also outlined steps to balance economic growth with environmental protection.

A German journalist told me that it was the most left-wing speech he had heard from a senior Chinese leader during his eight years in Beijing: "Even American and European politicians don't talk about achieving a Green G.D.P." Wang agreed. He said that he was also pleased to see President Hu Jintao and Premier Wen Jiabao focusing on relations with Asian countries. "We were too obsessed with the United States during Jiang Zemin's time," he said. "We really need to improve our relations with Japan and India. We belong to such old and distinguished civilizations, and we cannot just be simple followers and imitators of America.

"It is a huge achievement," he added, a smile on his face, "that the premier should openly admit that health care and education is a failure. It has never happened before." Wang said he thought that the government was sincere about eradicating rural poverty. But he was still cautious. "There has been so much decentralization in China," he said, "that it is not easy to translate central government policy into action." Last month, in the first purge of a high-ranking party member since 1995, the central leadership removed the Shanghai party chief on corruption charges, leading to speculation that there would be a reconfiguring of relations between the central government and provincial leaders and perhaps a shift in policy toward shoring up social-welfare systems and stemming pollution. Wang remained skeptical. "The Shanghai case is encouraging at least," Wang said in a recent e-mail message. "I think there will be some political results from it, but they are results rather than reasons."

The dangers of failing to improve conditions for the majority are clear to Wang: "If we don't improve the situation, there will be more authoritarianism. We have already seen in Russia how people prefer a strong ruler like Putin because they are fed up with corruption, political chaos and economic stagnation. When radical marketization makes people lose their sense of security, the demand for order and intervention from above is inevitable."

In attacking corrupt local governments, the New Left often seems to want to institute big-brotherly government of the kind authoritarian politicians like. Certainly the growing accord between the central government's socialist rhetoric and New Left ideas makes many uneasy. Lung Yingtai, a well-known Taiwanese writer and democracy advocate, told me earlier this year that she was wary of the New Left intellectuals, who, she said, appear too close ideologically to the Communist regime. Taking this view one step further, Liu Junning, a popular liberal political theorist who left China in 1999 after being blacklisted by the Chinese government but has since returned, claimed that the New Left was another name for the nationalistic old guard of the Communist Party, which was inspired by hatred of the West.

While this seems an exaggeration, Wen Tiejun, a former government official who runs rural reconstruction projects and is identified as New Left, had attended what he called "brainstorming sessions" with Hu Jintao and Wen Jiabao. Typically, intellectuals in Communist countries (Vaclav Havel or Adam Michnik, for example) have gained moral authority by assuming a critical stance toward the all-powerful state. How do New Left thinkers in China calibrate their relationship with a state that has imprisoned many of their colleagues and generally shown little tolerance for criticism of the party?

When I posed this question to Cui, he momentarily lost his exuberant manner. "It is a very important question," he said. "How to deal with the government, both morally and intellectually. This is a big challenge for us."

Cui does not regard the Communist regime as a "totality." There were, he said, many different aspects of it, at both the local and central levels. "Almost every day," Cui said, "The New York Times carries reports of peasants agitating against the Communist government, but if you listen to what the peasants are saying, they are telling the central government that the local government has violated their rights. So even the peasants can see the different aspects of the state, who supports them and who doesn't."

Wang Xiaoming, professor of cultural studies at Shanghai University, positions himself to the right of Wang Hui but says that he sympathizes with the New Left's pragmatic attitude toward the Communist regime. "Civil society is very weak in China," he said, "and since the government is the most active agent of change, we have to push the government to do what it should do besides pushing the government to give up some of its powers."

When I met with Wang Hui for the last time, he dismissed any claims about increased New Left influence over the regime. "What we have tried to do is create an intellectual situation in which new policies can be explored," he said. "I know that many leaders read Wen Tiejun's article; they also read Cui's article on property rights. There have been other articles in Dushu that have been equally influential, and I am pleased about this. But we have no other connection with the regime."

Wang also seems to have no anxiety that ideological convergence with the regime will turn New Left intellectuals into pro-government policy wonks and hacks, part of an old Chinese tradition of intellectuals advising the state. "We look at things from a Chinese perspective naturally, but we also try to think beyond the framework of the nation-state," he said. "People ask in the West, How could China develop capitalism with an authoritarian state? But that's ignoring how modern capitalism grew in the West, without much democracy and with the help of imperialism and colonialism. You have to ask whether this unique economic model of the West can be globalized without great wars and destruction of the environment. This is not an abstract issue. China has stopped felling its forests, most of which have disappeared, but some country still has to produce wood for Chinese consumption."

At our last meeting, Wang also spoke more about a subject Cui had brought up with me: how the rise of China and India throws up new challenges and possibilities with profound implications for the world at large. "Western societies have been on top for the last two centuries and shaped the world with the decisions they made," he said. "China and India will now play equally crucial roles in the new century. But what will they be? I think it is very important for Chinese and Indian intellectuals not just to imitate the West. They have to explore alternatives to the Western model of modernity. Otherwise, the 'consumer nationalists' are already saying, 'America was on top; now we are on top.'"

Wang laughed, and added, "This is not interesting."

Cold Warrior (NYT)

By Henry A. Kissinger

DOJ_NMG_0081647

Dean Acheson was perhaps the most vilified secretary of state in modern American history. Robert L. Beisner, in "Dean Acheson: A Life in the Cold War," his sweeping and thoughtful account of Acheson's tenure, cites a scholar who, with meticulous pedantry, discovered that during the four years — 1949-53 — that Acheson served as secretary of state, Republicans made 1,268 antagonistic statements about him on the Senate floor and only seven favorable ones (one wonders for what).

History has treated Acheson more kindly. Accolades for him have become bipartisan. Secretaries of state appointed by the party of his erstwhile tormentors have described him as a role model; Condoleezza Rice is the most recent example. Thirty-five years after his death, Acheson has achieved iconic status. This is all the more remarkable in view of his out-of-scale personality, so at odds with the present period, in which eminence seems to be tolerable only in the garb of the commonplace.

The debonair conduct, the bristling mustache, the Bond Street tailoring, the biting wit, the extraordinary analytical skill coupled with a defiant refusal to turn the other cheek bespoke an affirmation of the idiosyncratic over the conventional. Acheson was a man of high principle, whose hero was Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr., an iconoclastic Boston Brahmin shaped by the 19th century, and whose best friend was Felix Frankfurter, the brilliant son of Jewish immigrants.

Though Acheson served during the transition when America emerged as a world power and enjoyed a nuclear monopoly, the scale of government was as yet relatively small, and Washington was still a comparatively provincial city. Its political conflicts were not shaped by public relations advisers or tested on focus groups; hence they were somewhat personal. That senior officials must remain blandly obliging while their veracity or honor is being systematically challenged was never part of the Acheson code. This explains the scene, unimaginable today, when Acheson, in the author's words, at a hearing before the Senate Appropriations Committee, admonished Senator Kenneth Wherry of Nebraska not to shake his dirty finger in his face. When Wherry persisted, Acheson rose and launched a roundhouse swing at the senatorial gadfly, which was stopped at the last moment because Adrian Fisher, the legal adviser of the State Department, wrapped his arms around Acheson and pulled him down into his seat.

When Acheson became secretary of state, America had only just started its journey toward global involvement. Africa was still colonial; Britain was predominant in much of the Middle East; Indian democracy was only two years old; Germany and Japan were still occupied countries. The debate was not over aspirations to hegemony but over whether the nation should engage itself internationally at all, never mind permanently. It was appropriate that Acheson entitled his memoirs "Present at the Creation."

The position of secretary of state is potentially the most fulfilling in the government short of the presidency. Its scope is global; ultimately it rests on almost philosophical assumptions as to the nature of world order and the relationship of order to progress and national interest. Lacking such a conceptual framework, incoherence looms in the face of the daily task of redefining America's relationship to the world via the thousands of messages from nearly 200 diplomatic posts and the constant flow of communication from the Executive Department — all this against the backdrop of Congressional liaison and press inquiry.

Acheson served as under secretary of state and then as secretary during the period when a people that had known no direct continuing threat to its security since the early days of the Republic had to be brought to recognize that its permanent participation in the world was indispensable for peace and security. Inevitably this realization was painful and slow in coming, if indeed it has been fully achieved to this day. This is why Acheson was assailed from both political sides, by those insisting on an end to involvement through total victory over the threat and, on the other side, by those who thought there was no threat to begin with, or at least none that required Acheson's militant response.

In this maelstrom, Acheson dealt with the five principal tasks of any secretary of state: the identification of the challenge; the development of a strategy to deal with it; organizing and motivating the bureaucracy in the State Department and in other agencies; persuading the American public; and conducting American diplomacy toward other countries. These tasks require the closest collaboration between the president and the secretary of state; secretaries of state who seek to base their influence on the prerogatives of the office invariably become marginalized. Presidents cannot be constrained by administrative flowcharts; for a secretary of state to be effective, he or she has to get into the president's head, so to speak. This is why Acheson made it a point to see Truman almost every day they were in town together and why their friendship was so crucial to the achievements of the Truman years.

No secretary can fulfill all these tasks with equal skill — though Acheson came closer than any other of the modern period. His overriding challenge was to define a conceptual framework on which to base America's involvement in global affairs. Beisner, a former president of the Society for Historians of American Foreign Relations, describes this process in detail and with special emphasis on Acheson's growing debate with George Kennan. Acheson turned Kennan's seminal article, "The Sources of Soviet Conduct," into the operating principle of American foreign policy. He interpreted it to mean that the task of foreign policy was to create situations of strength around the Soviet periphery to deter any temptation for aggression. Negotiation with the Soviet Union was to be deferred until these situations of strength had come into being; any attempt to begin diplomacy prematurely would undermine the primary task.

Acheson's overriding priority, in the years immediately following World War II, was to restore Western Europe and create an Atlantic community to resist what then appeared as the Soviet colossus. He built the structure that sustained democracy during the cold war, with the Marshall Plan, the creation of NATO and the return of Germany and Japan to the community of nations. But Acheson was less precise about the role of diplomacy in this process once the architectural phase was completed.

Kennan represented the other strand of American thinking. He rejected what he considered the militarization of his own views, inaugurating a debate that has not ended to this day. Acheson implicitly believed that situations of strength would be self-enforcing, and he played down the importance of diplomatic engagement with the adversary. Kennan raised the question of how to gain Soviet acquiescence in the process and urged negotiation, even while the ultimate structure was being built. Acheson treated diplomacy as the more or less automatic consequence of a strategic deployment; Kennan saw it as an autonomous enterprise depending largely on diplomatic skill. The danger of the Acheson approach has been stagnation and gradual public disenchantment with stalemate. The danger of the Kennan approach has been that diplomacy might become a technical exercise in splitting differences and thus shade into appeasement. How to merge the two strands so that military force and diplomacy are mutually supportive and so that national strategy becomes a seamless web is the essence of a continuing national controversy.

Beisner shows how the failure to do so with respect to the Korean War was the cause of the single greatest error of Acheson's tenure: initially, the placing of Korea publicly outside the American defense perimeter (though this was conventional wisdom at the time) and, later, the inability, after the United States crossed the 38th parallel, to correlate military operations with some achievable diplomatic objectives.

For someone like myself, who knew Acheson, Beisner's portrait does not always capture the vividness of his personality, which emerges too much as a list of eccentricities. Acheson's relationship with the Nixon White House, and to President Nixon himself, is too cavalierly dismissed as the result of ego and an old man's vanity. As a participant in all these meetings, I considered that relationship an example of Acheson's generosity of spirit. Nixon had made essentially unforgivable attacks on Acheson during his 1952 campaign for vice president. But when he reached out to Acheson, it was received with the consideration Acheson felt he owed to the office, as a form of duty to the country. Acheson dealt with the issues Nixon put before him thoughtfully, precisely, without any attempt at flattery, in pursuit of his conception of national service and, unlike some other outside advisers, without offering advice that had not been solicited.

Acheson emerges from the Beisner book as the greatest secretary of state of the postwar period in the sweep of his design, his ability to implement it, the extraordinary associates with whom he surrounded himself and the nobility of his personal conduct. He was impatient with relativists who sought surcease from the complexity of decisions by postulating the moral equivalence of the United States and the Soviet Union. His values were absolute, but he knew also that statesmen are judged by history beyond contemporary debates, and this requires a willingness to achieve great goals in stages, each of which is probably imperfect by absolute standards.

This was the theme of an Acheson speech at the War College in August 1951: "There was not 'one more river to cross' but 'countless problems stretching into the future.' ... Americans must reconcile themselves to 'limited objectives' and work in congress with others, for an essential part of American power was the 'ability to evoke support from others — an ability quite as important as the capacity to compel.' "

The importance of that perception has not changed with the passage of time.

TERRORISM NEWS:

U.S. May Charge Alleged 9/11 Leader With The Death Of Daniel Pearl (MCT)

By Carol Rosenberg

McClatchy Newspapers, October 15, 2006

U.S. military officials intend to charge Guantanamo Bay captive Khalid Sheikh Mohammed with the murder of Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl, according to a Time magazine report.

U.S. officials have identified Mohammed as the al Qaida mastermind of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, and President Bush has said he's a likely candidate for a war-crimes trial.

But the Pentagon's chief war-crimes prosecutor told The Miami Herald on Friday that the Time report may be premature; prosecutors are still studying the case files of Mohammed and 13 other so-called high-value detainees who were turned over to the military by the CIA.

Captured in Pakistan in March 2003, Mohammed had been held in secret CIA detention until his Labor Day transfer to the Guantanamo detention center at the U.S. Navy base in southeast Cuba.

On Thursday, Time posted an item on its Web site reporting that administration officials want to charge Mohammed with Pearl's January 2002 murder, in which Pearl's throat was slit. The killing was captured on a grisly videotape.

"One former U.S. national security official tells Time there is no doubt that KSM personally wielded the knife that killed the Wall Street Journal reporter," the report said.

Military intelligence circles refer to Mohammed, a U.S.-educated, Kuwait-born Pakistani, as KSM, a nom de guerre of sorts that Bush himself adopted in revealing Mohammed's transfer to Guantanamo on Sept. 6.

If charged and tried before the administration's new, redesigned military commissions, Mohammed would be the most senior al Qaida figure to face trial.

Unclear is whether future prosecutions would include charges of conspiracy, which had been challenged as unconstitutional in the first effort to try 10 alleged al Qaida co-conspirators already at Guantanamo.

A Pearl murder charge would allege a specific act and identify a high-profile victim, a scenario the chief Pentagon prosecutor said hadn't yet been considered.

"I at this point in time certainly can't say that," said Air Force Col. Moe Davis, whose earlier prosecutions were upended in June by a Supreme Court decision that struck down the previous military commission format.

Pentagon attorneys are presently drawing up new rules by which new commissions would be staged, though probably not until next year.

Moreover, the latest arrivals at Guantanamo, including Ramzi Binalshibh and Abu Zubaydah, other alleged al Qaida plotters, have yet to go through basic military review panels to confirm that they're "enemy combatants."

Davis said he was surprised by the Time report on plans to try Mohammed for the Pearl murder and said was definitely not the source of it.

"Ultimately if he was to be prosecuted in a military commission, it would be up to this office to draft the charges," he said in a telephone interview. "But it is way too early to be making any decision on not just him, but any of the 14.

"We haven't scratched the surface deep enough to make any decisions on that."

Time doesn't name its source but attributed to "national security officials" the detail that Mohammed admitted under interrogation to having killed Pearl, "admitting without remorse that he personally severed Pearl's head and telling interrogators he had to switch knives after the first one `got dull.'"

The magazine also reported that it compared the hands seen on the videotape executing Pearl to Mohammed's hands and confirmed it was him. It did not elaborate.

Mohammed has been identified as a 1986 graduate of North Carolina Agricultural and Technical State University and is reportedly fluent in Arabic, English and Urdu.

Mohammed, who's about 40, has no lawyer and hasn't been seen publicly since his capture, although he and the other 13 detainees recently met with Red Cross delegates and have been registered as U.S.-held prisoners for the first time in up to four years of captivity at an undisclosed location.

Pearl, a Stanford University graduate who was 38 when he was killed, disappeared while on assignment in Pakistan in January 2002, pursuing an article about Islamic extremism.

1 Man Still Locked Up From 9/11 Sweeps (AP)

By Martha Mendoza

AP, October 15, 2006

In a jail cell at an immigration detention center in Arizona sits a man who is not charged with a crime, not suspected of a crime, not considered a danger to society.

But he has been in custody for five years.

His name is Ali Partovi. And according to the Department of Homeland Security, he is the last to be held of about 1,200 Arab and Muslim men swept up by authorities in the United States after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

There has been no full accounting of all of these individuals. Nor has a promised federal policy to protect against unrestricted sweeps been produced.

Human rights groups tried to track the detainees; members of Congress denounced the arrests. They all believed that all of those who had been arrested had been deported, released or processed through the criminal justice system.

Just this summer, it was reported that an Algerian man, Benemar "Ben" Benatta, was the last detainee, and that his transfer to Canada had closed the book on the post-9/11 sweeps.

But now The Associated Press has learned that at least one person — Partovi — is still being held. The Department of Homeland Security insists he really is the last one in custody.

"Certainly it's not our goal as an agency to keep anyone detained indefinitely," said DHS spokesman Dean Boyd. Boyd said the department would like to remove Partovi from the United States but that he refuses to return to his homeland of Iran.

And so he remains, a curious remnant of a desperate time.

Within hours of the Sept. 11 attacks — before it was even clear if they were over — the FBI was ordered to identify the terrorists who had managed to slip so smoothly into American society and to catch anyone who might have been working with them. The FBI operation was called PENTTBOM; it was swift and fierce, and the stakes couldn't have been higher.

When in doubt, the orders came, arrest now and ask questions later. To make this easier, law enforcement officials were authorized to use immigration charges as needed. The risk of allowing terrorists to slip away just because there wasn't ample evidence to hold them on terror charges could not be tolerated. And thus hundreds of individuals who were not terrorists, nor associated with terrorists, were temporarily taken into city, county and federal custody.

They were caught in their bedrooms while they slept, pulled from the restaurant kitchens where they worked, stopped at the border, even federal offices where they had gone to seek help. In the end, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft's call for "aggressive detentions" in the unprecedented sweeps netted more than 1,200 individuals in less than two months.

The initial reaction to the sweeps was confusion. Members of Congress, leading civil rights organizations, Arab and Muslim activists, even the Justice Department's internal watchdogs, didn't know how to react.

"After 9/11, everyone was caught off guard. There was so much secrecy surrounding the government's policies that it took a number of months before the public and civil-liberties groups began unraveling what the government was doing," said Lee Gelernt, an American Civil Liberties Union attorney.

Then came demands, from Congress, from the Justice Department's Inspector General, from the ACLU and Human Rights Watch and from Arab and Muslim activists, that these individuals must be accounted for.

To date that hasn't occurred.

"The fact is the United States has not come forward with information on what happened to these people, or released their names," said Rachel Meeropol, a staff attorney at the Center for Constitutional Rights, an advocacy organization that represents several detainees being held in Guantanamo. "Our understanding is that the majority of these people who were swept up on immigration violations were then held in detention until they were cleared of any connection to terrorism. We believe that accounts for the vast majority of people who were swept up."

Here's what is known: 762 of the 1,200 PENTTBOM arrestees were charged with immigration violations at the behest of the FBI because agents thought they might be associated with terrorism. Partovi was one of these 762. Much as Partovi used a false passport, nearly all of these detainees had violated immigration laws, either by overstaying their visas, entering the country illegally, or violating some other immigration law.

Unlike Partovi, almost everyone was either deported or released within a few months.

There were still at least 438 other individuals who were not accounted for. Most of those individuals, said Justice Department officials, were released within days. But at least 93 were charged with federal crimes and processed through the courts, and an unknown number were deemed material witnesses.

As the years passed, said the ACLU's Gelernt, public concern faded.

DOJ_NMG_0081654

"Initially there was a lot of attention on the 1,200 people, but we're still not sure exactly what happened to all of them," said the ACLU's Gelernt.

The repercussions are still being felt, say advocates.

"Those 1,200 were taken in on pseudo-immigration charges," said Jennifer Daskal of Human Rights Watch. "It really is a black mark on the U.S. and it undermines our intelligence gathering because it creates distrust between law enforcement officials and communities where those officials should be building rapport and trust."

"People lost years of their lives and families were ripped apart in the frenzy of fear," said Kerri Sherlock, director of policy and planning at the Rights Working Group, an advocacy organization in Washington D.C. "Do we really want to be a country that locks people up without guaranteeing their basic constitutional rights?"

In June 2003, the Justice Department's inspector general, an in-house auditor, found widespread abuses in the way immigration laws were used to hold people suspected of terrorism in the months following 9/11. The inspector general made 21 recommendations aimed at protecting individuals' civil rights. Twenty of those recommendations have been adopted.

The last recommendation calls for the Justice Department and the Department of Homeland Security to formalize policies, responsibilities, and procedures for managing a national emergency that involves alien detainees. After the inspector general's report, the Justice and Homeland Security departments agreed with the recommendation and began negotiating over language. Officials at both departments say those negotiations are still going on.

"The Department of Homeland Security and the Department of Justice continue to work toward the development of formal joint policies and approaches for the handling of such national security cases during periods of national impact," said Homeland Security Department spokesman Dean Boyd.

However, Boyd stressed that guidelines were set up in 2004 to make sure detainees' rights are being protected on a case-by-case basis.

"We learned from the past," he said. "We evaluate each situation to make sure it's being handled fairly."

Tim Lynch, a lawyer with the libertarian think tank Cato Institute, said guidelines are not enough.

"I don't think the guidelines will mean very much in an emergency if they don't have the binding force of law," he said. "We shouldn't be surprised if those guidelines aren't followed if there's another massive attack."

When the AP wrote Ali Partovi to ask for an interview, he called collect from the Florence Correctional Center, a privately run detention center in Arizona where he is held. Adamantly, he said he did not want to be interviewed and that he wanted to remain private, even though he said understood his case files, including litigation he files himself, are part of the public record.

He later reportedly told a public affairs officer at the facility that he is too busy for an interview — perhaps preparing his many legal appeals.

In his lawsuits — there have been seven so far — Partovi claims he is a victim of civil rights abuses and demands between $5 million and $10 million in restitution. The most recent was filed in July.

The staff at the jail where he was first held "poured hot coffee on my body, they also poured cold ice water on my body," he wrote in one, claiming that staffers also cuffed his hands and feet, which caused "my ankle and lower extremities to swell abnormally."

"It is my firm belief that I am constantly subjected to physical abuse (because) of my ethnicity, I am Iranian of Persian birth," he wrote in another, filed this summer. In that lawsuit he claimed that immigration officers forced him to kneel while handcuffed, and then kicked and punched his stomach and kidneys.

"As you can imagine, this is very, very painful when you are cuffed from behind," he wrote.

A spokesman for the U.S. Attorney said that office was aware of the lawsuits but could not comment on them. A detention center spokesman said he was not aware of any lawsuits and could not respond.

Partovi doesn't have a lawyer, and he told the AP he doesn't want one, choosing instead to represent himself, gleaning expertise from the prison library.

He did have a lawyer once, when he was arrested in Guam in the fall of 2001, trying to enter the country on a fraudulent Italian passport.

"Mr. Partovi came into Guam International Airport using a false passport. He explained about having been married to a Japanese women and the arrangement wasn't working out. He applied for political asylum, and I believe the federal government thought he might be a terror suspect," said Curtis Charles Van de Veld, who was hired by the federal government to represent him.

Partovi was sentenced to 175 days in custody, which he had already served by the time he pleaded guilty in 2002. Then he was turned over to the Department of Homeland Security.

DOJ_NMG_0081655

Until the AP contacted him, Van de Veld didn't realize his former client was still in custody.

"I'm surprised he hasn't contacted me," he said.

2 Ordered Not To Discuss Gitmo Claims (AP)

By Miranda Leitsinger

AP, October 15, 2006

A paralegal and a military lawyer who brought forward allegations about prisoner abuse at the Guantanamo Bay detention center have been ordered not to speak with the press, lawyers and a military spokeswoman said Saturday.

Marine Lt. Col. Colby Vokey, who represents a detainee at the U.S. naval base in eastern Cuba, filed a complaint with the Pentagon last week alleging that abuse was ongoing at the prison. He attached a sworn statement from his paralegal, Sgt. Heather Cerveny, in which she said several Guantanamo guards bragged in a bar about beating detainees, describing it as common practice.

Muneer Ahmad, a civilian defense lawyer for Omar Khadr, a Canadian detainee whose military counsel is Vokey, said that Vokey and Cerveny were ordered Friday by the U.S. Marines not to speak with the press.

A spokeswoman for the Marines confirmed the order, saying Vokey's supervisor — Col. Carol Joyce, the Marines' chief defense counsel — had directed him not to communicate with the media "pending her review of the facts."

"This is necessary to ensure all actions of counsel are in compliance with regulations establishing professional standards for military attorneys," the spokeswoman, 1st Lt. Blanca E. Binstock, said in a statement.

Reached by telephone, Vokey declined to comment, saying, "I can't even talk about it." When asked if he was going to abide by the order for the time being, he said, "Yes."

Telephone calls placed to Cerveny and a Pentagon spokesman were not immediately returned.

Ahmad said Vokey was also barred from talking to the media about anything related to the military commissions — tribunals set up to try detainees. He said he didn't know how the order was issued and that Vokey previously had the military's authorization to speak with the media.

"I think he is very concerned about his ability to perform his job as a lawyer," Ahmad said. "It's really quite troubling ... at this point I'm not sure what our next steps will be."

Cerveny, 23, visited Guantanamo last month and has said she spent an hour with the guards at the military club. She said the guards stopped discussing beating detainees after finding out that she works for a detainee's legal team.

"It was a general consensus that I (detected) that as a group this is something they did. That this was OK at Guantanamo, that this is how the detainees get treated," Cerveny said in a telephone interview Thursday.

Gen. John Craddock, commander of the U.S. Southern Command, said Friday that he had ordered an investigation headed by an Army colonel.

The military Joint Task Force that runs the detention camps in Guantanamo Bay pledged to work with investigators from the Southern Command, which oversees U.S. military operations in the Caribbean and Latin America.

There are now 454 detainees at Guantanamo Bay, according to Vincent Lusser, a spokesman for the Geneva-based International Committee of the Red Cross.

Guantanamo Bay began receiving prisoners, most of them captured in Afghanistan and Pakistan, in January 2002. Only 10 of the detainees have been charged with crimes.

Marine Corps Issues Gag Order In Detainee Abuse Case (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

The action has lawyers worrying they could be punished for defending Guantanamo clients.

MIAMI — The U.S. Marine Corps has threatened to punish two members of the military legal team representing a terrorism suspect being held at Guantanamo Bay if they continue to speak publicly about reported prisoner abuse, a civilian lawyer from the defense team said Saturday.

The action directed at Lt. Col. Colby Vokey and Sgt. Heather Cerveny follows their report last week that Guantanamo guards bragged about beating detainees, said Muneer Ahmad, an American University law professor who assists in the defense of Canadian suspect Omar Khadr.

The order has heightened fears among the military defense lawyers for Guantanamo prisoners that their careers will suffer for exposing flaws and injustices in the system, Ahmad said.

"In one fell swoop, the government is gagging a defense lawyer and threatening retaliation against a whistle-blower," Ahmad said. "It really points out what is wrong with the detainee legislation that Bush is scheduled to sign on Tuesday: It permits the abuse of detainees to continue, immunizes the wrongdoers and precludes the detainees from ever challenging it in court."

The Marine Corps said the gag order had been issued to ensure the legal team's actions were in compliance with professional standards. "The Chief Defense Counsel of the Marine Corps, as Lt. Col. Vokey's direct supervisor, has directed him not to communicate with the media on this case pending her review of the facts," said 1st Lt. Blanca E. Binstock of the Marine public affairs office.

Defense lawyers for Guantanamo prisoners say the personal stakes are high and point to the Navy's failure to promote Lt. Cmdr. Charles Swift after he successfully challenged the legitimacy of the Pentagon's war-crimes commissions. Two weeks after the Supreme Court ruled the commissions unconstitutional and lacking in due process, Swift was passed over for advancement and will be forced by the Navy's up-or-out policy to retire by summer.

At least three other military defense lawyers for the 10 charged terrorism suspects have also been passed over for promotion in what some consider a subtle reprimand of their vigorous defense of their clients.

"We've all known that representing folks in these kind of circumstances would have consequences, but to actually see Charlie passed over after he takes his case to the Supreme Court and wins — that certainly put it in the forefront for me," said Army Maj. Tom Fleener, who represents Ali Hamza Bahlul of Yemen.

As an Army reservist with a civilian law career in Wyoming to return to in a year or so, Fleener notes he is less susceptible to pressures being exerted on the military defense lawyers.

"If I was active duty, where my livelihood depended on what my military superiors said of me, I would feel tremendous pressure," he said.

Fleener says the mood in Guantanamo defense circles has deteriorated since the government's response to the high court ruling June 29 that President Bush overstepped his powers when he created the military war-crimes commissions. Those commissions would have allowed Pentagon prosecutors to use hearsay evidence and testimony obtained through torture, and barred defendants from seeing evidence against them that prosecutors deemed classified.

Congress last month passed legislation creating a new military commissions process almost identical to the one rejected by the Supreme Court, with the added restriction that Guantanamo detainees have no right to submit writs of habeas corpus to U.S. civil courts to challenge their detention.

It was such a writ filed on behalf of Salim Ahmed Hamdan, an alleged driver and bodyguard for Osama bin Laden, that brought the tribunal case to the Supreme Court.

Swift declined to comment on not having received a promotion.

"As a defense attorney, I don't like allegations without evidence," he says of the widespread view among his colleagues that he was punished for challenging the administration's tribunal process.

"What you sought in any career was an opportunity to make a difference. I got that opportunity, and for that I will be forever grateful," Swift said.

He said the new commissions legislation appears to preclude defendants' getting a fair trial.

"A zealous defense is essential to any process that works," Swift said. "What has given the commissions any integrity so far is the ability of defense council to raise the case and concerns in all federal forums and the commissions themselves, and when necessary, in the media."

Expecting U.S. Help, Sent To Guantánamo (NYT)

By Tim Golden

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

Abdul Rahim Al Ginco thought he was saved when the United States invaded Afghanistan in 2001 and overthrew the Taliban regime.

Mr. Ginco, a college student living in the United Arab Emirates, had gone to Afghanistan in 2000 after running away from his strict Muslim father. He was soon imprisoned by the Taliban, and tortured by operatives of Al Qaeda until, he said, he falsely confessed to being a spy for Israel and the United States.

But rather than help Mr. Ginco return home, American soldiers detained him again. Nearly five years later, he remains in the United States military prison at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba — in part, it appears, on the strength of a propaganda videotape made by his torturers.

“This was a 22-year-old kid who was brutally tortured,” one of Mr. Ginco’s American lawyers, Stephen R. Sady, said. “And instead of being liberated, he has endured four and a half years of additional confinement.”

A bill signed into law by President Bush last December requires the Pentagon to determine if information being used to hold a detainee has been obtained by coercion and "the probative value (if any)" of such information. Another law passed by Congress last month would ban the use of statements made under torture from the military tribunals that are to be used to prosecute some Guantánamo detainees.

But that second law, which awaits the president's signature, would also sweep away most federal court challenges to the detention of Guantánamo prisoners, including perhaps the one filed by American lawyers for Mr. Ginco, who is now 28.

A spokesman for the Department of Defense, Cmdr. Jeffrey D. Gordon of the Navy, said he could not discuss the specifics of the evidence against any particular detainee. And because part of the military's case against Mr. Ginco remains classified, it is not possible to evaluate fully the grounds for his detention.

But partial transcripts from two review hearings for Mr. Ginco at Guantánamo and information filed by his lawyers last week in district court in Washington show that the military has repeatedly accused him of having volunteered his life as a Qaeda martyr — a claim that appears to be based on a videotape found in Afghanistan.

That tape was pulled from the rubble of a home used by Muhammad Atef, the reputed military chief of Al Qaeda, who was killed by an American air strike on his home near Kabul on Nov. 16, 2001. Mr. Ginco named Mr. Atef as one of the Qaeda and Taliban operatives who tortured him in early 2000, applying electric shocks to his ears and toes, nearly drowning him in a filthy water tank, depriving him of sleep and beating him on the soles of his feet.

In December 2001 and January 2002, several Western news reporters, including one for The New York Times, interviewed Mr. Ginco and four other foreign prisoners as the Northern Alliance took over the prison where they had been held in Kandahar. A reporter for The Times of London described Mr. Ginco and some of the others as "desperate to be interviewed by the F.B.I."

On Jan. 17, however, John Ashcroft, then the attorney general, held a news conference to announce that five videotapes had been recovered from the ruins of Mr. Atef's home showing several men who "may be trained and prepared to commit future suicide terrorist acts." The first man shown in an excerpt from one of those tapes was Mr. Ginco, whom Mr. Ashcroft identified as Abd Al-Rahim.

Lawyers for Mr. Ginco, who was born to a Kurdish family in Syria, still have not viewed the complete tape from which Mr. Ashcroft showed a brief excerpt or heard its audio. But they said they believed it showed part of one of the propaganda videos made by the torturers who extracted Mr. Ginco's confession. In a hearing at Guantánamo in November 2005, Mr. Ginco admitted to a military review panel that he appeared in the video but said, "It wasn't my choice."

The Taliban announced in May 2000 that Mr. Ginco had been arrested as a spy. Another videotape was then broadcast on an Arab television network, in which he looks pale, uneasy and underweight and confesses at length to having been a spy for the United States and Israel.

This interview with Mr. Ginco about his purported espionage was also published in a Taliban government magazine in July 2000. It quotes him as saying he was corrupted at college by an "evil acquaintance" who introduced him to a "computer game called PlayStation." Later, he added, he was shown a pornographic computer disc and introduced to an American embassy official, whom he identified as "Shamoyel Anty," an agent of "the Israeli intelligence agency."

After the collapse of the Taliban, Mr. Ginco and the four other foreigners were taken for questioning to the makeshift American detention center in Kandahar. Initially, one of the men said, they were treated more as guests than as prisoners, and were given chocolates and extra blankets by the American soldiers.

His treatment suddenly became much harsher, his lawyers said, after he was recognized as one of the men depicted in a brief Time magazine article based on Mr. Ashcroft's announcement about the videotapes.

Mr. Ginco and the four others were transferred to Guantánamo in May 2002. Two of the five, a Briton and a Russian, were released in 2004, and both have made sworn statements on Mr. Ginco's behalf, his lawyer, Mr. Sady, said.

In other statements filed in federal court, members of Mr. Ginco's family said he had run away from home after borrowing money for a camping trip from some of his college classmates. Mr. Ginco's elder brother, with whom he was living, said the family considered such borrowing shameful, and that he threatened to tell their strict father about the episode.

Mr. Ginco said he had tried to arrange to travel to Europe or Canada but could not because his father had kept his passport. He said a former friend from college who worked at the Afghan Embassy in Dubai told him that he could be deported to Afghanistan if he went to the police and told them he was an undocumented Afghan, which he then did.

In Afghanistan, he quickly drew the suspicion of the Taliban. He was told to go fight against Northern Alliance forces, he said, and sent briefly to a Qaeda training camp. When he tried to leave, he said, he was imprisoned and tortured. At Guantánamo, he has told military officials that the mistreatment badly damaged his right arm and that he had spent much of his time there in a psychiatric ward.

Mr. Ginco's lawyers, who are federal public defenders in Oregon, are contesting his detention on the grounds that he could not have fought against the United States after it declared a war on terrorism because he was being held by the Taliban as an American spy.

The Right Charge For The Crime (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

Adam Yahiye Gadahn's actions are treasonous, and the charge ensures he'll have the right to trial guaranteed him by the Constitution.

NEWS THAT A GRAND JURY had charged a Southern California native with treason last week begged the question: Can they still do that? The United States, after all, has not charged anyone with treason, a crime defined under English law as early as 1350, since World War II.

But if the facts are as the government alleges, Adam Yahiye Gadahn did indeed commit treason when, in his own words, he "joined a movement waging war on America and killing large numbers of Americans." Gadahn, a convert to Islam who remains a fugitive overseas, has appeared in five propaganda videos for Al Qaeda. Most recently, on the fifth anniversary of the 9/11 terror attacks, Gadahn appeared in a video featuring scenes of the attack, describing the United States as "enemy soil" and extolling the heroism of the terrorists. In a previous video released that same month, Ayman Zawahiri, Osama bin Laden's second in command, introduced Gadahn as "our brother, Azzam the American."

Treason is the only crime defined in the Constitution itself, which establishes a higher evidentiary burden — two eyewitnesses or a courtroom confession — for its prosecution. This higher burden, and the ability to rely on other criminal statutes in most such cases, is the reason the government so seldom resorts to the charge of treason. But in Gadahn's case, his own video messages may help the government prove its case, and prosecutors were within their rights to charge him with the most serious offense against the nation, a crime that can be punishable by death.

There may be no evidence that Gadahn picked up a gun or assembled bombs. But the U.S. criminal code, which tracks the constitutional language, states that "whoever, owing allegiance to the United States, levies war against them or adheres to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort within the United States or elsewhere, is guilty of treason." If the government can prove the facts it alleges, that is clearly what Gadahn did — he joined the enemy (there can be little doubt that a state of war exists between Al Qaeda and the U.S.) to further its cause.

The government's attempts to circumvent the Constitution in its war on terror — by establishing military tribunals lacking in due process and wiretapping Americans without a warrant — have been roundly and rightly criticized. But in this case, the Justice Department is relying on the U.S. court system and the most venerable of U.S. laws to bring a high-profile U.S. operative of Al Qaeda to justice.

Guilty Until Confirmed Guilty (NYT)

When President Bush rammed the bill on military commissions through Congress, the Republicans crowed about creating a process that would be tough on terrorists but preserve essential principles of justice. "America can be proud," said Senator Lindsey Graham, one of the bill's architects.

Unfortunately, Mr. Graham was wrong. One of the many problems with the new law is that it will only make it harder than it already is to separate the real terrorists from the far larger group of inmates at Guantánamo Bay who were bit players in the Taliban or innocent bystanders. Mr. Graham and other supporters of this dreadful legislation seem to have forgotten that American justice does not merely deliver swift punishment to the guilty. It also protects the innocent.

Mr. Bush ignored that fact after 9/11, when he tried to put the prisoners of the war on terror beyond the reach of American law and the Geneva Conventions. For starters, he dispensed with one of the vital provisions of the conventions: that prisoners must be screened by a "competent tribunal" if there is any doubt about who they are and what role they played in hostilities. As a result, hundreds of men captured in Afghanistan and other countries were sent to Guantánamo Bay and other prisons, including the network of illegal C.I.A. detention camps, without any attempt to determine whether they were any sort of combatant, legal or illegal.

The Bush administration showed not the slightest interest in fixing this problem until the Supreme Court said in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld that the president cannot simply lock up anyone — even a foreign citizen — without giving him a real chance to challenge his detention before a "neutral decision maker."

In response, Mr. Bush created Combatant Status Review Tribunals, which gave the most cursory possible reviews of the Gitmo detainees. These reviews took place years after the prisoners were captured. They permitted the use of hearsay evidence, evidence obtained through coercion and even torture, and evidence that was kept secret from the prisoner. The normal burden of proof was reversed: the tribunals presumed prisoners were justifiably detained and the prisoners had the burden of disproving government evidence — presuming they knew what it was in the first place.

The new law leaves this mockery of justice stronger. The Military Commissions Act of 2006 makes it virtually impossible to contest a status tribunal's decision. It prohibits claims of habeas corpus — the ancient right of prisoners in just societies to have their detentions reviewed — or any case based directly or indirectly on the Geneva Conventions. Even if an appeal got to the single appeals court now authorized to hear it, the administration would very likely argue that it cannot be heard without jeopardizing secrets, as it has done repeatedly.

The new law dangerously expands the definition of illegal enemy combatant and allows Mr. Bush — and the secretary of defense — to give to anyone they choose the authority to designate a prisoner as an illegal combatant. It also allows Mr. Bush to go on squirreling prisoners away at secret C.I.A. camps where none of the rules apply.

Mr. Bush wants Americans to trust him to apply these powers only to truly dangerous men. Even if our system were based on that sort of personal power and not the rule of law, it would be hard to trust the judgment of a president and an administration whose records are so bad. The United States has yet to acknowledge that it kidnapped an innocent Canadian citizen and sent him to be abused in a Syrian prison. In another case, a German citizen has accused the United States of grabbing him off the streets of Macedonia, drugging him and sending him to Afghanistan, where he was brutally treated. Then there is the Ethiopian living in London who said he was grabbed by American agents and brutalized by Moroccan torturers until he confessed to plotting with Jose Padilla to set off a "dirty bomb." Mr. Padilla was never charged with the crime. The Ethiopian remains at Guantánamo Bay.

Republicans who support the new law like to point out that it only covers foreigners. But Americans have never believed that human rights are just for Americans. Our nation is outraged when an authoritarian government jails an American, or one of its own citizens, on trumped-up charges and brings him or her before a phony court. Surely that is not the model we want to follow in our nation's prisons.

U.S. Policy Could Help 9/11 Suspect (MCT)

By Matthew Schofield

McClatchy Newspapers, October 15, 2006

HAMBURG, Germany | There is no dispute that Mounir el-Motassadeq was close to the men who carried out the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

He spent three months at an al-Qaida training camp in Afghanistan. He lived near lead hijacker Mohammed Atta in Hamburg and signed as the witness to Atta's will. He held power of attorney over the bank account of another hijacker, Marwan al-Shehhi. He transferred $2,500 to plotter Ramzi Binalshib. He even sent money to the United States that was used to help finance the hijackers' pilot training.

German authorities charged him with 3,066 counts of accessory to murder, and in February 2003 he was convicted — the first person to stand trial in the attacks.

But that conviction was overturned by a German appeals court in 2004. This year, he was ordered released pending resolution of appeals.

Now el-Motassadeq, who is free on bond, is about to learn whether U.S. security policy will help him walk away from criminal charges in the worst terrorist attack in American history.

A German court Thursday began a hearing into whether the accessory-to-murder charges should be restored. The German government is seeking a third trial in the matter.

Among the issues is whether the United States will allow German lawyers to question two key figures in the Sept. 11 plot: alleged ringleader Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and co-conspirator Binalshib.

At the time of el-Motassadeq's trials and appeals, Mohammed and Binalshib were being held in secret at an undisclosed location by the CIA. Despite two visits to America by the German prosecutor, U.S. officials declined to make the two men available for questioning.

In September, Mohammed and Binalshib were transferred to U.S. military custody and are now being held at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

U.S. military lawyers will soon be appointed to represent them under a law authorizing the Bush administration to try them and other terror suspects before military tribunals.

It is unclear, however, whether the military will make Mohammed and Binalshib available to assist in el-Motassadeq's case. The German prosecutor's office won't comment on whether it would renew efforts to question them — German law forbids prosecutors from commenting outside of court — and spokesmen for the U.S. Justice Department and the Pentagon said they had no information on the subject.

German prosecutors, however, say they will ask the court to reinstate the accessory-to-murder charges.

They will argue that even though el-Motassedeq may not have known precisely when and what Atta and his companions were planning, he knew enough to be found guilty of helping them.

Whether testimony from Mohammed and Binalshib would help prosecutors convict el-Motassadeq is unclear. One of the issues in this case is that he says it would clear him.

Mohammed is thought to have first suggested the hijacking plan to Osama bin Laden. Binalshib, who roomed with Atta in Hamburg, is suspected of becoming the plot's principal logistician after America refused him a visa.

El-Motassadeq insists their testimony would show that he knew little of the plot. His first trial statements that the CIA delivered to the prosecutors appeared to confirm this.

Even so, the court refused to accept the statements after el-Motassadeq's attorney suggested they might have been the result of torture.

U.S. officials declined then to discuss the conditions under which the two men were questioned. Any future German questioning of Mohammed and Binalshib would be likely to focus on how they were treated during the years they were held by the CIA.

Arbitrator: Supermax Prison Understaffed (AP-Y)

By Catherine Tsai, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 15, 2006

Staffing at the Supermax prison has gotten so low that job hazards have increased for correctional officers watching over the nation's worst terrorists, an arbitrator has ruled.

The arbitrator stopped short of ordering the Bureau of Prisons to hire more staff, but union officials representing Supermax officers said the ruling would bolster their argument to Congress for more prison funding.

"If the most maximum security federal penitentiary is indeed understaffed, what is happening across the entire Bureau of Prisons as far as staffing levels?" asked state Rep. Buffie McFadyen, who testified for the union at an arbitration hearing in May. Her district includes Supermax and 11 other state and federal prisons.

The American Federation of Government Employees had said assaults and threats increased after staffing at the Supermax was reduced last year. Two inmates were killed in two separate incidents.

The slayings were the first since the prison 90 miles southwest of Denver opened in 1994. It houses the nation's most dangerous inmates, including al-Qaida member Zacarias Moussaoui, Unabomber Theodore Kaczynski and Oklahoma City bombing conspirator Terry Nichols.

Housing units at Supermax require three officers per shift, but entire units were sometimes left unstaffed, and cells were not being searched regularly, the arbitrator found.

Arbitrator Joseph Lazar ordered the bureau to reduce inherent hazards at Supermax to the lowest possible levels, as called for by a collective bargaining agreement.

"The agency in fact did not keep its bargain to lower hazards to the lowest possible level," Lazar wrote in a ruling made available Friday by union officials.

Supermax officials were not immediately available for comment.

Islamic Schools Test Ideal Of Integration In Britain (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

LEICESTER, England — The sports hall doubles as a prayer room and dining hall for male teenagers, at other times for young women, but never the two together. In the kindergarten, female teachers, warned of an impending visit by a man, draw full facial veils before receiving their guest. When the guest arrives, the children offer a chorus in Arabic: "As salaam aleikum" — peace be upon you.

"Here we can keep ourselves on the path of religion," said Nasir Nathalia, a 15-year-old student at the Leicester Islamic Academy. His friend Mohammed Seedat agrees. "There is less chance here of going off the track," he said.

This is the piety that Britain's expanding Islamic schools seek to project, casting themselves as typical of the thousands of faith schools, mainly Christian, that make up roughly one-third of all publicly financed British schools.

But the visible differences — the way female teenagers wear the full-length dress and head-covering and the boys wear black robes and skullcaps — play into a ferocious debate about the sense of separateness or readiness to integrate Britain's estimated 1.8 million Muslims, about 3 percent of the population.

And the discussion touches on a much wider theme of ethnic segregation across the British state-financed educational system. “Segregation is now so extreme in some schools that there is not much further it can go,” Trevor Phillips, the chairman of the Commission for Racial Equality, told a parliamentary panel. “It doesn’t help to prepare children in these schools for the real world.”

Neither, some believe, does it bridge the gap between a largely secular society and a profound commitment to a single faith.

“If you are going to have Islamic schools, the question is whether they are going to embrace Western values,” said Patrick Sookhdeo, a Pakistan-born Anglican priest who converted from Islam and who runs a not-for-profit institute committed to maintaining Christian values. “I would argue that Islamic values are not compatible with Western values.”

Others disagree just as boldly. “If you think faith schools are divisive, it would help a great deal to know why: Is there empirical evidence?” said Mohamed Mukadam, the principal of the Leicester Islamic Academy.

Students from Islamic schools, Mr. Mukadam said in an interview, were not associated with either the religious and racial riots in northern England in the early 2000’s or in any of the recent terrorism conspiracies. “If you want to examine the northern riots, or the terrorism,” he said, “I have not come across a single person from faith schools or who went to faith schools.”

It is a debate shot through with fear and resentment after terrorist attacks by Muslims and alleged plots in London, leaving the British government to ponder how it can properly deny state financing to Islamic schools that teach the core subjects of the national curriculum when it provides money for much more numerous schools of Christian, Jewish or other faiths. Only 7 Islamic schools receive public financing, compared with 36 Jewish schools, and about 7,000 Christian schools.

The parents of just 3 percent of Muslim students enroll them in Islamic schools, where the education is generally rigorous and there is a code to nurture their Islamic identity, shield them from discrimination and provide moral guidance. The bulk of the 140 Islamic schools charge tuition. At Leicester, for instance, tuition is $2,700 a year.

“Muslim children in this country tend to live separate lives anyhow,” said Mark Halstead, a professor of education at the University of Huddersfield in northern England. “Whether they go to Muslim school does not make much difference to their segregation. They are concentrated in the inner cities. They could be attending a state school that is 90 percent Muslim anyway.”

A report by Simon Burgess, a professor of economics, discovered that, for instance, in the blue-collar Tower Hamlets district of East London, where ethnic minorities form 48 percent of the population, nearly half the schools were “exclusively nonwhite.”

The issue of Islamic separateness is magnified by a recent debate about a full-face veil that shows only the eyes and is known as the niqab. Some non-Muslims, most notably Foreign Secretary Jack Straw, have said the veil illustrates that Muslims are rejecting British norms; others say simply that Britons are discriminating against Muslims.

The debate cuts to the heart of Britain’s stated philosophy on multiculturalism, defined 40 years ago by the Labor politician Roy Jenkins when he was home secretary. In laying out a new immigration policy, he said immigration should not lead to a “flattening process of assimilation” but instead should provide “equal opportunity accompanied by cultural diversity.”

But now, as the country is struggling so publicly with Muslim assimilation, some analysts like Mr. Phillips of the Commission for Racial Equality fear that a premium on cultural separateness has Britain “sleepwalking into segregation.”

On another level, the debate over Islamic schools here also involves equity in the use of tax money.

According to the Department of Education in London, private schools must meet laborious and detailed criteria to gain access to state financing, and many Islamic schools have failed to do so.

Since 1997, according to government figures, only 25 “minority faith” schools have qualified for government financing — 15 of them Jewish and the rest Muslim, Sikh, Greek Orthodox and Seventh-day Adventist schools.

Islamic schools typically teach the same basic subjects as in other faith or state-run schools. All — private and public — are subject to inspections.

But there are differences.

While Christian schools say 25 percent of their seats are open to non-Christians, Mr. Mukadam said there were so few Islamic schools that it would be impractical to offer admission to non-Muslims.

In Leicester, many students attend Koranic recitation and memorization lessons at separate madrasas — schools run by mosques without regulation — outside normal school hours.

Still, a survey by the Islamic Human Rights Commission last year said that Muslims in several categories — people who are older, wealthier and more secular, and students in their late teens — placed academic success ahead of religious affiliation in choosing a school.

According to the most recent government inspection of the Leicester Islamic Academy educational standards in 2002, most of its teenage students achieved twice the national average grades in the examinations that high school students take around the age of 16. But that does not necessarily immunize students from the broader pressures of life as British Muslims, even in Leicester.

This city in the English midlands, once known as a center for manufacturing shoes and textiles, prides itself on diversity. More than one-third of the 300,000 residents are members of Britain's ethnic minorities, and Leicester is expected to become Britain's first city with a nonwhite majority in less than a decade. But it has not been protected from the threat of terrorism: in early 2002, the police rounded up what they called an Al Qaeda cell here.

The sight of Muslims under attack in Palestinian areas or Iraq, said Nasir, the student at the academy here, "makes us want to help, through giving or charity." Yusuf Parekh, a 15-year-old classmate, said some people felt the pain and anger particularly because "their people are being killed back home."

But is violence justified? "Only as a last resort," he said.

But Mr. Mukadam, who is also chairman of the Association of Muslim Schools, insisted that his school taught loyalty to Britain as a land that offered religious and other freedoms. If an Islamic school were found to be "fomenting radicalism," he said, "it is my first duty to say this school should not exist."

He acknowledged that some students might feel passionately about the plight of fellow Muslims elsewhere. "My job," he said, "is to understand their deep hurt but get them away from the radicals that promote violence."

Having Their Say, For A Moment Or All Day (WP)

By An Afternoon At Speakers' Corner

LONDON

Just after noon last Sunday, seven people stood on stools and stepladders that they had lugged to this famous spot in central London. Soon, small crowds -- many among them regular listeners and hecklers -- filled the corner of Hyde Park that for more than a century has been known as the place to go to speak your mind.

"Those idiotic remarks!" said Heiko Khoo, emphatically disagreeing with the position of Jack Straw, leader of the House of Commons, that the veil worn by some Muslim women is a "visible statement of separation."

Khoo, 41, a tour guide who has been speaking here most Sundays for 20 years, contended that Straw knew Muslims would never vote for his Labor Party because of its support of the Iraq war, so he decided to court what Khoo called the "numbskull brigade: those who think, 'Those bleed'n Muslims, they don't belong here. Why don't they behave like us?' "

Several yards away, another regular on a ladder, a woman in a "Gone With the Wind" puffy red dress, asked people gathering around her to address her as "Madame Speaker." Farther away, a man attracted a group of German tourists with a huge placard around his neck that read, "IT'S GOING TO GET WORSE."

"What will get worse?" he was asked.

"Obesity!" he replied in a deeply serious tone. He gave the impression he had more answers at the ready.

There is a bit of everything at Speakers' Corner. Once a place where the condemned were hanged -- and perhaps, some say, because they were given one last chance to say a few words -- the northeast corner of Hyde Park has since the late 19th century been sacred ground for free speech.

There are other noteworthy patches in the 350-acre park -- the Nanny's Lawn, the Lovers' Walk -- but it is only here near Marble Arch where the unsung, along with legends from Winston Churchill to Karl Marx, have come to have their say.

The hot topics on this day were immigration in general and Muslim immigrants in particular.

"Anyone can say what they like," said Anne Martin, 46, a nurse from Kent, who was listening to Khoo defend Muslim women's right to dress as they wish.

Others may spend their Sundays having the family over for a roast or enjoying a museum or a ramble, as the British call a walk in the countryside. But Martin drives here, two hours each way, to revel in the chance to listen to people whose paths she would otherwise never cross.

"I have gone up to Muslim women here," she said, "and asked, 'Why do you wear the hijab ?' " She said she couldn't do that on just any old street corner, but here, it is encouraged. She said she heard answers ranging from "I am happy to wear it" to "It's the way of my husband."

"You can ask questions, and nobody is offended," she said, adding that she has only once seen a fistfight break out. She said the police who stand out of sight at a nearby corner moved quickly to end it.

At 1:15 p.m., 18-year-old Chris Brennan was risking a fight as he disparaged foreigners. But while angry words like "racist" were hurled at him, he persisted in saying he thought his country was better when it was, as he said, "white."

"I have a democratic right to come out and speak like the communists do over there," Brennan said pointing to another gaggle of people across the pavement.

Emily Stapleton, 28, a marketing executive, shouted to Brennan that she is going out with an Asian man: "I don't see anything wrong with it, why should you?"

Gary Castle, a street sweeper, piped up that most of those cleaning up London's trash alongside him were from Eastern Europe. He said they were helping, not hurting, the country because "they are willing to do the jobs we aren't."

Brennan tried to stand his ground but was losing his audience. "He's completely mad," said Ali Mohamed, 21, a Somali-born Londoner, as he turned to find another speaker. "But it tells you something."

Khoo, who speaks four or five hours each Sunday, showed no sign of tiring at 2:30 p.m. and seemed to draw energy from the crowd.

As he was addressing the perception that immigrants receive cheap public housing while hardworking low-income British people must fend for themselves, a man shouted to him: "So if there are only 10 houses, who gets them?"

"We build more," he thundered back. "We don't blame the people who get houses for the shortage."

Behind him, tourists hopped on and off open-air red buses and thousands of runners dressed in bright green and orange T-shirts ran by, participating in a downtown road race.

Yards away, an elderly man in big glasses and a blue knit cap recited poetry: "She forgot the stars, the moon and sun . . . She forgot the dells where the water runs . . . ."

Lloyd James, 64, said he couldn't quite remember who wrote those lovely lines, but he comes here to share them out loud. "I used to speak on politics, but people like to shout and argue," he said.

Then he continued his delivery, a quiet beauty amid the boisterous clash of words and worldviews:

" . . . She had no knowledge when the day was done."

PATRIOT ACT:

For God And Country (NYT)

By Interview By Deborah Solomon

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

Q: Your new book about the aftermath of 9/11 is titled <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="141747;242031;138166;152893">"Never Again," but isn't that an inappropriate use of a phrase that has traditionally referred to the Holocaust? </object.title>

<object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="141747;242031;138166;152893">I used it because President Bush turned and looked in my direction and said, "Don't ever let this happen again."</object.title>

Now that you have left your post as U.S. attorney general and are working as a lobbyist, would you still defend the president's willingness to disregard the Geneva Conventions in the treatment and torture of suspected terrorists?

I think there is a very sound argument for saying that those who violate the Geneva Conventions should not benefit from its provisions.

You're talking about the terrorists. But we can't stoop to their level. This is the United States of America. We have to guarantee the rights of everyone, including prisoners.

Well, we have guaranteed many rights to the prisoners.

What about the Patriot Act, which licensed the disregard of certain privacy laws designed to protect our own citizens?

After years of misrepresentation and pillorying by a variety of groups like the A.C.L.U. that ended up making a lot of money by opposing it and developed a lot of membership by opposing it, its renewal passed by 89 votes in the Senate.

They didn't oppose the Patriot Act in order to make money, or as some kind of marketing scheme.

If you think they don't care about membership, I think that's a naïve understanding of the way politics works in America.

As one of the best-known evangelical Christians in this country, what do you make of the current pope, Benedict XVI?

When the pope speaks, I take it very seriously. But I don't take it as ultimately authoritative, unless I find it to be consistent with what I believe is ultimately authoritative, and that's the Scripture.

What did you think when the pope gave that controversial speech last month, appearing to debunk Islam by referring to a medieval text that characterizes Muhammad as a prophet of violence?

If the pope thought the Muslim faith were better than the Catholic faith, he'd be a Muslim. To say that you have beliefs and that they are equal to everyone else's beliefs all the time is to devalue the concept of belief.

In that case, do you think your own religious tradition of evangelicalism is superior to Catholicism?

For me it is.

What about Islam?

DOJ_NMG_0081664

I don't think it's the faith for me. I find that I respond to the reconciliation, the healing and the forgiveness of Jesus.

Don't all the major monotheistic religions — Judaism, Christianity and Islam — teach compassion?

In some cases, they do. I can't really speak for them. I'm a Christian for a variety of reasons. Maybe because it's easy. What I have to do to please God is to confess that I am a sinner instead of trying to prove that I am good.

So you see yourself as a sinner?

Yes. I fail and do things that I wish I didn't do.

Such as?

I'm unkind on occasion, and I am selfish. For me, embracing the Christian faith is something that I do not because I am good but because I am not good, because I need help.

Why? Do you drink?

I drink probably a quart or two a day, but not of alcohol! I don't consume alcohol at all. I've never had a mixed drink.

Have you ever smoked a cigarette?

No. I puffed on a cigar one time, and it just made my mouth feel like someone had shot a cobweb all inside my mouth.

If you felt temptation for another woman, what would you do?

Call my wife.

In addition to songwriting, you dabble in the visual arts. What sort of work do you do?

I make barbed-wire sculpture.

Why barbed wire?

Because there was a surplus of it on my farm.

Well, thank you for making time for this interview.

I just hope that in meeting people, they'll understand that I am not as bad as they thought I was.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

The Unsolved Case Of Anthrax (WP)

By Tom Daschle

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

Oct. 15, 2001, is a day I'll never forget. On that day one of my staff members opened an anthrax-laced letter addressed to me, and my office became a part of the deadliest bioterrorism attack in U.S. history. Anthrax was also sent through the mail to a number of other people and organizations -- the National Enquirer, the New York Post, broadcaster Tom Brokaw and Sen. Pat Leahy of Vermont. These attacks killed five people, injured 17 others, disrupted operations all over Capitol Hill and alarmed an entire nation.

Twenty-eight people, including 20 on my staff, tested positive for anthrax exposure. Though relieved that they were spared the horror of the disease, I am reminded every day that the families and friends of five others were not so lucky. Robert Stevens in Florida, Kathy Nguyen in New York, Ottilie Lundgren in Connecticut, and Thomas Morris Jr. and Joseph Curseen in Washington were all victims of the attack.

Five years later, the alarm I and many others experienced on that dark day has been replaced by a deep discouragement and dismay.

The investigation's trail has gone cold. Physical evidence that might have been gathered in the first days and weeks after the attacks is long gone. Meanwhile, if a recent article in The Post is any guide, questions remain in the scientific community about the composition of the anthrax and the level of technological expertise required to manufacture it -- even though there is no question about its extreme lethality.

While the FBI has made gains in its scientific capabilities and understanding of anthrax, its slowness to move and its lack of direction in the early stages of the investigation led to missed opportunities. In this age when we face a new kind of enemy, we need to be able to adapt our counterterrorism and law enforcement strategies to meet the threat.

We ought to use this fifth anniversary of the attack to rededicate ourselves to solving the crime and ensuring that we are better prepared to confront similar attacks.

First, the FBI and the Justice Department must treat this investigation with urgency. Solving the crime would send an important message to the perpetrator(s), to those who are contemplating similar attacks and to the American people.

Second, the Sept. 11 commission called for the creation of an FBI national security workforce and for a recalibration of the FBI mission -- from sole concentration on its criminal justice mission and toward increased focus on national security. Late last year the commission gave the FBI a C on its progress. A recent examination of the bureau found that new agents get insufficient counterterrorism training and that the role of analysts is underappreciated. These reforms, like the investigation of the attack itself, need to be implemented with urgency.

Third, progress on the investigation and needed reforms are hindered by a lack of congressional oversight. Part of that is the FBI's fault: Even the targets of this attack have been denied updates on the investigation since mid-2004, the last time I was briefed on it. But Congress cannot and should not be given a free pass on the issue. There has been dramatically little oversight of FBI reorganization in the two years since the Sept. 11 commission's initial report was released and the year since the commission released its review of progress toward implementing its sensible recommendations.

Finally, there has been precious little reform of our public health infrastructure to ensure that we are prepared for future terrorist attacks and health emergencies. Every American deserves to know that he or she will receive the best care this country has to offer if and when the next disaster strikes.

Regrettably, we learned after Hurricane Katrina that emergency health services are both scarce and fragile in this country. Moreover, our funding for public health infrastructure has lagged, exacerbating the crisis in emergency capacity. And efforts to stockpile necessary drugs have been usurped by inefficient subsidies to drug companies and by bureaucratic indecision.

It's been five years since the anthrax attacks shook our country and took the lives of five Americans. We cannot permit another five to pass before we close this chapter and prepare for the next one.

WAR NEWS:

Bush Keeps Revising War Justification (AP)

By Tom Raum

AP, October 15, 2006

President Bush keeps revising his explanation for why the U.S. is in Iraq, moving from narrow military objectives at first to history-of-civilization stakes now.

Initially, the rationale was specific: to stop Saddam Hussein from using what Bush claimed were the Iraqi leader's weapons of mass destruction or from selling them to al-Qaida or other terrorist groups.

But 3 1/2 years later, with no weapons found, still no end in sight and the war a liability for nearly all Republicans on the ballot Nov. 7, the justification has become far broader and now includes the expansive "struggle between good and evil."

Republicans seized on North Korea's reported nuclear test last week as further evidence that the need for strong U.S. leadership extends beyond Iraq.

Bush's changing rhetoric reflects increasing administration efforts to tie the war, increasingly unpopular at home, with the global fight against terrorism, still the president's strongest suit politically.

"We can't tolerate a new terrorist state in the heart of the Middle East, with large oil reserves that could be used to fund its radical ambitions, or used to inflict economic damage on the West," Bush said in a news conference last week in the Rose Garden.

When no weapons of mass destruction were found in Iraq, Bush shifted his war justification to one of liberating Iraqis from a brutal ruler.

After Saddam's capture in December 2003, the rationale became helping to spread democracy through the Middle East. Then it was confronting terrorists in Iraq "so we do not have to face them here at home," and "making America safer," themes Bush pounds today.

"We're in the ideological struggle of the 21st century," he told a California audience this month. "It's a struggle between good and evil."

Vice President Dick Cheney takes it even further: "The hopes of the civilized world ride with us," Cheney tells audiences.

Except for the weapons of mass destruction argument, there is some validity in each of Bush's shifting rationales, said Michael O'Hanlon, a foreign policy scholar at the Brookings Institution who initially supported the war effort.

"And I don't have any big problems with any of them, analytically. The problem is they can't change the realities on the ground in Iraq, which is that we're in the process of beginning to lose," O'Hanlon said. "It is taking us a long time to realize that, but the war is not headed the way it should be."

Andrew Card, Bush's first chief of staff, said Bush's evolving rhetoric, including his insistence that Iraq is a crucial part of the fight against terrorism, is part of an attempt to put the war in better perspective for Americans.

The administration recently has been "doing a much better job" in explaining the stakes, Card said in an interview. "We never said it was going to be easy. The president always told us it would be long and tough."

"I'm trying to do everything I can to remind people that the war on terror has the war in Iraq as a subset. It's critical we succeed in Iraq as part of the war on terror," said Card, who left the White House in March.

Bush at first sought to explain increasing insurgent and sectarian violence as a lead-up to Iraqi elections. But elections came and went, and a democratically elected government took over, and the sectarian violence increased.

Bush has insisted U.S. soldiers will stand down as Iraqis stand up. He has likened the war to the 20th century struggles against fascism, Nazism and communism. He has called Iraq the "central front" in a global fight against radical jihadists.

Having jettisoned most of the earlier, upbeat claims of progress, Bush these days emphasizes consequences of setting even a limited withdrawal timetable: abandonment of the Iraqi people, destabilizing the Middle East and emboldening terrorists around the world.

The more ominous and determined his words, the more skeptical the American public appears, polls show, both on the war itself and over whether it is part of the larger fight against terrorism, as the administration insists.

Bush's approval rating, reflected by AP-Ipsos polls, has slid from the mid 60s at the outset of the U.S.-led invasion in March 2003 to the high 30s now. There were light jumps upward after the December 2003 capture of Saddam, Bush's re-election in November 2004 and each of three series of aggressive speeches over the past year. Those gains tended to vanish quickly.

With the war intruding on the fall elections, both parties have stepped up their rhetoric.

Republicans, who are also reeling from the congressional page scandal, are casting Democrats as seeking to "cut and run" and appease terrorists.

Democrats accuse Bush of failed leadership with his "stay the course" strategy. They cite a government intelligence assessment suggesting the Iraq war has helped recruit more terrorists, and a book by journalist Bob Woodward that portrays Bush as intransigent in his defense of the Iraq war and his advisers as bitterly divided.

Democrats say Iraq has become a distraction from the war against terrorism — not a central front. But they are divided among themselves on what strategy to pursue.

Republicans, too, increasingly are growing divided as U.S. casualties rise.

"I struggle with the fact that President Bush said, `As the Iraqis stand up, we will stand down.' But the fact is, this has not happened," said Rep. Christopher Shays, R-Conn., a war supporter turned war skeptic.

The Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, Sen. John Warner of Virginia, said after a recent visit to Iraq that Iraq was "drifting sideways." He urged consideration of a "change of course" if the Iraq government fails to restore order over the next two or three months.

More than 2,750 members of the U.S. military have died since the beginning of the war, most of them since Bush's May 2003 "mission accomplished" aircraft carrier speech. Tens of thousands of Iraqis have died.

Recent events have been dispiriting.

The United States now has about 141,000 troops in Iraq, up from about 127,000 in July. Some military experts have suggested at least one additional U.S. division, or around 20,000 troops, is needed in western Iraq alone.

Dan Benjamin, a former Middle East specialist with the National Security Council in the Clinton administration, said the administration is overemphasizing the nature of the threat in an effort to bolster support.

"I think the administration has oversold the case that Iraq could become a jihadist state," said Benjamin, now with the Center for Strategic and International Studies. "If the U.S. were to leave Iraq tomorrow, the result would be a bloodbath in which Sunnis and Shiites fight it out. But the jihadists would not be able to seek power."

Not all of Bush's rhetorical flourishes have had the intended consequences.

When the history of Iraq is finally written, the recent surge in sectarian violence is "going to be a comma," Bush said in several recent appearances.

Critics immediately complained that the remark appeared unsympathetic and dismissive of U.S. and Iraqi casualties, an assertion the White House disputed.

For a while last summer, Bush depicted the war as one against "Islamic fascism," borrowing a phrase from conservative commentators. The strategy backfired, further fanning anti-American sentiment across the Muslim world.

The "fascism" phrase abruptly disappeared from Bush's speeches, reportedly after he was talked out of it by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and Karen Hughes, a longtime Bush confidant now with the State Department.

Hughes said she would not disclose private conversations with the president. But, she told the AP, she did not use the "fascism" phrase herself. "I use `violent extremist,'" she said.

26 Killed In Revenge Attacks Outside Baghdad (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0081667

By Michael Luo And Qais Mizher

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 14 — A rural Shiite town northwest of here exploded in sectarian reprisals on Saturday as angry residents, many roving the streets in armed packs on the backs of pickup trucks, killed at least 26 people from a nearby Sunni village, provincial authorities said.

The killings in the town of Balad , about 50 miles from Baghdad, were in response to the slaughter of 14 Shiite construction workers whose beheaded bodies were found Friday in an orchard in Dhuluiya, a Sunni town, said Hamad al-Qaisi, governor of Salahuddin Province, which includes both towns.

The workers had gone to Dhuluiya on Thursday to help rebuild houses and were on their way back when they were kidnapped by Sunni militiamen, said another government official from Salahedin who spoke on condition of anonymity.

When their corpses were eventually brought back to Balad, angry mobs gathered in the streets clamoring for revenge, Mr. al-Qaisi said.

Armed residents set up a checkpoint inside Balad's central market area, where many people from Dhuluiya come to shop, he said, as well as one on the road between the two towns.

At least 26 bullet-riddled bodies, all believed to be Sunni residents of Dhuluiya, were found around Balad on Saturday, he said.

Mr. Qaisi went to Balad to meet with tribal sheiks to urge restraint. He said he exacted their promises to do what they could. Meanwhile, he imposed a curfew as of Saturday evening on Balad and Dujail, a neighboring Shiite town, where sectarian tensions are also high, he said.

"The situation is very bad in both Balad and Dujail," he said.

Gunmen in pickup trucks were still roaming Balad on Saturday afternoon, he said, adding that he has asked the American military to help him impose order.

The American military reported that an Iraqi detainee at Camp Bucca died Saturday morning from what appeared to be a heart attack. The detainee was checked into the camp's hospital on Oct. 5, the military said. At 1:40 a.m. Saturday he called for assistance, and doctors tried to help him. Shortly afterward, a cardiac monitor showed no pulse. Efforts to revive him failed, the statement said.

In central Baghdad, a pair of car bombs exploded about 1 p.m., wounding one person, an Interior Ministry official said.

At least 22 bullet-riddled bodies, many of them handcuffed and bearing signs of torture, were found by the police across the capital on Saturday, the official said.

Another car bomb blast just 15 minutes earlier aimed at an American convoy in Dora resulted in no casualties, he said.

In other violence in Iraq, a Shiite family of four was killed at dawn in Mahmudiya by gunmen dressed in military-style uniforms, The Associated Press said. At least seven people were reported killed in a mortar attack near Baquba.

Two more American servicemen were killed on Saturday, one from a roadside bomb in Baghdad and the other from "enemy action" in Anbar Province, the American military said.

Sunni Arabs Targeted In Revenge Killings (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer And Muhanned Saif Aldin

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

Violence Flares After Beheading Of Shiite Workers

BAGHDAD, Oct. 14 -- Seeking revenge for the killing of 17 Shiite farmworkers, Shiite militiamen surged into a town north of Baghdad on Saturday to launch attacks that by nightfall killed at least 27 Sunni Arabs, many of them brought to a hospital bearing the marks of electric drills and other signs of torture, according to medical workers, residents, police and militia leaders.

Sounds of shooting suggested the killing in the city of Balad continued into the night Saturday, as reinforcements from the Shiite-controlled Interior Ministry arrived and residents cowered in their homes. "You hear nothing but gunshots," Hasanein Ali, assistant director of Balad's hospital, said by telephone.

In addition to the dead counted at the hospital, one Balad resident who fled the city said he had seen more bodies burned in the streets.

The fierce outbreak of violence in the mostly Shiite city, surrounded by Sunni towns, was sparked in the mostly Sunni town of Duluiyah. The two communities are separated only by the Tigris River about 50 miles north of Baghdad.

On Friday, 17 Shiite laborers who had been hired to prune date palm trees in Duluiyah were kidnapped, police said. The workers' headless bodies were found outside the town later that day.

Shiite leaders in Balad said they responded to the farmworkers' killings by asking a Baghdad office of Moqtada al-Sadr, an influential Shiite cleric, to send militiamen and weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0081668

"It is necessary to take a strong stand, so that such killings will not be repeated, and so we can take our revenge," said Taysser Musawi, a Shiite cleric in Balad.

Scores of militia fighters went to Balad in answer to the call, and residents said they targeted the city's Sunni minority.

"The armed men, using loudspeakers, ordered Sunnis to leave the city of Balad within 24 hours or they will face death," said Ali, the hospital official. "The city now is in the hands of the armed men and the militias."

Ali added that some police officers appeared to be fighting alongside the militiamen.

Ali said 27 dead Sunnis had been brought to the hospital, and said he believed more bodies had yet to be collected because of darkness and the fighting. A local Sunni resident, Muhannad Khalaf, interviewed outside Balad, said he had seen three burned bodies on the road as he fled north to safety in the Sunni city of Tikrit.

The attacks allegedly sparked fighting between townspeople of Duluiyah and Balad. In Balad, police Capt. Abdul Aziz Khazrajy said the Interior Ministry in Baghdad sent security forces to the scene.

Khalaf asserted that the Interior Ministry commandos had set up checkpoints and were screening travelers, seeking out Sunnis. Both Shiite and Sunni fighters in Iraq's growing sectarian violence often are accused of using traffic checks to find and kill members of the opposite sect.

A police major in Duluiyah, Hussein Alwan, said by telephone that residents "are in a state of alert and top readiness. They are carrying arms, while mosques are calling on the people through loudspeakers to take up arms in defense of the town. They expect an imminent attack" by Interior Ministry commandos.

Tensions in the area have been high for weeks, "but yesterday's killing of the 17 farmworkers was the spark that will set off total war" there, Alwan said.

The fighting in the Tigris River towns served as a microcosm of the Shiite-Sunni killing that has increased dramatically this year and is claiming scores of lives in the capital and around Iraq every day, according to monthly counts from Iraqi authorities.

Baghdad police said they had found 23 bodies between midnight Friday and noon Saturday. All of the victims were shot and most of them bore signs of torture.

Three separate attacks involving bombs or mortars killed three civilians and a policeman in Baghdad, police said.

In the northern oil city of Kirkuk, gunmen attacked an Iraqi army checkpoint, triggering a clash that killed two gunmen, Lt. Col. Sadrudeen Aziz said.

The U.S. military reported that a bomb killed an American soldier southwest of Baghdad on Friday and, on Saturday, a U.S. airman was killed in action in Baghdad and a Marine died "due to enemy action" in the western province of Anbar. October is on track to be one of the deadliest months of the war for U.S. forces, with more than 40 killed so far.

Aldin reported from outside Balad. Other Washington Post staff in Iraq contributed to this report.

26 Sunnis Killed In Sectarian Violence (AP)

By Christopher Bodeen

AP, October 15, 2006

Suspected Shiite militiamen killed 26 Sunni Arabs in a city north of Baghdad that has been seized by a rash of sectarian bloodletting, an Interior Ministry official said Sunday.

The U.S. military, meanwhile, reported the deaths of a Marine and four soldiers.

The killings in Balad on Saturday were in apparent retaliation for the slayings of 17 Shiites whose decapitated bodies were found in an orchard on the town's outskirts Friday. An outbreak of sectarian violence has killed 43 people so far in Balad, 50 miles north of Baghdad.

Extra police flooded into the city and a curfew was imposed, Interior Ministry spokesman Brig. Abdul-Karim Khalaf said. Additional security measures were taken in other villages in the predominantly Sunni area, a hotbed of the insurgency battling U.S. and Iraqi forces.

The Marine was killed in combat Saturday in Anbar province, the Sunni heartland west of Baghdad, the military said.

Three soldiers died in a roadside bombing Saturday south of Baghdad, and another was killed in a roadside bombing Friday night southwest of the capital.

In eastern Baghdad Sunday, Interior Ministry Undersecretary Hala Shakir Salim survived a roadside bomb attack that killed three bystanders and two bodyguards, police Capt. Mohammed Abdul-Ghani said.

A married couple and two of their sons were killed Sunday morning when gunmen burst into their home in Mosul, Iraq's third-largest city 225 miles northwest of Baghdad. Two of their daughters-in-law were critically wounded. Police Col. Eid al-Jibouri said the identities of the attackers and their motive were unknown.

South of Baghdad, three women and four men were killed in drive-by shootings in the predominantly Shiite village of Wahda on Saturday afternoon, said provincial police spokesman Lt. Hadi Hassan.

Iraqi Police Force Facing Shake-up (AP)

By David Rising

AP, October 15, 2006

Iraq's Shiite-dominated Interior Ministry, whose police forces have been accused of complicity in sectarian attacks, has fired 3,000 employees accused of corruption or rights abuses and will change top commanders, a spokesman said Saturday.

Thousands have died this year in the cycle of killings between Shiite and Sunni death squads. At least 22 were killed Saturday, mainly in sectarian attacks.

Authorities also said they discovered the headless bodies of 17 Shiite construction workers in an orchard outside Baghdad, kidnapped and decapitated in apparent retaliation for an attack on Sunni Arabs last week.

The decapitated corpses were found Friday outside the city of Duluiyah, 45 miles north of Baghdad, along with four other unknown victims, also beheaded.

The killings of the workers came after the kidnapping Wednesday of three Sunni Arabs in Duluiyah by a Shiite militia based in Balad, police said. The three were killed and their bodies burned. After the discovery of the bodies late Friday and early Saturday, Sunni families living near Balad were starting to flee their homes, fearing Shiite retaliation.

Amid the growing tensions between Sunni Arabs and Shiites, Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah met Saturday with prominent Iraqi clerics from both sects in the Islamic holy city of Mecca and urged them to seek an end to the violence to allow the two sides to reconcile.

"My brothers, we need now patience, calmness and quiet to get to know each other," the king told them.

Spokesman Abdul-Karim Khalaf said the Interior Ministry shake-up would ensure stronger action to stop the violence.

"We are working on reshuffling the ministry's vital posts like (the leaders of the) police commandos and public order forces, as well as some undersecretaries," he told The Associated Press, without elaborating.

He said most of the 3,000 employees who had been removed since May were suspected of corruption or human rights violations, but did not specify whether they were involved in militia activities. Up to 600 of them will face prosecution, he said.

The Shiite-led national police force, controlled by the Interior Ministry, is widely accused of being infiltrated by Shiite militias blamed in slayings of Sunni Arabs. Critics say Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has been reluctant to move against the militias since many are linked to parties in his coalition.

The U.S. embarked on an intensive neighborhood-by-neighborhood sweep of the capital in August in a crackdown on the killings.

But Sadr City, the sprawling Shiite slum of about 2 million where radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia draws much of its support, has been left alone, and U.S. commanders say they are waiting on the command from al-Maliki's government.

When al-Maliki's government was formed in May, Interior Minister Jawad Bolani was given the post as top security official in large part because he had no militia links. But his lack of militia connections also has given him less leverage to make change.

Earlier this month, an entire brigade of some 700 policemen was suspended from service and taken to barracks because of suspected militia sympathies. The commander of one of the brigade's battalions faces criminal prosecution and others are being investigated.

The troops were suspected of allowing Shiite militias to operate freely in their area, where there had been a mass kidnapping of some two dozen people from a frozen food factory, at least seven of whom have since been found dead.

Problems with the brigade emerged during a broad brigade-by-brigade assessment of police in Baghdad carried out by the U.S. military over the summer. At the time it was taken off line, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, suggested many of the policemen were involved in allowing death squads to operate and would not be brought back.

Still, Khalaf played down the role of the ministry's police forces in militia violence, blaming instead the Facilities Protection Service, rather than the police. The FPS, created to guard government buildings and infrastructure, has some 150,000 members but an unclear command structure.

He said the FPS is not working under the supervision of either the Interior or Defense ministries. U.S. commanders also have said FPS members may be carrying out a large portion of the killings.

The Interior Ministry also has said that many attacks are carried out by people impersonating either Iraqi soldiers or police, and this month introduced new uniforms for certain units and new markings for police vehicles.

Also Saturday, a U.S. airman operating with an Iraqi police unit was killed in combat in Baghdad, the military said, bringing to 46 the number of U.S. servicemembers who have died in Iraq this month.

Seven people were killed in an early morning mortar attack on a small Sunni village near Baqouba, 35 miles northeast of Baghdad. Residents blamed Shiite militias for the attack, in which four mortar rounds were fired into the village.

DOJ_NMG_0081670

In the evening, gunmen in a vehicle opened fire in the Shiite village of Wahda, killing three women and four men. Police pursued them and caught one of the attackers, a Sunni gunman, police said.

A Shiite family of four was killed around dawn in Mahmoudiya, about 20 miles south of Baghdad, army Capt. Oday Abdul-Ridha said. Abdul-Ridha said assailants dressed in military-style uniforms had stormed into the family's house.

In Baghdad, an employee of government-run TV was killed in a drive-by shooting Friday night, police said.

Raed Qais al-Shammari, a technician with the al-Iraqiya station, was standing near his home talking with a friend when he was shot by a gunman from a car in the violence-wracked Dora neighborhood, police said.

The attack follows Thursday's killings of 11 people at Baghdad's private Shaabiya television station. Shiite militiamen are suspected to have carried out that attack, possibly due to perceptions the newly formed station was backing their Sunni Arab rivals.

3,000 Ministry Staffers Fired Over Corruption (WT/AP)

By David Rising

The Washington Times/AP, October 15, 2006

BAGHDAD -- Iraq's Shi'ite-dominated Interior Ministry, whose police forces have been accused of complicity in sectarian attacks, has fired 3,000 employees accused of corruption or rights abuses and will change top commanders, a spokesman said yesterday.

Thousands have died this year in the cycle of killings between Shi'ite and Sunni death squads. At least 22 were killed yesterday, mainly in sectarian attacks.

Authorities also said they discovered the headless bodies of 17 Shi'ite construction workers in an orchard outside Baghdad, kidnapped and decapitated in apparent retaliation for an attack on Sunni Arabs last week. The decapitated corpses were found Friday outside the city of Duluiyah, 45 miles north of Baghdad, along with four other unknown victims, also beheaded.

The workers were killed after the kidnapping Wednesday of three Sunni Arabs in Duluiyah by a Shi'ite militia based in Balad, police said. The three were killed and their bodies burned. After the discovery of their bodies late Friday and early yesterday, Sunni families living near Balad started to flee their homes, fearing Shi'ite retaliation.

With tension growing between Sunni Arabs and Shi'ites, Saudi Arabia's King Abdullah met yesterday with prominent Iraqi clerics from both sects in the Islamic holy city of Mecca and urged them to seek an end to the violence to allow the two sides to reconcile.

"My brothers, we need now patience, calmness and quiet to get to know each other," the king told them.

Spokesman Abdul-Karim Khalaf said the Interior Ministry shake-up would ensure stronger action to stop the violence.

"We are working on reshuffling the ministry's vital posts like [the leaders of] police commandos and public order forces, as well as some undersecretaries," he told the Associated Press, without elaborating.

He said most of the 3,000 employees who had been removed since May were suspected of corruption or human rights violations, but he did not specify whether they were involved in militia activities. Up to 600 of them will face prosecution, he said.

The Shi'ite-led national police force, controlled by the Interior Ministry, is widely accused of infiltration by Shi'ite militias blamed in slayings of Sunni Arabs. Critics said Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has been reluctant to move against the militias because many are linked to parties in his coalition.

The U.S. embarked on an intensive neighborhood-by-neighborhood sweep of the capital in August in a crackdown on the killings, but Sadr City, the sprawling Shi'ite slum of about 2 million where radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army militia draws much of its support, has been left alone. U.S. commanders said they are waiting on the command from Mr. al-Maliki's government.

When Mr. al-Maliki's government was formed in May, Interior Minister Jawad Bolani was given the post as top security official largely because he had no militia links, but his lack of militia connections also has given him less leverage to make change.

Earlier this month, an entire brigade of about 700 policemen was suspended from service and taken to barracks because of suspected militia sympathies. The commander of one of the brigade's battalions faces criminal prosecution, and others are being investigated.

Al-Qaida In Iraq: 'Insurgent Tape' Fake (AP)

AP, October 15, 2006

Al-Qaida in Iraq said Saturday that a recent video tape made by a man claiming to be an insurgent who called for the replacement of the head of the terrorist group was fabricated.

DOJ_NMG_0081671

The Mujahedeen Shura Council — an umbrella organization of insurgent groups, including al-Qaida in Iraq — said in a statement posted on its Web site that the video was "a lie and a media trick."

The statement could not be independently confirmed.

On Friday, a man who said he was an Iraqi Islamic insurgent released a video tape urging Osama bin Laden to replace al-Qaida in Iraq's leader with an Iraqi national. The man, who claimed to be Abu Osama al-Iraqi, said in the 17-minute video tape posted on a Web site commonly used by insurgents that there were "deviations" by al-Qaida in Iraq under its new leader Abu Ayyub al-Masri.

Al-Masri — whose pseudonym means "the Egyptian" — took over the leadership after Abu Musab al-Zarqawi was killed by a U.S. airstrike in June. Other Sunni insurgents had criticized al-Zarqawi, a Jordanian, for turning Sunni Iraqis against the movement by killing civilians.

The Shura Council said the false video tape "shows the great dilemma that the Crusader's coalition is passing through in Iraq especially after the calls for withdrawal that were released by the British army."

The group was referring to Britain's top soldier, Gen. Richard Dannatt, who said Thursday that British troops should withdraw from Iraq. On Friday, he backpedaled from the comments, saying he meant troops should leave within years.

Attacks On Journalists Continue In Baghdad (LAT)

By Doug Smith And Saif Rasheed

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

A radio announcer was shot dead on his way to work, and a TV reporter was abducted. Some fear a militia campaign against the media.

BAGHDAD — Gunmen killed a radio journalist and kidnapped a television reporter, Iraqi police said Saturday, continuing a spate of attacks that has killed 14 media employees in recent weeks.

Hussam Ahmed, a correspondent for the independent TV station Nahrain, was forced from his car at gunpoint Saturday, police said. The gunmen took him away in another car. There has been no communication from the kidnappers.

Police also reported that another journalist, announcer Raid Qais of Voice of Iraq radio, was shot while driving to work in the Dora neighborhood of south Baghdad on Friday. Qais died instantly, police said.

Three other journalists recently have been kidnapped or killed in roadside attacks, and 11 employees of a television station were killed by gunmen Thursday. A convoy of armed men, some wearing police uniforms, invaded the Al Shaabiya satellite television station and opened fire at executives, technicians and guards. General manager Abdul Raheem Nasrallah was among those killed.

The attacks are raising concern that the groups responsible for Iraq's sectarian bloodletting are turning their attention to the news media.

"They're trying to hide the reality of the crimes they are committing in Iraq by killing the individuals who are transmitting that reality to the whole world," said Ziad Ajili, head of the Journalistic Freedoms Observatory, an Iraqi free-speech watchdog group.

The other journalists killed recently included reporter Azad Mohammed of the Dar al Salam radio station, whose body lay in the morgue Wednesday. Mohammed, 29, was kidnapped Oct. 3 as he left his house in the Shaab neighborhood of northeast Baghdad.

On Thursday, radio announcer Mohammed Abdul Rahman, 55, of Dijla Radio was found dead. He was kidnapped in mid-September in the western Baghdad neighborhood of Mansour, where he had moved after receiving threats.

Ali Kareem, editor of a weekly newspaper, was grabbed from his car Monday on the way to work in east Baghdad, the Voice of Iraq reported. Iraq's journalism syndicate received a $50,000 ransom demand for Kareem's release.

Although most of Iraq's media outlets have some political or tribal affiliation, most of the recent victims worked for organizations that are considered relatively independent.

Ajili said some attacks on journalists might involve political or tribal motives, but "the first thing is because they are journalists."

"I think there is a campaign against journalism," said Saif Qaissi, a reporter for a foreign news agency who was a friend of Qais, the slain announcer. "It has been escalating for four months."

Reporters covering public affairs in Iraq face a high-stakes dilemma, Qaissi said. If they praise the government, anti-government groups are likely to accuse them of being tied to a group in power. If they criticize, they can be accused of trying to destabilize the country.

"They don't realize that the journalist has to write both the failures and the successes," he said.

The Committee to Protect Journalists, based in New York, reported Friday that 85 journalists and 35 media support workers had been killed in Iraq since March 2003, making the war there the deadliest conflict for the media in the last 25 years.

DOJ_NMG_0081672

On Saturday, authorities reported finding 18 bodies in Baghdad and seven more in Duluiya, north of the capital, where 14 other bodies had been found Friday. Some of the victims showed signs of torture.

A bomb killed one person and injured two in east Baghdad.

An attack on an Iraqi army convoy outside the northern city of Kirkuk left one soldier dead and two wounded.

The Associated Press reported that gunmen killed six adults and two young girls in an attack Friday on a Shiite family picking vegetables in fields south of the capital. Interior Ministry officials could not immediately confirm the report.

U.S. officials reported the combat deaths of two American military personnel. A Marine died Saturday of injuries sustained in an enemy attack in Al Anbar province. A soldier died Friday of wounds received when his vehicle hit a roadside bomb in southwest Baghdad.

The Army also reported that a base in southwest Baghdad that was rocked by a spectacular series of explosions set off by a mortar round that hit an ammunition dump Wednesday had been restored to normal operations in 24 hours.

Helping One Girl Face The Future With Hope (LAT)

By Kurt Streeter

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

Disfigured by war, a young Iraqi finds medical aid and caring strangers in L.A.

IT WAS shrapnel that brought her to Los Angeles. Hot and sharp, it pierced her legs, her stomach and her right hand. It mangled her face around her deep brown eyes, and it tore off her nose.

"I'm hurt," Marwa cried. "Mommy, I'm hurt in my face. I'm hurt, Mommy. My face."

A missile? Mortar? Whose? It was impossible to know. The Americans were invading Baghdad, and Marwa Naim blamed them. She would never forget the explosion. It had blown up her house, thrown her into the air and flung her on top of her mother. Marwa saw a hole the shrapnel carved into her mother's stomach.

Her mother lay still. Marwa saw blood. "Mommy, Mommy, get up…. "

Then Marwa's vision began to fade. She would recall thinking that she herself was dying. Or that maybe she was already dead. Before she lost consciousness, she heard her aunt screaming for her father.

"Mohammed!" her aunt cried. "Your wife is dead! Your wife is dead!"

Marwa was 9 years old.

She had been pretty, her skin soft and toffee-colored, her eyes, mouth and nose set together in perfect proportion, just like her mother's. It gave her the confidence to make herself known, even in a rough suburb like hers on the southern outskirts of Baghdad, a poor and religiously conservative neighborhood where girls settled into defined roles and rarely ventured out alone.

But now her face! Iraqi doctors removed the shrapnel from her stomach and hand and repaired the scars on her lip and around her eyes. But they could not replace her right thumb. And her nose? There was next to nothing. No nostrils, no tip. Just two holes and a small gutter covered by a zigzagging scar.

She saw her face in a mirror and cried. She was too embarrassed to go out. Everyone stared and gossiped. She stopped going to school. Other children called her "Mrs. No Nose." She hated those taunts, hated them more than anything. "Mrs. No Nose. Mrs. No Nose." She couldn't take it.

Her father got a small aid grant and opened a tiny store, where he sold chips and Pepsis to his battle-weary neighbors. That was how aid groups found out about Marwa. They offered to arrange for her to fly to Los Angeles. The Palestine Children's Relief Fund offered to buy her a ticket and find somewhere for her to stay.

The UCLA Medical Center and its chief of plastic surgery, Dr. Tim Miller, offered to restore her face — for free.

But if Americans had hurt her, could they be trusted to heal her?

She would have to go to the United States for months alone. How would she manage? She knew no English, and her perceptions came from bootlegged Jackie Chan movies and whispers on the street: America was an ugly, scary place, especially for Muslims.

When she returned, would she come back just to be killed in another explosion?

Go, her father said. If she didn't look normal, she would never finish school, and she might never marry. He blamed the Americans too. He would recall seeing their aircraft firing missiles just before the concussion. But her face meant so much.

"You're going to look better," he said. "Your nose will get better. Its beautiful shape will be back."

Fearful arrival

MARWA Naim arrived at Los Angeles International Airport one foggy evening in January. By then, she was 11 but still too young to be alone. She carried all of her belongings in a small bag. She wore a pair of thin brown sandals, cream-colored pants and an old light-blue hijab, the head covering common among Muslim women. It was frayed and had small holes at its edges.

"You must be Marwa," a man said in Arabic. He hugged her and gave her a clutch of red and pink flowers. "Assalamu alaikum, habibi," he said. "May peace be upon you, little girl." He was holding a small photograph of her, taken before her injury. "My name is Mr. Saad. Welcome." He introduced her to his wife, Yabitha, who stood quietly by his side. "We'll be sticking together for a while."

Marwa was afraid. They drove to Saad Alazzawi's home in an old Mercedes. Through the fog, she peered out at a freeway and its maze of speeding cars; at billboards with women in bikinis and men with bare chests; at glowing, red and blue neon signs and thousands of white lights from homes and businesses stretched as far as she could see.

She would remember thinking of home. She wanted to cry.

Saad had emigrated from Iraq in the 1970s. Wiry, with bushy salt-and-pepper brows and piercing eyes, he had spent years running a small Muslim school in South Los Angeles. Then things changed. Now, in the same building, he rented a banquet hall for weddings and quinceañera parties. Still, he was an eager helping hand in the Muslim community.

Though they shared a homeland, Saad and Marwa were different. He was Sunni and she was Shiite. He was strict and she was headstrong. Saad had a program for her: He would teach her to read and write better Arabic, educate her generally and train her in the ways of the Koran. He would try to keep her happy, in spite of all the medical tribulations she faced.

Grueling process begins

THEY began four days later. At UCLA, Dr. Miller smiled at her. She let herself smile back at him — briefly. Then she looked down at the beige carpet.

"Marwa, hi," he said. "How are you doing today?"

She was in an examination room. Miller would let me accompany him as he tried to undo the damage the shrapnel had done. It was devastating to see a child so badly disfigured, but I loved her spine-straight courage. So did Miller. A lean, energetic man in his mid-60s, he had been in South Vietnam. He had been shot at, heard missiles explode, seen children die.

"This is personal," he said. "I have to help."

He brought his face close to Marwa's and studied the jagged contours. Where her nose had been, it seemed as if a small volcano had blown its top. Only the base remained, a clump of flesh. She could breathe normally, but she had holes for nostrils. And there was the zigzag scar.

Still, he thought, she was strikingly pretty. Her eyes were big and expressive, and she had a slight overbite that pushed her lips into a curl when she grinned, making her seem sheepish and vulnerable.

Miller had helped to restore thousands of faces. He knew about the psychology of self-image — how hard it must be for a striking girl to suffer such a deformity.

"She's not in great shape for this," he told me on the phone late one night. "This is going to be extremely difficult. What happens in the first procedure, that's going to set the course for the next operation and how this all will go."

He figured it could take five, maybe six surgeries — half a year, at least. He was concerned that everyone around Marwa might think this would be easy, as if it were some sort of a slam dunk. He said he had called two other surgeons to help him figure out which technique to use.

How do you build a nose from nothing? He compared it to what paratroopers had done in South Vietnam. "Working on her, it's going to be like jumping out of an airplane," he said, "and just hoping the chute opens."

Marwa's first leap came Feb. 10, after a sleepless night.

She had sat on her bed until dawn in a sparse room at Saad's duplex, looking at photos of her family, everyone except her mother. She had no pictures of her mother.

She would remember hearing wind rattle against the windows — and trembling.

At 6:30 a.m., she was at UCLA, surrounded by doctors and nurses. She eyed them warily, clutching a soft, brown teddy bear.

Miller walked in.

"Oh, my God," she said in English. She had heard people say that when they were frightened.

"I have something for you," Miller said. It was a flower: a tall, thin orchid with tender white petals. He asked an interpreter to translate.

"This is going to go well," he said. "There's nothing to worry about."

"Thank you," she said, again in English. And she smiled.

By 8 a.m. they were in surgery. She was anesthetized. Miller applied orange gel to her face. Then he marked off portions of skin with black ink.

DOJ_NMG_0081674

At 8:05, he laid a scalpel into the flesh in the middle of her forehead. Delicately, he cut a U-shaped flap of skin. He left the bottom end of the flap attached between her thick eyebrows. He lifted the top end and examined both sides. It was brown on the outside, bloody and fatty on the inside.

A nurse suctioned the blood.

"Double hook, please," Miller said, calmly. "Moist cloths, please."

Gently, he draped the flap of skin against her cheek. He closed the opening it had left on her forehead.

Then he made a second incision, this time around the ugly black scar in the pit where her nose used to be. He cut out the scar and peeled back the skin on both sides. From my vantage point at Marwa's feet, even I could see that there simply was not enough cartilage left to use as the foundation for a new nose.

Miller directed his fellow doctors to her right ear. Deftly, they cut inside. They took out small, white chunks of cartilage. With this cartilage, Miller and another doctor began to build a new nose. For a moment, they looked like artists. Delicately, they molded the chunks and then sewed the structure together.

Miller stepped back. The cartilage looked like a miniature flagpole, a few centimeters tall. Then he took the flap of skin, its bottom still attached between her eyebrows, and twisted it to turn the brown side out and the bloody side in. Finally, he stretched it down, over the top of the cartilage flagpole.

It was a nose.

But not a very beautiful nose. It looked like a swollen, twisted, bloodied clump.

To keep everything in place, Miller inserted a thin, 3-inch metal rod through the clump. It stuck out on both sides. In Marwa's nostrils, he placed small yellow tubes to keep the passages open. The tubes jutted out from her face.

"This is a hard one," he said, stepping back again. He wasn't sure that her nose would ever look normal. And he worried about the forehead hair growing from it. He knew, though, that he would revisit this nose.

"Time will tell," Miller said. "Time will tell."

Now Marwa lay in recovery. Her eyes opened slightly. Saad stood above her. He held her right hand, stroked her forearm and prayed in Arabic. "In the name of the merciful and compassionate God, say, 'He is God alone, God the eternal…. ' I seek refuge in the Lord of daybreak, in the Lord of men, the king of men, the God of men…. "

She moaned. I wondered how she felt. In Arabic, Saad asked her what was wrong. "She says, 'The pain, it is bad. Very bad.' "

Marwa looked at Saad and muttered softly in Arabic. "What did they do to me? Why did they do this?"

Saad looked up to heaven, then at me. She was more than just a kid he was trying to help. She was a symbol. "We have hurt this little girl," he said. "She didn't deserve this. The children of Iraq, my people, they don't deserve the pain they are taking. Now I have this little one to take care of …. She represents the tragedy of Iraq."

He tightened his lips and shook his head.

Marwa clutched his hand.

He looked at me again. "What would you do?" he asked. He was thinking of her future.

"Should I intervene, maybe even try to keep her here, so she wouldn't have to return? What should I do, as her guardian? Heal her and then let her go back to that war zone?"

There were no good answers. How moral would it be to heal a child and then send her directly back into the teeth of war? How moral would it be to keep her here, to separate her from her family?

Marwa tried to stifle her moans. Her eyebrows tensed.

She whimpered and opened her mouth slightly. A single tear formed at her right eye.

Slowly, it rolled down her cheek.

A land so new

MARWA turned 12. America was odd and amazing. Everywhere she went her eyes grew wide, sometimes with fear and disdain, sometimes with wonder. When she was not at UCLA, she flew kites, walked on the beach and ate Fosters Freeze treats. At an Islamic Chinese restaurant in Alhambra, Saad introduced her to egg rolls. She didn't like them.

From inside Saad's old Mercedes-Benz, she gaped at everything. "So many cars, so many cars," she would say in Arabic. Saad translated. "It's all so big, so rich, so clean." She said she wanted a sports car, a convertible.

She stared at tight, low-cut jeans, skin-hugging tops and shirts with sleeves above the elbows. She said she wanted some of those clothes too.

But somehow she understood the price, and not just in dollars. Things seemed lock-step in America, she said, even regimented. Saad translated her words. "It is true, they have more freedom here. But in other ways, the people here, all they do is work…. There is no fun, only work. People are like machines here. Is this freedom?"

Still, she envied how easily American children could make their feelings known and how girls could act like boys: be tough, independent, aggressive.

She ran through Saad's banquet hall, kicking a soccer ball. He taught her how to ride his son's rickety black 10-speed bike, and she fell in love with it. She pedaled furiously around his neighborhood, her hijab flapping, the yellow tubes in her nostrils straining with each breath, blood trickling out.

"Please, little girl, slow down!" Saad shouted. What if she fell and did more damage to her face? He took the bike away.

It was futile. The next day, she sneaked it out — and flew off again.

She grew tired of his program: the English, the Koran, the home schooling. She wanted to sleep in, skateboard, ride the bike.

Saad finally sent her to spend a weekend with Theresa Moussa, an Egyptian who had come to America as a girl. She worked for UCLA, helping the medical center with its Arabic-speaking patients. She had been interpreting for Marwa.

A divorcee with a son in college, Theresa was traditional enough to revere her parents and try to please them, but she was also strong and independent. She had flowing, black hair and long legs, and she didn't try to hide them. She wore makeup and high heels, form-fitting skirts and blouses that showed her arms.

At Theresa's house, Marwa walked with a bounce. They laughed and shared secrets. Marwa could watch all the TV she wanted and help herself to anything in the refrigerator. She and Theresa went to a beauty shop together and had their nails done in pink.

Marwa asked Theresa if she believed in God.

Yes, Theresa said.

Marwa noticed her crucifixes and her painting of the Virgin Mary. She must be from a different strain of Islam, Marwa thought. "So, you are Sunni, right?" she asked.

"No, I am Christian," Theresa said. "Coptic Christian."

One night, the two of them sat on Theresa's black leather coach and watched a movie. Marwa draped her arms around Theresa and buried her head in Theresa's chest. They both fell asleep.

Near midnight, Theresa woke. She gently awakened Marwa.

Groggily, Marwa looked into Theresa's eyes. "Mommy…. "

On March 6, Miller operated again.

The flap of skin, twisting down between her eyes, seemed like a snout. In a restaurant one day, a boy had looked at her and fled back to his friends. "Elephant girl!"

Now Miller raised the flap. Underneath was the transplanted cartilage. With needles, scissors, forceps and thread, he chipped at the cartilage and molded it. Like a sculptor, he thinned it here, then thinned it there.

Slowly, he created a tip.

On April 10, he operated a third time. Using scissors and scalpels, he refashioned the flap of skin around the top of what was starting to look like a real nose.

There came a moment of truth.

He lifted the flap and snipped it from its moorings.

In a miraculous way, the flap would find new roots and new ways for blood to flow and keep it alive.

And there it was: Her face was beginning to look as it once had.

After each operation, Marwa moaned. "No, no," she cried. "Get away, get away."

"But little girl, you need water," Saad said.

"They did more than what you told me!" she cried out after one surgery. "There is a lot of pain! I want my father! I need to be with my father! Ohhhh! Why? Why? Why? Why is this happening to me, Allah? Where is my mother? Why did she have to die? Why?

Saad could do nothing. He stroked her arm. "It's OK, baby. It'll be all right, little girl."

"Mr. Saad, why is Allah punishing me? Why did Allah take my mother? I want to be with her. I don't want to live anymore. I wish I had died. I wish the Americans had just killed me."

The anesthetic worked like a truth serum, Saad thought, letting her spill out her true feelings. He stiffened when he heard them.

Marwa wanted to see her face.

A hand mirror lay on a table. Saad hesitated. Then he gave it to her.

Marwa stared. Despite improvements, her nose was still a puffy, reddened clump, oozing blood. Two yellow tubes still protruded from its nostrils.

"This is a nose?" she cried out. "Why didn't God let me die?"

DOJ_NMG_0081676

Concerns and clashes

BETWEEN surgeries, Saad spoke to Marwa's father and learned that he was patrolling the roof of his flat every night in fear that someone would hurt his family.

How could Saad, in good conscience, send Marwa home?

On the other hand, so long as she was in America, how could he shield her from temptations? Especially the temptation of the bicycle?

"Baby, baby, please, no," he pleaded with her. "Please, off the bike before you fall and hurt yourself."

She rode it anyway, in circles, just out of reach. She mimicked him, speaking in English. "Baby, baby, please. Baby, baby…. " Then she would switch to Arabic. "I know what you can do and what you cannot do. You are not my father. And I am a child. Here I have rights."

One day, without warning, the front wheel of the bicycle twisted on a patch of oil. The bike slid out from under her, and she plunged to the ground. With her thumbless hand, she broke her fall, but the yellow tubes jarred loose and spilled to the pavement.

Saad ran to her.

She dusted herself off, picked up the tubes and looked at her hand. Blood trickled from a gash. The tubes would have to be cleaned and reinserted. Her face trembled, as if she wanted to cry, but she held it in. She couldn't afford to show her tears, not now.

"That's it," Saad said. "I take the air out of the tires. No more biking."

Marwa brushed past him and walked away muttering. Saad translated. She was saying: "I don't want to stay here anymore."

Saad was growing weary and frustrated. He needed a break. He began letting her spend more weekends with other families in the network of Iraqi Americans around Los Angeles.

Sometimes she stayed with the family of Karim and Lily Karam in Palos Verdes Estates. The Karams took her to ride horses and let her try on lipstick. She watched an old Egyptian movie about a belly dancer named ZuZu, who fell into the arms of a blond leading man. "Hi, handsome," Marwa said, in English. "So handsome."

She borrowed the movie and took it back to Saad's, but he wouldn't let her watch it.

"Movies like this, they are totally undermining me," Saad said, burying his head in his hands. "And undermining society. It's taking liberalism into the extreme. As far as the clothes, anything goes. Freedom, freedom. We are free to do whatever we want. I can't have her watching this trash. Not in my house."

One Saturday, Theresa and her fiance took Marwa to Universal Studios. I went along. At Waterworld, a lavish production based on the movie, men in green uniforms strutted in front of us with rifles and grenades. They fired at each other. Water splashed. Explosions thundered. The men screamed.

Marwa held desperately to Theresa's arm. "Theresa, Theresa, is it real? What is happening?"

It was fake, Theresa said.

Marwa didn't believe it. She ducked and tucked her head against Theresa's shoulder. She opened her mouth and closed her eyes.

Pop-pop-pop…. Boom!

Men fell into the water.

One blast shook the ground. It must have sounded like the explosion in Iraq that changed her life. Could she take it?

Finally, she looked up. She saw that Theresa was smiling and laughing. Everyone was applauding.

By the end of the show, Marwa was applauding too.

The day was darkened by thoughts of my father. He had fallen gravely ill with heart disease, and I was worried. Marwa could tell. "He could die," I told her — really die, not like the men in Waterworld.

She said she would pray for him.

On another Saturday, she practiced putting makeup on Theresa, who woke to find her eyes caked with black liner and thick blue shadow, her lips painted bright red, her cheeks plastered with rouge. When Theresa drove her home to Saad's house, Marwa said: "I don't know why I love you, but I do."

Marwa looked at her nose in the rearview mirror. It did, indeed, seem like a nose. "I like the way I look now," she said. "You are so good to me, so nice. Do you love me too?"

"Yes, of course I do," Theresa would remember saying. "You are special to me. You are like the daughter I never had."

"I like that," Marwa said. She clutched Theresa's arm. "That makes me happy."

On May 10, Marwa had her fourth operation. By now, doctors were making progress with the hair that had been growing in little clumps on her nose. They used a laser to kill the follicles. Still, there was more to be done.

DOJ_NMG_0081677

Before her anesthetic, Miller walked into her room, smiling. Her nose had a few lumps. A thin scar stretched from her eyebrow to her hairline. But he thought he could diminish those things. And he had a surprise.

"This," he said, "is probably going to be our last time."

"OK," she shot back in English. "Be careful."

He laughed. She knew so much English now. Gone was the shy, scared girl he had met back in February. Earlier in the week, she had come to his office. She wore a new ensemble: a fashionable pair of white jeans, a pink top and a pink hijab.

She clasped his hand and held it tight for a full minute.

He teased her.

She giggled, then looked him in the eye and winked.

During the surgery, Miller opened her nose with a scalpel. He trimmed and shaped the cartilage at its tip, then cut bits of bone that had formed a little hump at the ridge and flattened it slightly.

He narrowed the scar on her forehead. It took two hours. Then Miller lifted the skin around her nose and examined it. He announced that he was going to sew the skin together. When he finished, he stepped back to see how she looked.

He turned to me and clenched his fist. "You know what?" he said. "We're done. It's just going to be a few more stitches, and then we're done. This is all I can do for her."

When Marwa healed, she would have a fine nose.

He would check her in a year, if he could, and make any necessary adjustments. Otherwise, her surgeries were over.

Time for farewells

AFTER the operation, Marwa spoke to Saad so rudely that he sent her to her room — more than once. She hugged her teddy bear, clutched a photograph of her father and wept.

Finally, Saad asked Salam and Sahar Ali, an Iraqi American couple in Mission Viejo, to keep her while she healed and until she could go home.

"I should not have brought her to stay with me," Saad told me one afternoon. "I would not do this again. She has brought it all to my face: the war, the suffering. I was trying to deal with the guilt I have for not being in Iraq, for not helping enough. But with her behavior and her pain, I have seen in front of me the tragedy of Iraq."

Tears pooled in his eyes.

The Alis took Marwa to a mosque, where she heard an imam speak about honoring mothers. She knelt and cried. "In heaven," she asked, "will I see my mother?"

Worried about her sadness, the Alis let her watch satellite TV. They took her to Disneyland, to Chuck E. Cheese's, to Starbucks and to an outdoor mall in Irvine, where she rode a carousel for the first time and spent an hour at a computer store.

She went to Al Ridah, an Islamic school, where Marwa helped students with their Arabic.

Now it was only a matter of weeks. On the phone, I spoke with her father in Iraq. Gunfire and explosions were a constant part of life. He had seen a man being kidnapped. An American tank patrolling his street had rolled over his car and destroyed it.

"I am very scared of what it is going to be like when she comes back," he said. He knew that Marwa had grown accustomed to America and liked it. He wondered if she could handle the hardship in Iraq, even if she had a nose. "I am afraid."

But he needed her. She had to help take care of the house and her older brother and two younger sisters — even if it meant that she could not go back to school. He needed her to wake the other children, make them breakfast, clean the house….

Marwa went to a department store one evening with Sahar. She jumped on the back of a shopping cart and pushed off, racing down the aisles. Sahar chased her. "Don't do that! Marwa, please."

"But Auntie," Marwa shouted. "Here I am free! Free, Auntie, free!"

Finally, the day came.

Marwa's nose was healing. It looked much like a normal nose, slightly upturned and gracefully proportioned. It had a small lump at the bridge, and its skin was a touch darker than her cheeks. A thin scar traced a straight line from between her eyebrows up to her scalp.

She had spent the night at the Karams' in Palos Verdes Estates so she could be nearer LAX. Now it was morning, and she was watching a video of Cinderella, who was defying all expectations and transforming into a princess.

"Time is up, Cinderella," Lily Karam said. "We are going to miss the plane if you keep watching."

Marwa wouldn't budge. "No, no, I don't want to go. I'll go tomorrow, OK?"

I had planned to fly with her as far as Amman, Jordan, where her father was to pick her up and take her home. But now I could not go. My father's heart had grown weaker, and he had died just days before.

In Lily's car, rushing to make up time, I told Marwa how her courage with far greater hardships had helped me while I sat at my father's side.

On several occasions before, she had let me know exactly how tired she had grown of my notebook and questions. But now she paused.

"Thank you, Kurt," she said in English as she sat in a car that drove through thick traffic on Pacific Coast Highway. "This nice. Thank you."

She grew quiet. She rolled down the window and stared out. Her lips quivered. She turned to Lily and said that she knew she had to go home but that she wasn't sure if going home would be good for her.

It helped that at LAX she was surrounded by many of the people who had helped her. Saad was there, along with officials from the relief fund that had paid for her trip. One of them wondered aloud: "How does a 12-year-old girl injured in the war adapt to a foreign country like this one — and then go back to war?"

Marwa stood tall. She wore a chiffon top, high-heeled shoes and wraparound sunglasses. She carried a fancy handbag. Covering her hair was a new, cream-colored hijab, embroidered with tiny sparkles.

Her luggage was filled with new clothes, stuffed animals, jewelry, wristwatches, purses, a SpongeBob, Play-Doh, journals, a picture frame trimmed in pink fuzz — and photos of Saad, Miller, Theresa.

She reached up and hugged Theresa.

"I don't want…. "

Theresa cut her off. "Listen, you have to go. I want you to look back and remember your time here — and remember me. But you have to go. You go — and make something of yourself."

"But …. "

"Don't worry, no matter how far we are, we will always be friends."

Gently, Theresa placed into Marwa's small hand a letter.

"But I will miss you…."

"I will miss you too…."

A bittersweet journey

MY COLLEAGUES, photographer Anne Cusack and reporter Ashraf Khalil, accompanied Marwa on the plane. Marwa took out a photo of Theresa and kissed it, again and again. She read Theresa's letter. It said Theresa would never forget her.

Anne could see Marwa was sobbing.

At the baggage claim area in Amman, she spotted a man who looked like her. His back was turned, but she knew instantly that it was her father. She wrapped her arms around his legs, and he swept her up into his arms.

During two days in Amman, Marwa got a glimpse of her future. Mohammed Naim expected his daughter to address people formally, with honorifics: uncle, auntie or mister. But she called Ashraf by his first name. Her father upbraided her.

She pouted.

"She's getting stubborn," he said.

"No, I'm not," she said. "I'm not stubborn!"

"That's something that has to change," he said. Such disrespect could lead to danger at home. "We have to bring her back to our way."

He tried to prepare her for her neighborhood: His shop was faring poorly. Few people had enough money for Pepsis and chips. "Our neighbors? They were kidnapped, last month."

Everyone knew she had been in America, and people who had gotten help from Americans were not well thought of. "We come home every night and lock ourselves in."

She looked at him wearily. "Let's change the subject."

At 7 a.m. July 3, Marwa Naim and her father climbed aboard a propeller-driven, 13-seat Fokker to fly back to Baghdad. She wore designer jeans, high heels, a white blouse and a denim jacket, cut short above her waist.

She walked up a staircase to the door of the plane. She turned, gave a tiny wave and was gone.

A changed life

WHEN they reached Iraq, Marwa told me by phone, she learned that her father had remarried. His new wife was Faiza — one of her distant cousins. Faiza, her father said, was pregnant.

Her neighbors could not believe how her face had changed. No one called her "Mrs. No Nose" anymore. She said that she was happy to be home but that she was rarely allowed to go outside, because of the violence.

In America, she could ride a bike, swim, see Theresa. "I want to go back," she said. "I want so go back as soon as I can."

About this story

DOJ_NMG_0081679

Writer Kurt Streeter and photographer Anne Cusack spent four months with Marwa Naim, her doctors and those who welcomed Marwa into their homes. Streeter interviewed them extensively. He and Cusack were present during each of her surgeries and many of her experiences of daily life in America. Conversations in Arabic were translated by her caretakers. Cusack and writer Ashraf Khalil accompanied Marwa back to the Middle East. The account of the bombing that injured her is drawn from interviews with Marwa, her father and Marine Col. Christopher Conlin, who led American troops through her neighborhood on their way into Baghdad.

Billboards, Posters Offer Baghdad Hope (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi

AP, October 15, 2006

Thousands of posters and billboards dot Baghdad with messages of hope for a city of gloom, where residents largely stay home, afraid of the streets, their pain and grief deepening every day amid unending violence.

"No matter how strong the storm, it will go away in the end," declares the message on one poster, with a picture of a worried young woman clasping a boy to her body, her hand protectively placed over his head, her hair fluttering in the wind.

Hundreds of copies of the poster — and at least one giant one on a billboard — can be seen throughout the city, pasted on concrete blast walls and outside buildings.

Even with the attempt to instill hope, the messages, sponsored by the government, are an unusually blunt acknowledgment of just how grave conditions have become.

"You have the power to pull Iraq out of this darkness," declares another billboard overlooking a square. The words are inscribed next to a burning map of Iraq painted in the red, black and white colors of the country's national flag.

The images are in stark contrast to the blitz of upbeat street ads that filled the Iraqi capital in the two years after Saddam Hussein's ouster in 2003. Those showed optimistic Iraqis casting ballots or engaged in rebuilding. They prescribed democracy as the key to a better life and free elections and a new constitution as the tonic for the ills of society.

During two general elections last year, there was hardly a wall in Baghdad not plastered with candidates' campaign posters.

U.S. and Iraqi authorities have long used billboards and posters to get their message out to a public confused by the rapid change that followed Saddam's overthrow. As far back as early 2004, authorities used posters and billboards to rally support for the country's nascent security forces in the midst of a growing Sunni insurgency. The U.S. military at times put up posters with congratulatory messages to Iraqis on religious occasions, trying to counter its image as a foreign occupier.

The use of images is a particularly important part of Iraq's public life.

Portraits of key religious figures, including some who died centuries ago, hang in homes and streets by Iraq's Shiite majority to display their religious identity and their post-Saddam political empowerment.

But the new crop of billboards and posters in Baghdad reflect the dark mood resulting from a marked worsening of conditions in the Tigris River metropolis, where contemporary reality has made a cruel joke of its former boast of being "the city of peace."

Iraqis had adjusted to suicide bombings and other attacks by Sunni insurgents. But for the past six months they've faced a new brand of violence, sectarian killings blamed on Shiite death squads and reprisal slayings by Sunni militants. The violence, in which neighbor is turned against neighbor, is deadly and deeply demoralizing.

"Two years ago, I thought it could not get any worse than this," said barber Qais al-Sharaa. "But it has every day since." In view of his shop was a giant billboard reading "Terrorism has no religion," with the word "terrorism" in red and dripping what looks like blood drops.

The sectarian violence has centered on Baghdad, and security operations by U.S. and Iraqi forces have brought little relief.

The city witnessed an average of 36 attacks a day in the past three weeks, an increase of nearly 30 percent over the preceding seven weeks and 60 percent higher than from mid-March to mid-June, according to U.S. military figures.

The sight of what in any other world capital would pass for a nightmare has become the daytime reality of Baghdadis. On any given day, citizens step from their homes to see police trucks loaded with dead, blood-drenched corpses, the beheaded bodies of men snatched from their homes or workplace by gunmen in police uniforms, body parts strewn across a street or dangling from a roof in the wake of a bombing.

Many residents, therefore, are holed up, going out only when necessary. Traffic has thinned, and the once congested streets and sidewalks are nearly vacant by late afternoon, hours before a sunset curfew that has been in place for months.

Baghdad has an unemployment rate of a staggering 30 percent. Power outages are routine and last up to three days at a time. The price of gasoline has risen by as much as 12-fold since Saddam's ouster and fuel is often scarce.

A sign on Mansour street in central Baghdad — once a thriving commercial district that now is frequently hit by bomb blasts — speaks to two of the city's worst problems, security and uncollected garbage.

"Uncollected garbage attracts explosive devices as well as rats," the sign warns. Insurgents often conceal roadside bombs in garbage. Like much of the capital, Mansour street is now defined by ubiquitous concrete blast barriers, security checkpoints and barbed wire that has snagged windblown plastic bags.

The owners of one of Baghdad's best known pastry shops, also on Mansour street, have given up on replacing the glass on the store's front windows after several blasts shattered it. Al-Khaski's now has concrete wall instead.

"The sight of Baghdad streets remind me of the tragedy in which we live," said Ibrahim Haidar, a 41-year-old father of two who lives in the volatile New Baghdad district. "It makes me feel I could die any second."

Yet, against all odds, the street ads try to offer some hope to a city teetering above an abyss of failed statehood and civil war.

The billboard shows the dark silhouettes of arms stretched skyward as if from a grave in front of a melancholy, dusky sky. The message: "The will of honorable people will enable Iraq to rise."

Tense Baghdad Residents Find Oasis In 'Dr. Phil' (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

Seeing bedroom and workplace foibles solved on TV offers comfort to people confronted daily by mortar rounds and death squads.

BAGHDAD — The young men at the checkpoint couldn't have been older than his own lanky teenagers. Wielding Kalashnikovs, they brusquely ordered the gentlemanly, 50-year-old Shamil Hashem Suhaili and his 16-year-old son, Ahmad, out of their car. They demanded identification. They questioned him harshly.

Where are you going? Where are you coming from?

It was degrading, to be sure, for a man of his age and accomplishments. But the hydro-engineer could do little but submit.

"I answered them politely," he says. "If you make a mistake they could do anything to you. If they want, maybe they will get your mobile phone, your money, maybe they take my son. They are the judge. They do whatever they want."

Frightened and angry, Suhaili headed home with his son for lunch with their family. Afterward, Suhaili powered up his generator and wound down his nerves with one of the few things that give him comfort: "Dr. Phil."

In a world of armed gangs, random shootings, blackouts and trash heaps, salves are where you find them.

For Suhaili, they're a family lunch, a bit of gardening, and the balding American talk-show host from Texas, whose weekday television program airs with Arabic subtitles on a popular Lebanese-based satellite channel.

Syndicated and subtitled versions of "Dr. Phil" and "The Oprah Winfrey Show" are growing popular throughout the Middle East. For Iraqis, they offer a window to a world in which people are more concerned with bedroom and workplace foibles than mortar rounds and death squads.

From the moment Suhaili clambers out of bed, his travails are beyond the scope of a "Dr. Phil" episode. He struggles through the dark and muggy heat, hoping there's enough water for a shower, enough light to button his shirt by. "You can't even comb your hair," he says. "You can't select the proper clothes and shirt for your pants."

His work at Iraq's Ministry of Water Resources sometimes seems the perfect metaphor for his life: spending the day plugging the cracks in Iraq's dams.

After climbing into his beat-up Volkswagen, Suhaili girds himself for the hourlong ride past multiple checkpoints. If he's short on gas it means a dangerous wait at the fuel station, or paying steep black-market prices for fuel from a jerrycan.

"Sometimes these people are cheating," he says. "They mix it with water or diesel. It ruins your car."

Suhaili, a Sunni Arab, is a stocky man whose reddish brown hair and mustache show wisps of white. His smoky-brown eyes glisten as he recounts his family's near-brushes with disaster: A car bomb explosion near his home shattered every window and door frame. A mortar round struck his son Abdullah's school. Uniformed gunmen abducted a dozen young Sunni Arab men from his neighborhood — people who had played with his sons — before torturing and killing them.

But much of the frustration is more mundane: Hours of work are lost on his computer because the power goes out at the ministry. A checkpoint delay holds him up for an hour. Teachers demand bribes in excess of $100 to help his two sons, Abdullah, 19, and Ahmad, advance in school. Fear of suicide bombings at a crowded no-frills market forces him to shop at a pricier one.

There are the half-melted spent bullets he finds on his roof, a warning that even minding your own business and staying at home may not protect you from the random gunfire that rains down on Baghdad.

And all day long he worries about the unspeakable. His daughter, Yasmine, a quiet but alert 22-year-old, travels along dangerous roads to medical school. His sons navigate the halls of a school riven by sectarian tensions. His wife, Hadel Hazem, insists on driving herself — sometimes alone — around the city. He thinks of them with every television and radio report of corpses, kidnappings and bombings.

"When my child is late coming home from school for just five minutes, 100 thoughts go through my mind," says Hazem, a retired electrical engineer who runs a small nonprofit organization for widows.

After work, school and errands, when all five family members gather for a midafternoon lunch, they share stories of terrible fates that have befallen others.

Abdullah and Ahmad discuss a new project they're working on: setting up a computer network among the neighborhood boys so they can compete at video games without leaving their homes.

But sometimes the anxiety explodes. An argument breaks out.

"We can't storm out of the house," Abdullah says. "We can only raise our voices." There are tears. But there are also hugs and apologies, quiet moments of reflection.

And Saturday to Wednesday, from 7 p.m. to 8 p.m., there is Dr. Phil C. McGraw, the author who exhorts viewers to "stop talking and do something."

One episode the family remembers fondly: A naughty daughter constantly fights with her mother, who tends to be harsh. The mother has no idea how to calm her daughter down, so she just keeps yelling at her.

Dr. Phil demonstrates to the mother that her daughter is merely emulating her own bad behavior. Both mother and daughter come to a realization. They calm down, and they begin to be nicer to each other.

"I feel that he has really great power to understand people's problems and how to solve them," Suhaili says.

He hopes "Dr. Phil" can serve as a substitute social world for his children, who aren't able to spend time with friends, date, or even leave their home after dusk. "I want to show them these are the ordinary problems people deal with," he says.

During rare idle moments, Suhaili composes imaginary letters to his favorite television host.

"Dear Dr. Phil," he begins. "How can I live this difficult life? I forgot what normal life is like. Sometimes I work in the garden to keep my mind off my troubles. I feel more comfortable working in a green place. But some days even the garden doesn't help when you hear that old friends have been murdered and people have fled the country."

Suhaili doubts Dr. Phil can help him or Iraq. Maybe he'd suggest a vacation or a hobby. "If you compare our problems now with the problems he is talking about, it is very big difference," he says, with a chuckle.

"He's addressing psychological problems, how to deal with people," he says. "Here you are dealing with big problems. You are dealing with insurgents and terrorists.

"How would Dr. Phil disarm a militia?"

Lawyers Seek To Free U.S. Citizen Held In Iraq (NYT)

By Neil A. Lewis

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 14 — An American citizen who was tried in an Iraqi court on charges that he had assisted in the kidnapping of three Romanian journalists last year has been sentenced to death, along with five Iraqi co-defendants, a spokesman for the United States Embassy in Baghdad said Saturday.

The spokesman, Lou Fintor, did not identify the American by name, but according to officials in Baghdad and his own legal team, he is Mohammed Munaf, 53.

Lawyers for Mr. Munaf filed papers in federal court in Washington on Friday to try to prevent his transfer to the Iraqi government, arguing that his death sentence undermined one of the United States government's principal arguments for transferring him, namely that he would be in no danger of physical abuse in Iraqi custody.

Mr. Munaf, an Iraqi native who became a citizen of the United States in 2000, traveled to Iraq in March 2005 to act as translator and guide for three Romanian journalists. The journalists were kidnapped by Iraqis and held for 55 days, as was Mr. Munaf.

The Romanians were freed by American forces on May 23, 2005, but Mr. Munaf was held on suspicion of having been an accomplice in the kidnapping.

According to the government, Mr. Munaf confessed to concocting the plot with friends and relatives and only acted as if he were a victim.

DOJ_NMG_0081682

But Jonathan Hafetz, a lawyer with the Brennan Center for Justice at the New York University School of Law, said Mr. Munaf's confession was made under torture.

Mr. Munaf is being held by the American military at Camp Cropper near the Baghdad International Airport.

Because Mr. Munaf is a United States citizen, Mr. Hafetz and his other lawyers have asked Judge Royce C. Lamberth of the United States District Court here to order the military to maintain custody and not give him to the Iraqi criminal court.

In papers filed with the court, Mr. Hafetz said that United States military officials had intervened with the Iraqi judge and insisted that Mr. Munaf be convicted and sentenced to death. Earlier, the Justice Department said that Judge Lamberth should not intervene in the case for several reasons. The department said that Mr. Munaf's claims that he could face torture and physical harm if transferred to Iraqi custody were only speculative and based on news reports of abuse in the government's prison system.

The Justice Department also argued that Mr. Munaf was not actually in United States custody but was being held by a multinational force that was helping the Iraqi government in detention operations.

A judge in another case rejected an argument by the department that an American was being held by a multinational force.

In a similar case involving another American citizen held by the multinational force, a different federal judge rejected the department's argument that the prisoner was not being held by the United States military as a legalistic fiction.

In that case, involving a native of Jordan, the judge issued a restraining order to stop the United States military from transferring the man to Iraqi custody. That case is on appeal, and Mr. Munaf's lawyers have asked Judge Lamberth to await a ruling from the appeals court.

Peacekeeper Commander Mired In Afghan Combat (NYT)

By Carlotta Gall

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Oct. 14 — Leaning against the red webbing that passes for upholstery in a military aircraft, Lt. Gen. David Richards, the British commander of NATO troops in Afghanistan, scanned a press clip as he flew back to the capital from Kandahar, the center of combat operations in the south.

The article was by a well-known British columnist who had written in The Guardian that he was "baffled by Richards's naïveté about the Taliban." The author, Simon Jenkins, contended that NATO could not possibly win against an enemy that could "count on the tacit support of tens of thousands of fighters from tribal militias."

"I am not naïve; he's naïve," General Richards shouted over the roar of the plane engines. He dismissed as "nonsense" the idea that the surge by the Taliban across southern Afghanistan this year was driven by ideology or Pashtun tribal grievances.

"This is not a huge popular uprising," he added, bristling. "And to distort the truth is so unjust for the people here who want us. And it is unhelpful since it undermines the fabric of what we are doing."

"People do not want a return to the Taliban," he said, "but we need time to allow that aspiration to win."

Already half through his one-year command in Afghanistan, General Richards, 54, does not have much time.

He now commands the 31,000 troops of the International Security Assistance Force, including 12,000 American troops, spread across the whole country.

The British general, who has led NATO's most elite fighting force, the Allied Rapid Reaction Corps, since 2001, served three tours in Northern Ireland, and was commander of British peacekeeping forces three times — in East Timor in 1999 and twice in Sierra Leone in 2000.

When he arrived in Afghanistan in February, he talked like a peacekeeper, too, emphasizing the need to improve security so reconstruction and development projects could take root, to extend the government's reach, and to win hearts and minds.

He vowed to do things differently than the Americans. He said that NATO soldiers would treat detainees in a transparent way, respect Islam and Afghan culture, and raid houses only if necessary.

But the general was quickly forced to put many of those plans aside and engage in hard fighting, not least to show the insurgents, and the wavering local population, that his troops were a force to be reckoned with.

Even before he took command of the turbulent south, Taliban insurgents were swarming in numbers not seen since 2001. General Richards estimates that his troops now face 4,000 to 5,000 Taliban fighters.

The summer months were consumed by heavy fighting. The general's forces came under repeated attacks, both on patrol and at their bases, forcing NATO to call in air and artillery strikes that inevitably killed scores of the very civilians he was trying to win over. It was not exactly the hearts-and-minds strategy he had planned. Still, the general insists his forces were fully ready: they had spent nine months preparing for the mission, because the NATO deployment was delayed by several months.

"We knew there was a lot of opposition," he said, this time in an interview in his headquarters in Kabul, set between the United States Embassy and the presidential palace. "We had been watching it, and the Americans were very forthcoming with their intelligence."

"There were doubts about NATO and our ability to conduct demanding security operations," he said. "There are no questions about our ability now."

The fighting was regrettable, but necessary, he added. "We've killed, sadly — because in many respects some of them are just unemployed young Afghan men who need employment and are paid cynically by the Taliban to do their dirty stuff for them.

"But we have killed many hundreds of Taliban in the last month, chiefly in Kandahar and Helmand, and it has put paid to any doubt in anyone's mind that NATO can do what we were sent here to do."

Recently, there have, indeed, been some successes. Not least, his forces regained control of Panjwai, a district just 15 miles west of Kandahar, the main southern city, where the Taliban had gathered in large numbers. The victory was vital for its strategic and psychological impact, the general said.

"The Taliban were very cocky about Panjwai," he said on his visit to Kandahar during the operation. "They think they can face us down. We will prove to them that they are defeatable. It's very important for people to see that happening, and the rather worried atmospherics will change overnight."

The general says that about 10 percent of the population in the south may support the Taliban, that 20 percent are opposed to them, and that the rest are stuck in the middle.

"They are straightforward, simple folk who above all want security for their family, and they will go with whichever side can convince them they are going to win," he said. "And that 70 percent must not be allowed to slip into the hands of the Taliban this autumn."

That will mean rolling out tangible benefits — in the form of assistance — as soon as security allows, he said.

"It's a very important psychological, physical, military and wider campaign that we are conducting, and I think this autumn is a critical period," he said. "And that's my main focus at the moment, getting those visible improvements, in security, governance and reconstruction and development to start happening in the south so that we can persuade that 70 percent that we will win."

Yet in his time in Afghanistan, General Richards has seen up close just how weak and ill equipped the Afghan government is to handle a crisis, like the riots that broke out in Kabul after an American military truck plowed into civilian cars, killing at least four people, in May.

He also found a startling lack of coordination among the government, the military and foreign donors, which he described as "anarchy" in his first weeks on the job.

He set to work to help President Hamid Karzai form a kind of privy council to convene crucial ministers and security officials, as well as United States and NATO commanders and ambassadors of leading donor countries, the United Nations and European Union. Called the Policy Action Group, it meets weekly and is designed to bring badly needed coordination to security and aid efforts.

"It's a pretty powerful structure," said one NATO official, who spoke on the condition of anonymity and who credited General Richards with the idea. "This is his war cabinet; this is the bit he never had."

There is still a long way to go. He talks of the need to combat corruption, replace bad government officials and persuade international donors to drop their lengthy procedures and tendering rules to help reconstruction aid flow.

"I am not giving the rosy picture," he said on the military flight. "I'll be honest. There's a lot to do."

2 NATO Soldiers Are Killed In Afghanistan (NYT)

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan, Oct. 14 — NATO reported that two of its soldiers died in combat in Kandahar Province on Saturday, and a bomb struck a provincial governor's convoy east of Kabul, the capital, narrowly missing him, Afghan officials said.

One provincial official was killed in the ensuing gun battle with militants.

A news agency reported that Taliban rebels had claimed responsibility for the attack, aimed at Gov. Gulab Mangal of Laghman Province. It was the latest of a string of such attacks against the country's civilian administrators in recent weeks.

Separately, six men working for American forces on Afghanistan's eastern border were killed Friday by a roadside bomb on their return from delivering aid to a village.

On Saturday, NATO forces and the Afghan police killed one man and arrested nine others suspected of involvement in recent bomb attacks southeast of Kabul, a NATO press release said.

Friendly Fire And Fraud (BOS)

The Boston Globe, October 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0081684

OF THE thousands of deaths, military and civilian, in the Afghanistan and Iraq wars, none so captures the mix of patriotism, impulsiveness, and dishonesty in the US mission as the shooting death of Pat Tillman by members of his own platoon.

Tillman was the Arizona Cardinals' safety who gave up his football career to join the Army and died in a firefight in Afghanistan in 2004. Although the Army knew the facts of his death almost immediately, it did not reveal them to his parents or the public until almost a month after a televised memorial service for the soldier. His superiors at first exaggerated his role in the clash and never mentioned friendly fire. Since then, contradictory investigations have left his parents still uncertain about what happened.

Recently, California c ongressman Mike Honda asked the Defense Department's inspector general to speed up his criminal investigation into the killing and a possible cover up by the military. If the inspector general does not release his report or if it still leaves open questions, Congress should conduct its own inquiry into the events of April 22, 2004 -- and into the failure of military personnel of all ranks to insist on facts and accountability in a timely way.

Tillman's life and death have come undera new spotlight as a result of a revealing 12,749-word article by Gary Smith in Sports Illustrated. Accounts by Smith of Tillman's self-testing, daredevil adventures beforethe military help to explain why, after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, he gave up his $3.6 million football contract to enlist as a raw recruit.

But another side of Tillman also emerges: that of a voracious reader with a questioning and independent spirit. In 2003 in Iraq, Tillman's first overseas assignment, he told a fellow soldier that he thought the war was ``[expletive] illegal." According to Smith, Tillman was looking forward after his discharge to having a friend arrange a meeting with Noam Chomsky, the MIT professor and critic of US foreign policy. His father and mother have demonstrated the same searching intelligence as their son in seeking information from the military.

Friendly fire happens all too often, sadly, in the fog and noise of war. But the military will not draw lessons from deaths like that of Tillman and an allied Afghan soldier who was also killed by his platoon that April day if it does not demand unflinching accuracy in reports from those involved. The botched investigations of this high-profile incident also hurt the credibility of the military's inquiries into the killings of civilians in Iraq and Afghanistan. If the inspector general does not provide a persuasive and public accounting of what occurred, Congress should do the job itself.

A Conversation With John Kerry (WP)

Interview By Bob Woodward

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

In the months before the 2004 presidential election, The Washington Post's Bob Woodward sought to interview Sen. John F. Kerry, the Democratic nominee, about how he might have conducted foreign policy in the 18 months between Sept. 11, 2001, and the invasion of Iraq in March 2003. For his book "Plan of Attack," Woodward had interviewed President Bush on how and why he made decisions during that same period. Woodward gave the Kerry campaign a list of 22 questions based on Bush's actions, asking how Kerry would have responded at each key decision point if he had been president. Kerry declined the interview at the time. More than a year later, on March 7, Kerry agreed to be interviewed by Woodward and answer the 22 questions. Below is an edited version of their two-hour conversation .

ON PLANNING FOR WAR

John Kerry: Let me start at the beginning, because if I were president and we had been attacked as we were attacked on 9/11, I would have, first of all, created a kind of war cabinet similar to what other presidents have done historically, going back to Roosevelt and others. . . .

Now, you may have an executive committee within that . . . like President Kennedy did. But your war cabinet itself needs to be especially plugged in . . . so the right questions are on the table and the right questions are asked and the right discussion takes place. I mean, if you go back and look at Eisenhower, Eisenhower is smart in that he played less than fully briefed, so to speak, and he would let the staff fight it out in front of him and not let on what he believed or where he wanted to go. I think it's particularly important presidentially not to indicate your policy right up front unless there's such a clarity to it. For instance, in response to 9/11, there's clarity. We've got to go kill al-Qaeda. . . . In fact, I would have thought about starting that war differently.

Bob Woodward: In what way?

I believe that during that particular period of time you knew that they [the Taliban and al-Qaeda] had bad habits. They didn't believe that we would necessarily invade. . . . That is an enormous advantage with which to begin any planning. So they are running around in caravans, which we can see from technical means. They're talking on cellphones, which we can follow with technical means. It gave us time to put assets on the ground.

There are all kinds of things that we could have done with respect to pinpointing their whereabouts.

This is after 9/11?

DOJ_NMG_0081685

Absolutely. And my instincts would have been much more inclined to have used feint as subterfuge to indicate you might be doing one thing when you're really doing another. . . . I would have been inclined to have used a greater covert effort to put the pressure on Osama bin Laden, at which point I would have been prepared to move major track divisions into position, whether it's the 101st, the 10th Mountain Division, 82nd Airborne, etc.

. . . Now, I know we had SEALs at Tora Bora. And they wanted to go. I mean, who wouldn't have wanted to go get Osama bin Laden?

[T]he bottom line is there wasn't even a sufficient strategy to do that. I would have guaranteed there was. Period.

What would you have said to your central commander, who's the guy on the ground, about planning for an Iraq war?

First of all, I would have had enough people around who understand and define to me adequately the nature of the threat that we now face. . . . And that requires a pretty extensive outreach effort which includes, in my judgment, not just the Joint Chiefs of Staff and your national security adviser and your intelligence director, but it really includes. . . . President George Herbert Walker Bush, President Jimmy Carter, President Bill Clinton, you know, President Ford, Brent Scowcroft, Zbig Brzezinski, Jim Baker, George Shultz. I mean, you start running the list. I would have had all of those people to some evening sessions, sat up there in the Yellow Room and sat around and said, "What are we facing here? What are the challenges? What's the most important thing we do? How do we win?" Once you define the war on terror, then you can really understand what you've got to do. I think these guys rushed to a definition of the war, saw it the way they wanted to see it, clouded by ideology, and then went out and made people do things accordingly. . . .

It's incomprehensible to me. I mean look -- go back to that period. On that November 21st date [Nov. 21, 2001, when Bush first asked Rumsfeld to look at the war plan for an attack on Iraq], we had not yet fought Tora Bora. . . . We were deep in Afghanistan with an enormous priority to kill al-Qaeda. And we also had a very tentative Pakistan that was fragile, which was a country with nuclear weapons, which we were just moving to the place of sort of participation with America. . . . So my instinct, absent evidence of intelligence, would not have been to ask the secretary of defense for war plans on Iraq. I would have said, "Do we have sufficient troops on the ground to trap Osama bin Laden?" . . . It would not have moved me to take the eye off of Osama bin Laden and the fundamental goal, which was destroying al-Qaeda. . . .

You would have gone to Bush's father, even?

Oh, absolutely. You kidding? I would have said, "Come down here and spend the evening at the White House. Let's talk. I want to talk to you. Tell me about your decision. Tell me all the things that went through your head when you were thinking about going into Iraq and you made the decision finally not to go."

In August '02, Powell asked for a two-hour dinner alone with Bush. Condi Rice is there and he says, "The consequences have not been fully examined and if you invade . . . 'you break it, you own it.'" What would you have done at that moment, if you were president?

If I were president and my secretary of state came to me and said, "Mr. President, you're on a bad track," I would slow the baby down and find out if I was on a bad track. Or I'd fire my secretary of state. . . . I mean, if a guy with Colin Powell's credentials who's been chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, who'd risen up through service to other presidents, who's been to war, and who is your chosen secretary of state, came to me and said that, I'd say, "Okay. What do we need to do? Where are we? What are the downsides? What haven't we done?"

ON THE "AXIS OF EVIL"

Do you think that the idea of lumping North Korea, Iran and Iraq together is, from a policy point of view, possible or wise, as Bush did in his 2002 State of the Union?

No, it's neither wise nor possible because they are different challenges, different cultures, different historical backgrounds to those challenges. And in the case of the Middle East, we really had an opportunity post-9/11. This is what I think was so important. This is what I saw staring us in the face as I went through 2004 . . . a remarkable opportunity to reconnect to the post-9/11 goodwill of the world, which in my judgment this administration squandered. And that goodwill was perhaps one of our greatest assets. Had we taken that goodwill and built it into a larger strategic concept -- I mean, you can go back to Woodrow Wilson. . . . And then you go to Roosevelt. You go to Kennedy . . . and Eisenhower. They all had a larger strategic concept, which -- this is important -- had the ability to bring the world to our side.

Bush thought this was a strategic concept.

This was an ideological concept, not a strategic concept. . . .

I mean, this is what I would have wanted in first discussions. What are we up against? What is this all about? Did these guys just attack us because this is part of Osama bin Laden's strategy for a greater caliphate in the Middle East, or are they attacking us for other reasons? . . . And it seems to me that the transformational aspects of it require a much more massive kind of public diplomacy, global cooperation on religious issues as well as on economic issues and human rights and other issues, as it did the barrel of a gun. These guys could only see it in the context of the military piece.

ON POSTWAR PLANNING

[I]t wasn't really until three months before the war starts that Bush got involved in aftermath planning. And the question is, when do you start, even if you're contemplating war, which clearly they are, when do you start the ball rolling on aftermath?

Day One. And that is not a Monday morning quarterback comment. That is such a fundamental prerequisite to the concept of contemplating going to war, particularly where you are going to occupy another country. One of the first questions, I'd sit there with a bunch of people at the table, I'd say, "Okay, assuming we go into Iraq, what happens after?" Nobody ever doubted this was going to be short and we were going to win. So we knew we were going to win, so once we're in Baghdad, what happens? Who's going to run the country? Will there be electricity? What are the war plans? Can we protect the pipelines on the oil? What's the ability to make sure people have food? Are you going to guard the ammo dump so you make sure there isn't looting?

Remember when Rumsfeld said, "Oh, looting happens."

"Stuff happens."

I was stunned by that. And I said they're going to rue the day that they allowed this stuff to get out of control because they sent a message, "No control." And our kids were being blown up by the very weapons that they didn't even think about securing on the way in. There should have been an elaborate -- in fact it was an elaborate plan and they chose to ignore it. Colin Powell and the State Department had a fairly elaborate plan and I've talked to people who are involved in the making of it.

ON DONALD RUMSFELD

In November-December '02, Rumsfeld's making major force deployments to the area but he says we can't do a big one because it will tell the world diplomacy is over. And he said, "We're sending these forces and they're going to be in top fighting shape for about two or three months but then it will start to degrade." Your reaction?

One of incredulity that a president would even allow that argument to be persuasive and that a secretary of defense would make it in the first place. And shame on all of them for that. That is insulting to Americans and to all of us, the notion that you have to send people to war simply because you put them there. This is just, you know, it was their rush to war.

And then when Rumsfeld in January started telling the president, "You're losing your options." And you know, you get to a point where we're asking our allies, particularly the Saudis, to make commitments and it's not feasible to back off.

Well, you could always back off it if you haven't committed the troops and there's a reason to back off. I mean, if you don't have intelligence to go to war and you go to war for weapons of mass destruction, you damn well can say, "I'm not giving the order to fire." What is the shame in going back and saying, "We have new intelligence that indicates something different and I intend as president to exercise my responsibility to the world and to our troops to make sure we've exhausted that."

Do you get in a bind, though, where to credibly threaten force you have to deploy all kinds of troops and then once you've deployed them you get into --

The purpose of the deployment of the troops is to get the weapons of mass destruction under control. If at the last moment something indicates to you either there aren't weapons of mass destruction or you have a way to get them under control, you don't use the troops and you don't have to. I mean, those are the tough judgments. Look, what are you going to do? "Oh, gee. We're locked in. We don't have sufficient evidence but I'm going to send this kid from Illinois to die anyway?"

ON DOUBTS

Can a president afford to have doubt in a time of war?

Well, you better have your doubts before the war. And you better explore every doubt before the war. But once you've committed, you better not have a doubt. You better know what you're doing and you better be committed to winning and do everything in your power to do that.

Do you think they had a process of doubt?

No. Clearly they didn't, and that's a reflection of the president.

But Bush says, when I asked him earlier, I said, "You never get everyone to agree on the use of force."

I'm not looking for everybody's agreement. You're never going to get everybody to agree.

What are you looking for?

What I'm looking for is the broadest possible vetting and examination. And let the debate take place in front of me and I'll make my judgment. But nobody will have any doubt that every question was asked. Nobody will have any doubt that the alternative theories were examined, that history was examined, that culture was examined, religion was understood, that the dynamics of the region were explored, that people who've lived there have been inquired of. When I get to that decision I can explain it and there's only one rationale, not a whole bunch of shifting rationales. That's the way you take a nation to war.

ON HISTORY'S VERDICT

I asked Bush in December '03, "How do you think history's going to judge your war?" And that's when he said, "We don't know. We won't know. We'll all be dead."

DOJ_NMG_0081687

I think history nowadays judges things much more rapidly, number one. And number two, certain things lend themselves to pretty rapid judgment. Vietnam is an example of that. . . . And history is going to judge this very, very, very rapidly, I think.

And severely?

I think history is going to be very, very tough on not just the way the war has been managed, but on the way in which the decision to go to war was carried out. It's going to be a low moment . . . in the presidency in history.

A Plan For Iraq (WP)

By Dennis Ross

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

As a longtime negotiator in the Middle East, I learned that the most demanding requirement of peacemaking was just getting each side to adjust to reality. In Iraq today, 3 1/2 years after the United States went to war there, no one seems to be doing that.

The Shiites, who dominate the government, may have reason to distrust the Sunnis, but they also remain unready to recognize the Sunnis' need for formal assurance that they will have a piece of the pie. The Sunnis may understand, intellectually, that they will no longer hold all the positions of power and privilege, but emotionally they have yet to accept the idea of the Shiites -- an underclass in their eyes -- as the dominant political force. The Kurds, regardless of what they say, expect to be independent and simply want a political framework that legitimizes that status without exposing them to threats from Turkey or Iran.

And what about the Bush administration -- has it adjusted to reality? It claims progress, even while we sink into civil war. New security plans are tried and fail. Expectations that we will be able to draw down our forces rise and then fall as sectarian violence increases and becomes self-perpetuating.

Staying the course is a prescription for avoiding reality. But simply setting a deadline and withdrawing might also constitute a form of denial -- denial of what will happen in the region after a precipitous pullout. So what can be done?

The starting point is to recognize that Iraq is not going to be a democratic, unified country that serves as a model for the region. The violence and the Sunni-Shiite division have already ruled that out. Instead, Iraq could, in the best case, evolve into a country that has the following: a central government with limited powers; provincial governments with extensive autonomy; sharing of oil revenue; and, at the local level, some rough form of representation and tolerance for minorities. In those circumstances Iraq might eventually achieve stability.

Such an outcome won't materialize on its own. To be sure, it could emerge after a prolonged civil war, which is the path we are heading down. Three interconnected initiatives might create a more acceptable path for managing either this outcome or at least our own disengagement from Iraq.

First, it's time for the Bush administration to insist that a national reconciliation conference be held and not be disbanded until agreement is reached on amendments to the constitution. Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has presented his plan for national reconciliation, but it fails to address the constitution and the legal assurances Sunnis want.

The Sunnis supported the constitution and participated in the elections last December with the understanding that there would be amendments on sharing oil revenue, on a prohibition against provinces' seceding and on the role of Islam in the state. Those amendments were never adopted, and now, when a committee has finally been formed to discuss them, it appears to the Sunnis that they will have to negotiate with a gun at their heads: namely, with parallel discussions on developing plans for provinces to secede also taking place.

Above all, what the Sunnis don't want is a rump state without resources. If they think that's all they will be left with, they will continue to at least acquiesce in the insurgency. And for the Shiites, that will be justification for preserving their militias. No national compact, no formal structure giving the Sunnis a legal foothold, no end to their support for the insurgency and no readiness by the Shiites to disband their militias.

Second, a long-discussed regional conference with all of Iraq's neighbors should be held. None of them -- Iran, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Syria, Turkey -- wants the Bush administration to succeed in Iraq (at least in the way the president defines success). And yet every one of them fears the consequences of an Iraq convulsed in the aftermath of a precipitous U.S. withdrawal. A full-scale civil war, with refugees streaming out of the country, with instability bound to leak across borders, and with other nations intervening to protect their own interests and their Iraqi allies is just as much a nightmare for Iran as it is for Saudi Arabia. While Iraq's neighbors may agree on little else, the common interest of wanting to avoid an all-out civil war in Iraq could create a basis for a general set of understandings on what they will and will not do to help foster stability there. The administration ought to work for such a conference now.

Third, President Bush should inform Maliki that we will not impose a deadline for withdrawal but we are going to negotiate with his government a timetable for our departure. The difference between a deadline and an agreed timetable is the difference between leaving the Iraqis in the lurch and informing them they have to assume responsibilities. The former guarantees preservation of the militias as they anticipate a deepening civil war; the latter puts all sectarian groups on notice that they can shape the future but the clock is ticking and if they don't begin to get serious about reconciliation and about fulfilling their own responsibilities they face the abyss.

No one in Iraq seems to want us there, but everyone is afraid to have us leave. In the meantime, everyone seems willing to sit back, to avoid tackling the tough problems and to let us carry the brunt of the fighting. That has to stop.

Clearly there should be a relationship between the effort to finally produce national reconciliation and our approach to working out an agreement on the timing of withdrawal. If the Iraqis create a real national compact, the United States can be more flexible on its timetable for withdrawal. If they fail to do so, the United States must be more demanding in negotiations on the timetable. Ultimately, if Iraqis are ready to resolve their internal political differences, to adjust to reality and to make the hard choices they face, our presence can help in the transition. But if they continue to avoid reality, our presence will simply prolong both their state of denial and ours. It is time for a change in course.

Waging War, One Police Precinct At A Time (NYT)

By Phillip Carter

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

Los Angeles

THE military's new counterinsurgency manual offers a great deal of wisdom for those who will wage the small wars of the future. Its prescriptions and paradoxes — like the maxim that the more force used, the less effective it is — make sense. However, having spent the last year advising a provincial police headquarters in Iraq, I know it's far easier to write about such wars than to fight them.

The war I knew was infinitely more complex, contradictory and elusive than the one described in the network news broadcasts or envisioned in the new field manual. When I finally left Baquba, the violent capital of Iraq's Diyala Province, I found myself questioning many aspects of our mission and our accomplishments, both in a personal search for meaning and a quest to gather lessons that might help those soldiers who will follow me.

The first question was how Iraq in September 2006 differed from that of October 2005. Our Iraqi interpreters told us things were better than last year, which in turn had been better than 2004, when American forces frequently fought pitched battles in Baquba. Yet, sometimes in the same breath, they would long for the days of stability and order under Saddam Hussein.

During my time there, the hundreds of thousands of residents of Baquba went to work or school, shopped in markets, spent time with their families and lived their lives. The vibrancy and vitality of Iraqi society was the norm, not the anarchic violence we see in the news.

And yet, the violence did exist; it was not a figment of reporters' imaginations. Gunfire frequently echoed through the streets of central Baquba, and homemade bombs often interrupted the bustling marketplace just north of our compound. This violence worsened during my time in Iraq: the Army's PowerPoint presentations depicting attack and death statistics from across the country showed the same, steadily increasing trend lines.

Despite the trend towards consolidation of American units onto huge bases in the desert, my team remained in downtown Baquba. We shared our compound with the provincial government; it adjoined the provincial courthouse and was just 800 yards down the street from the police headquarters. This proximity made us more effective, both because it made it easier for us to talk to the Iraqi leaders with whom we worked, and because it enhanced our credibility with our Iraqi counterparts, who saw us living and working by their side.

When the power grid failed or water supply stopped working — a daily experience during the summer — we knew and felt it firsthand. Likewise, when explosions or firefights erupted in the city, we could judge their severity with our own senses. We learned that counterinsurgency cannot be conducted from afar.

But did we make a difference? Diyala Province has 1.4 million citizens and stretches from the northern edge of Baghdad east to the Iranian border, north to Kurdistan, and west to the Sunni heartland. My brigade commander, a sage infantryman from Colorado, called Diyala "little Iraq," because its mix of people, geography and conditions represented a microcosm of the torn country. As goes Diyala, so goes Iraq, he and others said.

Our mission was deceptively simple: to build the provincial police so they could provide security and the rule of law. In these areas, we observed tangible progress. My team delivered hundreds of recruits to American-financed police academies, and oversaw a local academy that retrained hundreds of officers who had served under the old regime. Our civilian advisers, American police officers who came to Iraq as State Department contractors, trained hundreds of Iraqi patrolmen in street survival and investigative skills.

We gave trucks, rifles, body armor, radios and countless other items to the police, and oversaw the construction or renovation of police stations throughout the province. With our help, the police chief, a corpulent former army officer, and his staff became better managers, and replaced many ineffective and corrupt officers. We also brought our expertise to the Iraqi jails, judges and lawyers, resulting in hundreds of innocent Iraqi detainees being released after languishing for months or years in jail.

Despite these successes, I still left Iraq feeling uncertain about what we had accomplished. In theory, security should have improved with the development of capable Iraqi Army and police units. That did not happen. This is the central paradox of the Iraq war in fall 2006: we are making progress in developing the Iraqi Army and police, yet the violence gripping the country continues to worsen.

This paradox raises fundamental questions about the wisdom and efficacy of our strategy, which is to "stand up" Iraqi security forces so we can "stand down" American forces. Put simply, this plan is a blueprint for withdrawal, not for victory. Improving the Iraqi Army and police is necessary to prevail in Iraq; it is not sufficient.

Counterinsurgency is more like an election than a military operation; the Iraqi government must convince the Iraqi people to choose it over the alternatives offered by Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish militants. To do so, the Iraqi government and the coalition must deliver public goods — security, public works, commerce, education and the rule of law, to name a few. The campaign must convince not just a majority or super-majority but virtually everyone, for as the noted insurgents T. E. Lawrence and Mao Zedong have noted, it takes the support of just 2 in 100 citizens to sustain an insurgency.

At this point, and with this strategy, it may not be possible to win in Iraq. America gained a spectacular victory in 2003, toppling the brutal Saddam Hussein regime. But there are limits to what military force can accomplish. You cannot plant democracy with a bayonet, nor can you force Iraqis to choose a particular path if their democracy is to mean anything at all.

Moreover, our choices in 2006 are not as good as our choices were in 2003; we cannot simply stay the course now and hope for victory. Given Iraq's historic antipathy to invaders and the strength of today's insurgency, I believe only a wholly unconventional approach will work. This means many more embedded advisers like myself, working in tandem with teams from the State Department and other agencies, supported by combat forces only when force is necessary.

We should strive in 2006 to build on our successes and to find a smarter way to shift the counterinsurgency effort to the Iraqis in order to secure an imperfect victory. For, as Lawrence wrote eight decades ago about helping the Arabs fight the Turks: "Better the Arabs do it tolerably than that you do it perfectly. It is their war, and you are to help them, not to win it for them."

Burden Of Proof (WP)

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

Two reporters charge the Bush administration with using fraudulent intelligence to start a war.

HUBRIS
The Inside Story of Spin, Scandal, and the Selling of the Iraq War
By Michael Isikoff and David Corn
Crown. 463 pp. $25.95

In October 2002, a file of documents from the U.S. embassy in Rome arrived on the desk of one of the State Department's senior nuclear proliferation analysts. The papers had been handed over by an Italian journalist, who had been given them by an informer who had, in turn, obtained them from a mysterious source in the embassy of Niger. The documents purported to show that Niger had signed a July 2000 deal to supply Iraq with 500 tons of yellowcake uranium -- about one-sixth of the African country's annual production and a key ingredient in a uranium-enrichment process that could provide Saddam Hussein's regime with a nuclear bomb.

As Simon Dodge of the State Department's intelligence bureau began to review the documents in Washington, he soon concluded that they were fakes. One of the papers described a secret meeting in Rome at which representatives of Iraq, Iran, Sudan, Libya and Pakistan formed a joint "plan of action" to defend themselves against the West in alliance with "Islamic patriots accused of belonging to criminal organizations." Dodge later told Senate investigators that he considered the claim "completely implausible," or, as Michael Isikoff and David Corn put it, "something out of James Bond -- or maybe Austin Powers." Niger embassy stamps, palpably fake, linked the "plan of action" document to those depicting the Iraq deal. The papers are a hoax, Dodge e-mailed colleagues.

This was not what most in the White House wanted to hear. By October 2002, when Dodge began examining the Niger documents, the Bush administration was already accelerating its drive for war against Iraq. An authoritative demolition of one of the most dramatic parts of that case -- that Baghdad was building a nuclear weapon -- was deeply unwelcome and, coming from the diplomats at the State Department, viewed with particular suspicion by Vice President Cheney's office. Partly by accident (the CIA merely put its copy of the "obviously forged" Rome papers in a vault and left them there) and partly because it simply did not want to know, the White House remained in denial about the unreliability of the whole Niger uranium story. Fatefully, the president would use the claim in his State of the Union address in January 2003. It was the principal basis for the administration's repeated rhetorical flourish that the Iraqi smoking gun might "come in the form of a mushroom cloud." And it was a phony.

The Niger claim provides the central thread in Hubris , Isikoff and Corn's exhaustive reconstruction of the formulation and selling of the Iraq War. For those who wish to understand how one of the most powerful officials in the land -- Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff, I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby -- came to be under indictment for obstruction of justice, perjury and making false statements arising out of the Niger story, this book is indispensable.

But Niger was not the only proffered justification for the attack on Iraq that eventually crumbled to dust in the light of day. So did the false claims of Iraqi defectors, such as the shadowy informant known as "Curveball," that Iraq possessed mobile biological laboratories, a claim that was a centerpiece of then-secretary of state Colin Powell's U.N. presentation in February 2003. So did the misguided conviction that Iraq's purchase of aluminum tubes was proof of a nuclear-arms program. So did the long-disproved claim that 9/11 hijacker Mohamed Atta met with Iraqi intelligence agents in Prague in April 2001, which became almost an article of faith for the administration's hawks.

There have been many books about the Iraq war, and there will be many others before we are through. This one, however, pulls together with unusually shocking clarity the multiple failures of process and statecraft that led so many people to persuade themselves that the evidence pointed to an active Iraqi program to develop weapons of mass destruction and that it was in the interests of the United States to overthrow Saddam Hussein.

This is seemingly an eternal theme. The deeper we are drawn into Isikoff and Corn's account, the more we enter March of Folly territory. When the late Barbara W. Tuchman published her masterly 1984 account of the ruinous policies that governments have pursued through the ages, she ranged across a canvas stretching from the Trojan war to Vietnam.

To qualify as folly, Tuchman wrote, a policy must meet three criteria: It must have been seen at the time as counterproductive; a feasible alternative course of action must have been available; and the policy must have been that of a group of people, not merely a single tyrant or ruler. If ever a policy qualifies on all counts, it was the U.S.-imposed regime change in Iraq. Isikoff and Corn are reporters (for Newsweek and the Nation, respectively), not historians, but they still compel the reader to confront a further, essential dimension of folly's march. In each case -- the Niger uranium papers, the mobile labs, the aluminum tubes, the Atta-Iraq link -- there were people up and down the policy chain, including some at the very top, who either knew at the time or should have known that the claims were false or unreliable.

Many critics of the Iraq War have highlighted the ideological drive behind the invasion. Fewer have grappled with the more complex question of why it was impossible for skeptics, doubters and more scrupulous analysts to stop it. Isikoff and Corn enable us to understand better how this devastating policy tragedy played out. But as Coleridge once observed, the light of experience is but a lantern on the stern, illuminating only the waters through which we have passed. Sadly, Isikoff and Corn can't tell the next generation how to avoid such tragedies. Â·

Loyal To A Fault (WP)

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

Did a charismatic secretary of state serve the country and the president well on Iraq?

SOLDIER

The Life of Colin Powell

By Karen DeYoung

Knopf. 610 pp. $28.95

The subject of Karen DeYoung's new biography doesn't quite attain the stature that his many admirers might wish for him: that of a tragic hero. The Colin Powell portrayed in Soldier comes across as a disciplined and talented beneficiary of genuine equal opportunity, an inspiring leader of bureaucracies, "the world's best staff officer," a cool operator in Washington's political wars, an uncommonly decent man, a stellar product of great American institutions. But when those institutions failed -- when the Bush administration took the country to war in Iraq, rashly and under false pretexts -- Powell did not have the imagination to challenge or, finally, defy the system that had made him.

DeYoung, an associate editor at The Washington Post, had Powell's cooperation in the form of six extended interviews, but as she notes at the end of the book, they covered only the most recent ground -- the years since Powell told his own story in his 1995 memoir, My American Journey . For this reason, and because a man of Powell's supreme self-control is even more opaque than most public figures, her march through his early years and his rise through the ranks of the Army has a dutiful feel -- a blur of promotions and Powell family relocations without any strong sense of his inner life. In spite of DeYoung's reportorial talents and sympathetic understanding of her subject, the first half of Soldier should have been greatly compressed; Powell's career is simply not important or interesting enough for a full-dress biographical monument. (Would anyone want to read 500 pages about Brent Scowcroft?)

DeYoung might have done better to limit herself to Powell's years as secretary of state. She imbues this story with narrative tension and a steady accumulation of detail that shows exactly how he allowed himself to be used, mastered and then cast aside by his antagonists in the administration, above all by his longtime colleague Dick Cheney, now the vice president. It illustrates what critics, including Powell's former chief of staff Lawrence B. Wilkerson, have described as broken policymaking, with disagreements turning poisonously personal and key decisions, such as the jettisoning of the Kyoto accords or even the historic decision to invade Iraq, made without the knowledge of leading officials, usually Powell himself.

Powell had the devotion of those below him, and his instinct for the right word and gesture was never surer than on Sept. 11, 2001, when, marooned in Lima, Peru, at a meeting of the Organization of American States, he insisted on staying long enough to cast the American vote in favor of a document called the Democratic Charter. "He knew from the start that what we needed were friends," his spokesman Richard Boucher told DeYoung. "We didn't know who did it, we didn't know why. But we needed democratic friends -- that was the only way, whatever this was, that we were going to beat it."

It was the thinking of a moderate Republican member of the internationalist foreign policy establishment -- one of the last. It was not the thinking of the president and his most influential advisers, especially the vice president and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, who were more intellectually aggressive than Powell and far more ruthless in undermining their chief antagonist. In DeYoung's account, Powell believed for a long time that he was winning more than his share of interagency battles, partly because his meteoric rise through a system that operated in an essentially rational way had been almost untroubled. "But past experience was turning out to be a poor guide to the new reality," DeYoung writes, "and Powell was slow to grasp the extent of his -- and the State Department's -- isolation within Bush's national security team."

As the administration moved with blind self-confidence toward war in Iraq, Powell slowly became part of the machinery that he thought he was helping to brake. The process by which he began to accept the White House's terms of the argument makes for the best pages of Soldier , a fascinating study in bureaucratic maneuvering, groupthink and subtle self-deception. Powell's tactical successes obscured his larger strategic defeat: Once he persuaded the president to take his case against Iraq to the United Nations in September 2002, DeYoung writes, "Powell quickly moved to protect his right flank by establishing his bona fides inside the administration as a believer in the Iraqi threat and a firm supporter -- should diplomacy and international pressure fail -- of the use of force. Almost overnight, his carefully couched assessments of the state of Saddam's weapons programs were transformed into certainty." This change led directly to the moment for which Powell himself has said he will always be remembered: his dramatic speech to the U.N. Security Council on Feb. 5, 2003, vouching for the existence of weapons of mass destruction in Iraq, later shown to be almost completely wrong. After that, the war was inevitable, as was the historical verdict on Powell's tenure in office.

His entire career had prepared him to be a first-rate secretary of state in a functional administration, and if he had had the good luck to serve under a better president, he might be remembered in the company of one of his heroes, George C. Marshall, another former general who became secretary of state, for Harry S. Truman. But as George W. Bush's principal cabinet officer, Powell was condemned by his own limitations. He took comfort in Marshall's reply to critics who thought that he should have resigned over his disagreement with President Truman's decision to recognize the newly created state of Israel in 1948. "No, gentlemen," Marshall is said to have replied, "you don't take a post of this sort and then resign when the man who has the constitutional responsibility to make decisions makes one you don't like." To Powell, Marshall had "done his job. He had given the President his best advice. He had presented it strongly . . . [and] used every, every opportunity to press his case."

It is easy to understand why this story inspired Powell. But there is a crucial difference. Powell never told Bush not to invade Iraq; out of a lifelong sense of propriety and restraint, he kept his best advice to himself. In 2003, the country needed someone more than the world's best staff officer. Â·

October 15, 2006 -- WE WERE ONE: SHOULDER TO SHOULDER WITH THE MARINES WHO TOOK FALLUJAH

BY PATRICK K. O'DONNELL

DE CAPO PRESS, 288 PAGES, $25

WITH unprecedented initiative Patrick K. O'Donnell volunteered to live and fight alongside American soldiers and Marines in Iraq in order to construct a real-time, eyewitness history of the fighting. He spent months in battle with the troops, mostly with a platoon from the 3/1 Marines. After every combat action, he spent countless hours debriefing them.

DOJ_NMG_0081692

O'Donnell's book focuses on the Second Battle of Fallujah. In part as commemoration, "We Were One" is scheduled to be released in the days preceding the two-year anniversary of that battle (Nov. 9), the Marine Corps birthday and Veterans Day. But the author's most important accomplishment among many is to put a human face on the troops who are fighting against some of the fiercest enemies America has ever encountered.

We meet the Marines who will make this attack. They are all volunteers, of course, several coming back for multiple combat deployments. These are no "dumb grunts," though they bear the title with pride. Prior to deployment, they train constantly, study "a three-foot high" stack of books and manuals and even learn Arabic. Their loyalty is primarily to each other; to the friends they have come to rely on for their lives. The bonding experience of combat can be a tired cliché for readers, but O'Donnell captures it without cheapening it.

O'Donnell shows the strength of these personal relationships as men lie wounded and dead in filthy Grenade Alley, where the mujahedeen tossed so many hand grenades that most of a 12-man squad was wounded. In Fallujah, the platoon learned that survival depended entirely on the mutual loyalty and support they gave one another - and the whimsy of the gods of war.

Kicking in the doors of as many as 100 stone houses, the men found enemy fighters wired to the gills with a narcotic cocktail of adrenaline, cocaine and amphetamines and learned too well the lesson of the randomness of combat. A Marine moves slightly and the wall where he stood is raked with machine gun fire, while others are killed or wounded by similar twists of fate.

O'Donnell paints a picture of intense bravery. The dehydrated, exhausted platoon maintains focus on their objective of keeping each other alive and killing or capturing the enemy.

These Marines knowingly walked in the shoes of their grandfathers in the Pacific war, and their fathers in Vietnam. They proudly referred to the Battle of Hue City and the conquest of Iwo Jima as part of the long heritage that they would join when they won the Battle of Fallujah. And they won resoundingly, despite ferocious odds.

Most of those who survived and remained in the Marine Corps were "serving on the Iraqi-Syrian border" as the book was completed. By now they may have rotated home and then back yet again into the fray.

Read O'Donnell's excellent book and you will know that they are indeed, as were each preceding generation, "The Greatest."

WAR MACHINES (NYPOST)

By Ralph Peters

The New York Post, October 15, 2006

October 15, 2006 -- WAR MADE NEW: TECHNOLOGY, WARFARE AND THE COURSE OF HISTORY, 1500 TO TODAY

BY MAX BOOT

GOTHAM BOOKS, 624 PAGES, $35

A BOOK'S got to be pretty damned good to be worth $35. And "War Made New" is worth every penny. It's not only a terrific read; it's a cheap education on how, for half a millennium, machines made war and war made machines. The research is impressive, the judgments are sound - and Max Boot's a strong, clear writer.

Taking the "Blitzkrieg of 1494" as his line of departure, he explains why a nearly forgotten French invasion of the Italian peninsula arguably created modern war. He then takes the reader through a vivid account of the Spanish Armada's decomposition, the innovative tactics of Gustavus Adolphus - and one paradigm-shattering campaign after another, right down to Operation Iraqi Freedom. Boot concludes with an eye-opening discussion of future military technologies.

The author sets up great battles as suspense stories, and you'll want to know what happens next. This is grand history, moving from the collapse of the Marathas in India to Pearl Harbor and the Battle of Midway. I knew the outcomes, but I still read anxiously. Boot's purpose is serious - to educate readers about the fateful relationship between technological change and warfare - but he makes the lessons enjoyable.

It's not enough to possess the best gear. In 1940, the French had more and better equipment than the German army. But the Germans saw how to marry massed tanks and tactical radios to stun a slow-thinking opponent. In the War on Terror, our enemies brilliantly used our own technologies against us - cellphones, the Internet, airliners. It's not just what you've got, but how innovatively you use it.

You've still got to back the right weapons, though: Boot argues that the British lost their eastern empire because they failed to see that aircraft carriers had superceded battleships. You've got to choose the right stuff and use it more effectively than your enemy.

For all the discussion of technology - ever clear, always sensible - Boot never loses sight of the supremacy of the human being. After a riveting discussion of robotics, nanotechnology and what the Soviets used to call "weapons based on new physical principles," he concludes that nothing will match the flesh-and-blood soldier's situational awareness for many years to come.

My quibbles are minor: An active journalist, Boot is reluctant to burn bridges to establishment figures. Despite his fateful errors in Iraq, Donald Rumsfeld slips from the author's hands like a cobra covered in K-Y Jelly, eluding criticism. And Boot falls for the armchair general's "tooth-to-tail ratio" complaint that our military includes too many support troops. Well, there are a lot more "support troops" in a civilian hospital today than 50 years ago. As organizational complexity increases, staff requirements grow. And you'd better have somebody trained and ready when the precision weapon needs to be programmed.

But these criticisms are trivial compared to the ambitious scope - and success - of "War Made New." This is a book for both the general reader and reading generals.

Ralph Peters' latest book is "Never Quit the Fight."

DOJ:

Interim U.S. Attorney Settles In To The Job (NCP)

By Jared Allen

Nashville City Paper, October 15, 2006

Just before he left office, Jim Vines, who recently stepped down as Nashville's U.S. Attorney, said one of his greatest accomplishments was building up the Nashville office to a point where it could handle another Tennessee Waltz-type investigation.

"Even though it centered around the legislature, it had to be handled out of the Memphis office," Vines said last month in an interview with The City Paper, explaining that when the investigation into corruption at the Capitol began, the Nashville office was simply not up to the task of leading it.

"But if we were to have another ethics scandal, we could do it here now," Vines said.

So it seems fitting that after Vines' exit, the man selected to replace him – at least in the interim – is credited with cleaning up what was formerly the single most corrupt city is the United States: Youngstown, Ohio.

Youngstown is the hometown of former U.S. Rep James Traficant, who was indicted on federal corruption charges in 2002 and sentenced to eight years in prison.

For decades, most of Youngstown's local leaders were controlled by mafia bosses, who routinely blew up one another with car bombs.

That was until a U.S. attorney named Craig S. Morford arrived in Cleveland.

Over a period of five years, Morford investigated, prosecuted and convicted 70 individuals, including mob bosses, the county sheriff, county prosecutor, a nearby police chief, four judges and 10 attorneys.

Two weeks ago, the U.S. Department of Justice named Morford to head up the Nashville U.S. Attorney's Office.

The appointment is temporary for now – Morford's family is staying in Cleveland for the time being – but the career prosecutor, armed with decades of experience in high-profile cases, is already diving into his job in Nashville.

And he is prepared to lead the office in whatever direction it needs to go.

"I've dedicated much of my career to fighting corruption," Morford said. "My belief is that the system is only as good as the people who run it, and when we give people a public servant position, we put our trust to those people. And they need to step up and live up to that trust. And if they don't, it's our job to come in and do something about it."

But Morford, who is also best known for investigating a Detroit U.S. attorney's terrorism investigation gone awry, and one that ultimately led to an admission by the Justice Department that it withheld sharing evidence with defense attorneys, does not see himself as a reformer.

"I don't come in here as a fixer," Morford said. "I'm here because I got a call. I was asked to serve in this way and I've always been one that's tried to answer the call. That's why I went to Detroit."

Morford also believes his main job is to hold down the well-built fort left by Vines.

"I've quickly assessed that there's a tremendous foundation that's been built by Jim, the people he brought in and the people who were already here," Morford said. "I view my job is maintaining that foundation, preserving that foundation and building upon that foundation."

In terms of building, Morford said his priorities include investigating and prosecuting cases of terrorism, health care fraud and violent crime.

He also stressed his work in Cleveland breaking up a entrenched but non-traditional culture of gangs and gang violence.

DOJ_NMG_0081694

"Cleveland is much like Nashville. We don't have the large presence of national gangs – the Bloods, Crips and those types of things – but we have street corner gangs, that are extremely violent and involved in heavy crack dealing, Morford said.

"And for the family who lost their 8-year-old son on the way to the neighborhood recreation center, they don't much care that the guy who shot him calls himself a 'Dirty 30' because he lives on 30th Street, as opposed to a Blood or a Crip."

Morford will likely receive a warm welcome from the Metro Police Department, which in May launched a major initiative to combat Nashville gangs, which are likewise largely unorganized but still violent.

"We are looking forward to a continuation of the strong working relationship with the U.S. Attorney's Office on gang, gun and other issues," said Don Aaron, Police Department spokesman.

Morford is scheduled to meet with Metro Police Chief Serpas this week, and assessing the current gang problem and the police response to it will be on the top of the agenda, the U.S. Attorney said.

"The biggest problem you have in solving gang crime is getting good, solid intelligence so you can really get your hands around what the problem is," Morford said, discussing his work in Cleveland. "And there is a significant role for our office to play."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Finance Jobs Tarnished By Options Cases Legacy Of Scandals Could Linger, Threatening Guilt By Association (SFC)

By Carolyn Said, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, October 15, 2006

Headhunter Larry Ormsby was seeking a new chief financial officer for a Silicon Valley company recently. Then news cropped up that one of his candidates had big black mark on his resume: The company where he had previously been CFO was implicated in the stock options backdating scandal now grabbing headlines.

"That was enough for us to say, 'Let's not pursue this person,' " said Ormsby, senior client partner at Korn/Ferry International in San Francisco specializing in CFO and other senior finance positions. "Clients aren't comfortable making a hire when there is some gray area of uncertainty about what happened" at a candidate's previous jobs.

People caught up in probes over improper backdating of stock options may have bigger worries than their next job. But recruitment experts and others say the scandal may tarnish the careers of those in decision-making positions at the companies being investigated, regardless of whether they are ever charged with a crime.

"Of course it will be an issue" for job seekers, said John Challenger, chief executive officer of Challenger Grey & Christmas, a global outplacing firm in Chicago. "At an executive level, the company or the search firm will look through each of the jobs a candidate has had to understand if there was something that happened that might be problematic for the new company."

About 125 companies, nearly a quarter of them in Silicon Valley, are facing probes over whether they improperly granted stock options that were retroactively linked to dates when their stock price was low, thus giving recipients a leg up on potential profits. Such backdating is illegal unless it is disclosed and accounted for properly -- something that many companies evidently failed to do.

Investigators from the Securities and Exchange Commission, Justice Department and the companies themselves are sifting through documents to try to figure out who did what when.

About 30 executives and board members have gotten the ax over their involvement in backdating, but experts expect the toll to rise as companies finalize investigations of themselves. Only two cases so far have resulted in criminal charges being filed.

"If companies want to get credit (with the SEC and Justice Department) for their cooperation by showing they found a problem and have done everything possible to eliminate it going forward, one thing they will want to say is that people associated with the problem are no longer here," said Jim Sanders, a Los Angeles attorney specializing in white-collar defense and a former SEC regional administrator and federal prosecutor. "I've been in situations where (SEC officials) say, 'How can you say you fully cooperated and cleaned house when Joe Blow is still working there?' "

But even people who don't get the heave-ho could be tarred by their association with the scandal -- assuming they were somewhere in the chain of command that oversaw finances.

"I think it will impact the candidacy of people looking for jobs if they themselves were part of the cabal of inner circle people who were likely to have been the manipulators," said Mark Jaffe, president of executive-search firm Wyatt and Jaffe in Minneapolis. "If you were the chief corporate counsel, the CFO, the treasurer, the chief operating officer or the CEO, you're likely to get some splatter on you, and with good reason. If you were the chief marketing officer or the (chief technology officer), it could be you were in the Bahamas that week."

Rick Beal, managing consultant for the San Francisco office of search firm Watson Wyatt Worldwide, said he thinks people from affected companies could rise above their involvement if they can make a good case for themselves.

"If they came away with a lot of real positive learning experiences out of it, they understand and can articulate how things went wrong and why, and they hold themselves personally accountable for it, that speaks volumes about them," Beal said. "If someone says, 'I stepped down because I had to and it wasn't really my fault' and points the finger elsewhere, that tells you something, too."

In any case, he said, search firms themselves may help candidates clean up their reputations.

"Headhunters shopping these folks are going to spin it as strongly as they possibly can," Beal said. "They'll say, 'I've got a great candidate who got caught up in this stuff, but he's a really good guy.' "

Ormsby of Korn/Ferry said he feels obligated to do much more thorough background checks on job candidates in the post-Enron world.

"We used to check education, criminal, employment -- more basic checks," he said. "For the past five years, we've been much more aggressive on every CFO assignment to make sure we look for SEC investigations that have happened, look for civil as well as criminal background checks." In addition, he makes many more reference calls, Ormsby said.

Sanders, the former SEC administrator, said there is an added complication for people who left companies under investigation.

"The real issue for them is if the facts were significant enough that a corporation felt a resignation was appropriate, that is clearly in my view going to draw the attention of the SEC," he said. "The SEC has the power to bar someone from being an officer or director of a publicly held corporation. From the prospective new employer's standpoint, I can only guess that ... a candidate who might be the subject of an SEC enforcement action" would be undesirable.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Displease A Lobbyist, Get Fired (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

E-mails show Jack Abramoff's ability to influence White House staffing decisions through his highly placed friends.

WASHINGTON — For five years, Allen Stayman wondered who ordered his removal from a State Department job negotiating agreements with tiny Pacific island nations — even when his own bosses wanted him to stay.

Now he knows.

Newly disclosed e-mails suggest that the ax fell after intervention by one of the highest officials at the White House: Ken Mehlman, on behalf of one of the most influential lobbyists in town, Jack Abramoff.

The e-mails show that Abramoff, whose client list included the Northern Mariana Islands, had long opposed Stayman's work advocating labor changes in that U.S. commonwealth, and considered what his lobbying team called the "Stayman project" a high priority.

"Mehlman said he would get him fired," an Abramoff associate wrote after meeting with Mehlman, who was then White House political director.

The exchange illustrates how, more than two years after the corruption scandal surrounding the now-disgraced Abramoff came to light, people are still learning the extent of the lobbyist's ability to pull the levers of power in Washington. The latest revelations provide more detail than the Bush administration has acknowledged about how Abramoff and his team reached into high levels of the White House, not just Capitol Hill, which has been the main focus of the influence-peddling investigation.

The e-mails, disclosed as part of a report by the House Government Reform Committee, show how Abramoff manipulated the system through officials such as Mehlman, now the chairman of the Republican National Committee. Doing so, Abramoff directed government appointments, influenced policy decisions and won White House endorsements for political candidates — all in the service of his clients.

The report found more than 400 lobbying contacts between Abramoff's team and the White House.

Besides the Stayman matter, the e-mails reveal Mehlman's role in helping an Abramoff client, the Mississippi Band of Choctaw Indians, secure $16.3 million for a new jail that government analysts concluded was not necessary. Mehlman also helped Abramoff obtain a White House endorsement in 2002 of the Republican gubernatorial ticket in the U.S. territory of Guam.

Abramoff pleaded guilty in January to federal charges in a congressional bribery investigation that continues to loom over Capitol Hill and the GOP. A Senate subcommittee concluded that Abramoff fleeced Indian tribes out of millions of dollars in fees that he split with one of his associates.

The scandal has touched just one West Wing staffer, Susan Ralston, a onetime Abramoff aide who resigned this month as executive assistant to strategist Karl Rove after congressional investigators documented frequent contact with the lobbyist's team.

Mehlman said he did not recall the details of his contacts with the Abramoff team, including discussions about Stayman, the former State Department official. But he said such interactions were part of his job as White House political director.

"I was a gateway," Mehlman said in an interview. "It was my job to talk to political supporters, to hear their requests, and hand them on to policymakers."

Mehlman said he had known Abramoff since the mid-1990s and would listen to his requests along with those of other influential Republicans.

"I know Jack," Mehlman said. "I certainly recall that if he and others wanted to meet I would have met with them, as I would have met with lots of people."

Mehlman, a Baltimore native and graduate of Harvard Law School, has remained a GOP power player since stepping down as political director in 2003. He built the party's grass-roots get-out-the-vote strategy, managing President Bush's 2004 reelection campaign before taking over the RNC last year.

Democrats charge that Mehlman may have acted unethically during his time at the White House, lobbying for government actions at Abramoff's behest, even when policy experts disagreed with the decision.

The senior Democrat on the House Government Reform Committee, Rep. Henry A. Waxman of Los Angeles, points to e-mails suggesting that in June 2001, amid negotiations over whether to fire Stayman, Mehlman requested and might have been given two U2 concert tickets in Abramoff's suite at what was then the MCI Center (now the Verizon Center).

Ethics rules prohibit officials from accepting gifts worth more than $20 from a person doing business with the government, although there are exceptions. Ethics officials typically consider such suite tickets to be worth the same as the event's most expensive tickets, which in this case was $133 apiece, according to Waxman's office.

"Please tell me we can fit two more in for Friday," lobbyist and Kevin Ring wrote to Abramoff, his partner. "Ken Mehlman of the White House apparently wants to go." On the day before the concert, Ring wrote to Abramoff that a resume for a Stayman replacement had been "sent to our conduit."

Referring in the same e-mail to an unrelated Labor Department appointment, Ring said he "will talk to Mehlman at the concert tomorrow night."

A former Abramoff associate remembers Mehlman attending the concert. Mehlman said he did not recall it. "I've been to several U2 concerts, but I don't know whether I went to that one," he said. "But I can tell you that as political director I was always very careful to make sure everything I did was above board and consistent with the rules."

Waxman said the e-mails suggested Mehlman may have "violated fundamental ethics regulations and the law."

"There are serious questions that Mr. Mehlman needs to address with candor and that Congress should investigate thoroughly," Waxman said.

The e-mails disclosed in the House report showed that Mehlman was involved in a variety of matters of interest to Abramoff, one of which bore fruit for the lobbyist after he discussed delivering campaign contributions to GOP causes.

Tony Rudy, a onetime aide to former Rep. Tom DeLay (R-Texas), referred to Mehlman on Nov. 9, 2001, as a "rock star" after Mehlman agreed to "take care of" the Choctaws' jail, despite a Justice Department finding that the tribe's existing jail was adequate.

Several days after that meeting, on Nov. 13, Rudy recommended a $15,000 contribution to the Republican National Committee. "Let's give the check to Ken Mehlman at the White House," wrote Rudy, who later pleaded guilty to conspiracy charges in the broader investigation.

On Nov. 15, campaign finance records show, the tribe gave $10,000 to the RNC. Overall, the tribe gave $120,000 in the 2002 election cycle to Republican committees and $95,000 to Democratic committees, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

Two weeks after the RNC received its check, Susan Butler, chief of staff to U.S. Rep. Charles W. "Chip" Pickering, a Mississippi Republican whose district includes the Choctaws, e-mailed Rudy to say that she had discussed the issue with Mehlman and others and that "they were very positive and promised to work with us on it."

When Justice Department officials relented and released the money for the jail, giddy Abramoff associates planned to host agency officials in a suite at a Dave Matthews concert.

DOJ_NMG_0081697

"I have the suite filling up with DOJ staffers who just got our client $16 million," one wrote. Another replied that the agency officials deserve any reward they want, "opening day tickets, Skins v. Giants, oriental massages, hookers, whatever."

Mehlman, meanwhile, also helped Abramoff with another client, Guam, the e-mails show.

On Oct. 9, 2002, Abramoff asked Mehlman to secure a White House endorsement for the island's GOP gubernatorial ticket.

Three weeks later, Abramoff received a note from Ralston, then Rove's assistant, saying that Mehlman had gotten a quote from the White House for "your Guam candidates." She also asked Abramoff to send his requests in the future to "Ken only."

For Stayman, learning more about how Abramoff used White House connections helped him understand why, five years ago, he found himself looking at a career change.

His job was up for renewal, but his State Department supervisors wanted to keep him on to finish a project that was expected to take more time.

"With only about a year left on my appointment, I didn't think it would trigger any interest from the White House," Stayman said. "I assumed that Abramoff was behind it, but I didn't know the details, who called whom and how much effort it took."

Unbeknownst to Stayman, though, within weeks of Bush taking office, the "Stayman project" was in full swing.

State Department officials resisted the dismissal, and negotiations dragged on for months. In May 2001, one of Mehlman's deputies assured Abramoff's team that, "Obviously, this guy cannot stay."

That July 9, Ralston e-mailed Abramoff with news of a deal on Stayman: "He'll be out in four months."

And he was.

Weldon Faces Probe On Daughter's Deals (AP-Y)

By Kimberly Hefling And Lara Jakes Jordan, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 15, 2006

The FBI is investigating whether Rep. Curt Weldon, R-Pa., used his influence to secure lobbying and consulting contracts for his daughter, two people familiar with the inquiry said Saturday.

The inquiry focuses on lobbying contracts worth $1 million that Weldon's daughter, Karen Weldon, obtained from foreign clients and whether they were assisted by the congressman, they said. They spoke on condition of anonymity because of the confidentiality of the criminal investigation.

Weldon, a 10-term Republican from the Philadelphia suburbs, long has denied any wrongdoing, and his top aide said Saturday no one had notified him of an investigation.

"I think if there was an investigation, somebody would have contacted us," said Russ Caso, Weldon's chief of staff.

Caso said Weldon and his staff were "100 percent caught off guard" when they learned of the investigation, first reported late Friday by McClatchy Newspapers. This account cited two individuals with specific knowledge of the existence of the investigation; they declined to be identified because of the confidentiality of criminal investigations.

Caso, whose boss is in a tight race for re-election on Nov. 7 against Democrat Joe Sestak, tried to cast doubt on reports of the investigation. "Unidentified sources mean nothing," Caso said. "There's no substance in that story. It's a flimsy story."

Two people familiar with the investigation told the AP on Saturday that the inquiry was being handled by agents from the FBI's field offices in Washington and Philadelphia and was being coordinated by the Justice Department's Public Integrity Section. Spokesmen for the Justice Department and the FBI declined comment Saturday.

Those two people familiar with the investigation confirmed that federal agents were examining Weldon's work between 2002 and 2004 to help two Russian companies and two Serbian brothers connected to former Yugoslav President Slobodan Milosevic. They had hired Solutions North America Inc., a company operated by Karen Weldon and Charles Sexton, a Republican ally of the congressman.

Weldon, vice chairman of the House Armed Services committee, is a Russian speaker regarded by some as a foreign policy expert who has clashed at times with the Bush administration.

Over the last few days, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has mailed fliers to voters in Weldon's district accusing Karen Weldon of getting help from her father on lobbying projects.

Michael Puppio, Weldon's campaign manager, questioned the timing of the mailing and published reports about the investigation. He accused Democrats of "attempting to smear the congressman and his entire family" in the final weeks of the campaign.

Jen Psaki, a spokeswoman for the DCCC, said it's "bizarre, paranoid and absurd" for the Weldon campaign to imply there's a link in the timing of the mailing and the published reports.

The Weldon investigation comes at a critical time for Republicans who are fighting to maintain a majority in the House of Representatives in a midst of scandals.

On Friday, Rep. Bob Ney, R-Ohio, pleaded guilty in the Jack Abramoff lobbying scandal, which has touched on federal lawmakers, former aides and members of the Bush administration.

At the same time, an inquiry is under way on Capitol Hill into whether Republican House leaders or their top aides covered up questionable behavior of former Rep. Mark Foley toward teenage males who worked as House pages.

Web Gambling Sites Keep Advertising, Despite Crackdown (AP)

By David B. Caruso, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 15, 2006

NEW YORK -- Despite repeated warnings from law enforcement officials, offshore Internet gambling companies have continued to advertise heavily in the United States.

Giant billboards in Manhattan, some several stories high, brazenly advertise Internet gambling sites like Sportsbook.com, now based in Antigua.

Promotions for BetUS, a Canadian and Costa Rican company that takes wagers on American sports, run regularly on the Howard Stern Show on Sirius Satellite Radio. Fantasy football magazines on sale at newsstands are packed with ads for online bookies and casinos.

The advertisements _ which the companies insist are legal _ have helped attract millions of customers to online gambling, and may have left the impression that both the ads and online wagering are legal.

They are not, said Paul Larrabee, a spokesman for New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer.

"Gaming and bookmaking are not legal in New York, so anyone who markets to a New Yorker may be in violation of New York state law," Larrabee said. "We have done case after case after case involving instances where an act that is illegal in New York is marketed to New Yorkers."

Actual prosecutions of advertisers for promoting gambling are rare, however, and media companies accepting the ads insist they are breaking no law.

That position sometimes hangs on a looser interpretation of gambling laws.

ESPN, for example, runs ads for online poker sites during its broadcasts of the Word Series of Poker, but says it does so only for Web pages that don't actually process bets.

"We only accept advertising for educational, learn-to-play, for-free sites," said ESPN spokeswoman Keri Potts.

Many of these so-called "educational" sites, however, are simply companion pages to full-fledged gambling operations, easily reachable with a few mouse clicks or by changing the last few characters of a Web address from ".net" to ".com."

Potts said it wasn't up to ESPN to investigate those affiliations.

"Is it really for us to be regulating how they operate their businesses?" she said.

The Justice Department has taken a different view. In 2003 it warned that publishers and broadcasters who advertise gambling sites could be prosecuted for aiding and abetting a crime.

A year later, federal authorities pressured the parent company of the Discovery Channel into forfeiting $6 million in advertising money that had come from online poker sites.

A similar arrangement was reached in January with the Sporting News, which agreed to pay a $4.2 million fine and run $3 million worth of public service announcements to resolve claims that it ran ads promoting illegal Internet gambling.

Despite those settlements, Internet gambling lawyer Lawrence G. Walters said there is uncertainty over whether running advertisements for an offshore gambling concern is illegal.

"They scare these people to death and tell them they are going to prosecute them criminally if they don't cooperate ... but I'm looking forward to the day that someone decides to fight this," he said.

The situation was muddied further on Friday when President Bush signed legislation aimed at prohibiting the credit card and electronic fund transactions U.S. players often use to settle online wagers.

Some foreign online gambling outfits said immediately after the legislation was signed that they would stop doing business with American customers.

"The real question is, 'Are any of the online gambling Web sites going to bother advertising anymore?" given the change in U.S. law, Walters said.

Sportingbet PLC, a British Internet gambling company that had hung billboards throughout Manhattan bearing the image of actress Nikki Cox and the slogan "Everybody Bets," sold its site Sportsbook.com to a company in Antigua on Friday for $1.

The action came just weeks after the company's chairman was arrested at a New York airport after customs officials discovered he was wanted on online gambling charges in Louisiana.

New York Gov. George Pataki ultimately decided that state law didn't allow the executive to be extradited and he was allowed to fly home to London.

Spokesmen for several online gambling services declined to be interviewed about their advertising campaigns, but maintained that their offshore services are either legal or beyond the reach of U.S. law.

That argument was rejected by Christopher P. Blank, executive assistant district attorney for the Brooklyn DA's rackets division.

"If you're sitting in Costa Rica with your staff, and you're accepting bets from New York, you're gambling in New York," he said.

Controls On Web Data Lacking (AP)

AP, October 15, 2006

NEW YORK — If you don't like what your favorite Internet search engine or e-commerce site does with information it collects about you, your options are limited to living with it or logging off.

Major search engines, for instance, all keep records of your searches for weeks, months or even years, often tied to your computer's Internet address or more. Retailers, meanwhile, generally presume the right to send marketing e-mails.

Although online companies have become better at disclosing data practices, privacy advocates say the services' stated policies generally don't give consumers real choice.

"None of them have gotten to the point of giving a lot of controls in users' hands," said Ari Schwartz, deputy director of the technology watchdog group Center for Democracy and Technology. Privacy policies "are about notice ... not about control."

Recent developments - from companies losing laptops containing sensitive data to Time Warner Inc.'s AOL releasing customers' search terms - have again turned the spotlight on Internet privacy.

But the push for stronger federal protections is countered by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales' desire to require Internet providers preserve customer records to help prosecutors fight child pornography. Officials have released few details, though they say any proposal would keep the data in company hands until the government seeks a subpoena or other lawful process.

Federal law already limits how personal financial and health care data may be used, but U.S. privacy laws are generally considered weak compared with Europe and Canada.

Industry groups have stepped in with guidelines that go beyond legal requirements.

One group, Truste, requires member companies such as AOL and Yahoo Inc. give consumers a way to decline sharing personally identifiable information with outside parties. Companies also must disclose any use of tracking technology and specify personal information collected and how it is used.

"The fact that we don't license every person on the Internet gives consumers (the ability) to shop around," said John Tomaszewski, Truste's vice president for legal, policy and compliance. "We've got folks out there engaging in a higher standard than what is normally required."

Some companies go even further.

E-Loan Inc. customers worried about safeguards when datas get outsourced to India can choose to have loan applications processed domestically, though loans in such cases would take two additional days to close.

Mark Lefanowicz, E-Loan's president, said about 80 percent of customers have agreed to outsourcing, and he said choice pre-empted any backlash.

"They have the right to deal with us under their terms," he said. "If we just disclosed we used an overseas provider, for a lot of customers it's irritating to them."

Comcast Corp., meanwhile, gives customers a range of options on how long its servers keep e-mail, while a small search engine called Ixquick promises to purge data within 48 hours.

In other cases, companies have responded to backlash from customers. When Facebook recently allowed easier tracking of changes their friends make to personal profile pages, users threatened boycotts and forced the company to apologize and offer more privacy controls.

But such cases are rare. Consumers generally haven't demanded better privacy options the way they shop around for better prices or ease of use, said Carl Malamud, senior fellow at Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank.

"As a consumer I don't choose based on practices for privacy," he said. "I choose based on functionality."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

S.F. Police-conduct Plan Behind Schedule (SFC)

By Susan Sward, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, October 15, 2006

Eight months after Mayor Gavin Newsom vowed to ride "roughshod" over the Police Department to ensure adoption of a computerized system to track officers' use of force and other conduct, the plan has yet to be submitted to the Police Commission for a vote.

In a February interview, after The Chronicle reported on use of force by San Francisco officers, Newsom said he wanted such a system adopted by the end of the year and added the move was "in the best interest of the department in terms of public confidence and a kind of respect we are hoping to build again ..."

Since then, negotiations over the system's details have not led to a formal agreement by the participants, which include the department, the American Civil Liberties Union and the Police Officers Association.

The proposal, which involves complex technology, has yet to be put out to bid, and the department -- rather than talking about having the system in place by year's end as the mayor pledged -- is now saying it plans to have a pilot program operating before the year is over.

Deputy Police Chief Charles Keohane said the proposed tracking system will soon be presented to the department's command staff and then will be forwarded to the Police Officers Association, which has "meet and confer" rights on any such change.

"The Police Department has been saying it has been working tirelessly on this system for years, but so far it hasn't happened," said Commissioner Joe Veronese. "I'd like to see it materialize into an effective policy soon."

Deputy Chief Keohane said the department is moving "at light speed" -- far faster than some other departments attempting to build similar tracking systems -- and he added he hoped the complete system could be up and running by March.

He added the department is drafting the proposal to put the system out to bid and plans to present the proposed system to the Police Commission soon. In previous meetings, commissioners have voiced strong support for this sort of the system, which was first advocated three years ago by critics, including the city controller's office.

Newsom said in an interview he was "pleased with the progress that has been made and that we will have a pilot by the end of the year. We are within 90 days of an expectation of something that usually takes three to five years in other cities. While all of us would like to have seen it yesterday, one deals with the reality of process in San Francisco on anything that deals with technology."

Mark Schlosberg, police practices policy director for the ACLU's Northern California branch, said he has been meeting with the department on the tracking system's details and "we're very close."

The position of the officers' union on the new regulation that will define the tracking system is not known. Keohane said, "The negotiations with the POA are down to the nitty-gritty, and hopefully, all the differences will be ironed out."

A series of articles in The Chronicle in February reported that about 100 San Francisco officers were responsible for a quarter of the incidents of force logged by the 2,100-officer department from 1996-2004, and that in recent years San Francisco officers had more force allegations filed against them than those in San Jose, Oakland, San Diego and Seattle combined.

The series also found that the department did not have an effective, computerized system for tracking the performance of officers and often failed to intervene with officers who reported using force much more than their peers.

Implementation of the tracking system is one of two major reforms that national and local experts say San Francisco must undertake to improve local policing. The second involves strengthening the Police Commission, which oversees the department.

Tracking system crucial

Law enforcement experts view a computerized tracking system -- which can offer an up-to-date, comprehensive look at an officer's record with a few keystrokes -- as a crucial move that other cities already have embraced.

Police practices experts also say, however, that departments that want to improve officer performance and identify those who need counseling must go beyond that computerization step and change the way they manage officers on the streets.

Such deep, fundamental change is difficult for many departments to achieve, they say. Instead, change often comes because of a scandal or a lawsuit.

"I believe departments are generally incapable of reforming themselves," said Duke University law Professor Erwin Chemerinsky, who wrote a report on the Los Angeles Police Department after its Rampart scandal in the late 1990s, in which officers stole drugs and beat and framed citizens.

"Reform usually involves major change, including changing the culture of a department," Chemerinsky said, "and I think it is very difficult to do from within ... absent a major scandal or significant change in personnel."

Police Chief Heather Fong has repeatedly said the department is pressing forward on the tracking system. She also said earlier this year that its officers "are very restrained in when and how they use force" and use it only when "they must resist the force that is being used against them."

Early intervention

More than two decades ago, law enforcement agencies began building systems capable of identifying officers with problematic performance, especially excessive use of force.

Departments used a variety of methods to intervene, including counseling and retraining, with the goal of dealing with an officer's problems before discipline became necessary.

The trend toward tracking systems was fueled by a growing awareness that a relatively small group of officers in each agency is typically responsible for a disproportionate amount of the force used on citizens.

The thinking was that if those officers could be identified, counseled, retrained or removed from the street, departments could reduce the use of unnecessary force, citizen complaints and costly lawsuits.

In the mid-1980s, San Francisco began requiring officers to report when they used force on citizens. In the mid-'90s, it also started tracking citizen complaints against individual officers.

Neither system was computerized so that supervisors could perform speedy checks on an officer's record, seeing which officers were logging the most force or quickly comparing citizen complaints with use-of-force logs.

Tracking for promotions

While many departments use tracking systems to warn of problem behavior by officers, the Justice Department says more are expanding their systems to follow positive indicators of officers' behavior -- such as arrests made or commendations -- that may identify those worthy of promotions.

In Pittsburgh, for example, the police department uses its system as a broad management tool, not just to watch for misconduct by its 866 officers.

"Officers know people pay attention to what's in there," said Pittsburgh police Cmdr. Linda Barone, speaking of the tracking system. "If they want to be promoted or go to specialized units, if there is nothing in the system that says you have been working at all, it has been told to them: 'Don't bother.' "

In 1997, Pittsburgh entered into a consent decree with the Justice Department to improve its tracking of officer performance and to take other modernizing steps. Today, it has a comprehensive early intervention system: It requires sergeants to log onto the computer every day and monitor their officers' behavior.

Samuel Walker, one of the nation's top experts on police tracking systems, emphasized that management in a department has to be totally committed to making a system work. "Somebody has to make these things happen," Walker said. "If no one really takes the lead, these reforms won't happen, and unprofessional conduct will continue."

Good results reported

In some cities, Walker and others report, both use-of-force incidents and citizen complaints decreased following installation of an early intervention system.

San Francisco's department proposes monitoring a greatly expanded list of behavior in addition to citizen complaints, including use of force, officer-involved shootings and discharges, internal affairs and workplace discrimination complaints, civil suits and claims, on-duty accidents and vehicle pursuits.

Newsom's 2006-07 budget includes $575,000 for the intervention system's hardware, software and maintenance costs.

Fong told The Chronicle the new system "will afford essential feedback to those officers who may need guidance or additional training in their duties, provide timely and relevant information to supervisors, and raise the level of professionalism in our department."

Newsom said while there is some natural concern and resistance among police officers about the changes the system will require, he thinks ultimately everyone, including the rank and file, "benefits because it will allow us in an objective way to analyze data and treat everyone fairly. That builds public trust, and with public trust, comes a stronger department."

The Police Officers Association did not respond to a Chronicle request for comment on the system. In a recent newsletter to members, association President Gary Delagnes said: "An early intervention system that is fair to all parties and is not seen as much as a punitive tool as a monitoring tool should be implemented as soon as possible."

Police Commission

Another change that has been urged to improve oversight of San Francisco police officers involves the Police Commission.

For more than a decade, critics, including the San Francisco Bar Association, have said the commission should have its own staff to help it formulate policy.

By law, the commission has the power to fire officers or to impose any suspension longer than 10 days; it also sets the general orders that spell out department policy.

The seven-member commission -- composed of volunteers appointed by the mayor and Board of Supervisors -- now has only a sergeant and a clerk on staff. It relies on the department for reports on policy issues.

After persistent lobbying by police Commissioner Theresa Sparks, the 2006-07 city budget includes $50,000 for a hearing officer and an $89,000 performance auditor who will do commission work but remain a department -- not a commission -- employee.

"We need to look at whether our policies on use of force are strong enough," Sparks said. "But until we have staffing resources, we are for all practical purposes ceremonial."

In Los Angeles, the commission has had a staff of analysts focused on policy issues for more than a decade.

"The benefit of having the independent review and oversight is that the department knows there will be such a review" of anything it proposes, said Richard Tefank, executive director of the city's Board of Police Commissioners.

At a recent seminar co-chaired by former Police Chief Anthony Ribera and former chief and Mayor Frank Jordan, Schlosberg of the ACLU said additional commission staffing is a critical need.

"The Police Commission is overwhelmed by the issues on its plate," Schlosberg said.

Some witnesses at the seminar said the commissioners would not be so overwhelmed if they didn't have to conduct lengthy hearings on every officer who might deserve more than a 10-day suspension, the maximum that can now be imposed by the police chief.

Fong said in an interview after the seminar: "The chief should have authority to impose suspensions of 45 to 90 days when appropriate."

Difficult prospect

Often, change in a department must be imposed from outside.

After the 1991 Los Angeles police beating of motorist Rodney King, Congress passed a law allowing the Justice Department to file "pattern or practice" suits for violations of citizens' civil rights.

Since 1997, Justice has used that law to file several lawsuits against police agencies and then hammer out consent decrees to force change.

In some instances, private citizens have sued departments to produce change, winning court-enforced agreements.

In Oakland, the Police Department entered into a settlement in 2003 with 119 citizens who alleged that four officers known as "the Riders" had beaten or framed them. The settlement paid $10.5 million to the plaintiffs and their lawyers and committed the department to reforms expected to cost $10 million more by 2008.

The reforms include establishing a comprehensive system to track officer behavior and performance, an expanded and more accessible internal affairs bureau to investigate citizen complaints, more sergeants to supervise officers on the streets and changes in the field training program to prevent the assigning of problem officers to train new recruits.

Oakland has found one of the most difficult reforms to comply with has been the tracking system, which the department says it hopes to finish installing late in 2007 -- more than a year after it had hoped. Oakland Police Capt. Paul Figueroa estimates the cost of the system "could easily be $2.5 million to $3 million."

San Francisco has faced no such outside impetus, and city leaders historically have not pushed hard for police reform.

Major reform would be difficult to achieve, said John Keker, a prominent defense attorney who served as Police Commission president under Mayors Art Agnos and Willie Brown.

"San Francisco hasn't had a scandal as grievous as Rampart in L.A. or the Riders in Oakland," said Keker, "and there hasn't been an allegation of organized brutality here -- it's been random."

Without a major scandal, Keker said, very little can change because no mayor or police chief wants to tangle with the Police Officers Association, which "to some extent runs the department. So nothing happens."

The Police Officers Association did not respond to requests for comment.

Coushatta Residents Continue Dialogue After Controversial Bus Incident (SHREVET)

By Vickie Welborn

Shreveport (LA) Times, October 15, 2006

Second community forum draws smaller crowd

COUSHATTA "" A second community forum held Saturday in response to an August incident in which nine black children allege they were seated at the back of a school bus because of their race drew a much smaller but no less interested crowd.

About 50 people gathered in Springville Baptist Church, compared to the 200 or so that crowded inside Will of God Ministries in early September for the first public forum. Only a sprinkling of adults indicated Saturday they did not attend last month's session.

Not in attendance were the parents or the children at the center of issue that has gained worldwide attention. But they were represented by Patricia Wilson-Sessoms and her mother, Coushatta councilwoman Rosetta Wilson, both of whom are related to three of the children.

Sessoms said she wished more had attended Saturday, but she realizes there were many events going on in Coushatta and other communities that likely drew people away. Still, she's pleased that the community dialogue is continuing and she looks forward to the next step in the process that is being led by Carmelita Pope Freeman, southwest regional director of the Justice Department's Community Relations Service.

Within the next few weeks, Sessoms and others will build teams that will act as negotiators in a meeting with the school system's negotiators. "That will happen once we establish what we want changed," Sessoms said.

More than bus seating is drawing comments from the public. Hiring practices, teacher certification, discipline, pupil-teacher ratios, testing and much more have been listed as concerns when it comes to the Red River Parish school system.

But it was the bus situation that has gained the most attention. The nine children complained at the beginning of school in mid August that their white bus driver, Deloris Davis, made them give up their seats to the white children. After the children's mothers filed racial discrimination complaints with the school system, Davis made new seating assignments but still put the children at the rear of the bus on two seats.

Davis has denied through her attorney that her actions were racially motivated, saying instead that the seating arrangement was the result of the prior year's chart. But Davis was removed from her bus and ultimately requested retirement, which was granted Oct. 4, her 25th anniversary date.

Randy Jackson did not mention the bus situation when he stood before the crowd Saturday. Instead, Jackson called for change. He said many of the people in the school system were there when he left the area in 1981.

"A lot of them are trained to act they way they do," Jackson said, adding that he is prepared to leave Coushatta again with his children if change does not take place.

Substitute teacher Robin Owens focused on the lack of fairness in the school system. She cited incidents in which children are not treated equally in discipline matters.

The Rev. DaVince Taylor motivated the audience and drew applause when he challenged them to rally together as a community. He drew their attention to a Red River High football game of two weeks ago when the visiting team from Ferriday "" a town not much larger than Coushatta "" brought about 170 students "" 120 in the band and flag line and 50 football players.

"That was done with community involvement," Taylor charged. "Our children need us "» we've got to get actively involved."

NAACP District Vice President James Pannell, of Shreveport assured the crowd that the NAACP is monitoring the situation, but has agreed to take a back seat as the Justice Department continues to help the community work out its problems from within.

And work is what Pope-Freeman led the forum attendees in doing. She divided them into groups and tasked them with categorizing the wide range of concerns detailed in nine pages of raw data gathered from last month's meeting. Their work would be used during the negotiation process with school officials.

Sessoms said no one from the school system has been in contact with the children's mothers since the one and only meeting with Superintendent Kay Easley. "It may be because we're working through this process and they don't think they can."

The only acknowledgement school leaders have offered was at a September board meeting in which Easley simply stated, "We're working through the process."

The children, ranging in age from preschoolers to teenagers, are still riding the bus to which they were assigned after taken off of Davis' bus, Sessoms said. At least one is undergoing professional counseling.

"This was more than a back of the bus incident. They children were called names and mistreated. They were not allowed to talk back to the other kids that were calling them names. "» They had been getting teased, but I'm not sure if that is happening any more. They're doing fine now, I believe."

ENVIRONMENT:

Aid Is A Bumper Crop For Farmers (WP)

By Gilbert M. Gaul, Dan Morgan And Sarah Cohen, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

In the spring of 2000, Congress decided to do something about its costly and politically driven practice of giving farmers a disaster payment each time a storm damaged their crops.

DOJ_NMG_0081704

The lawmakers voted to use $8 billion in new taxpayer subsidies to help farmers buy crop insurance to protect them against losses. The insurance would replace the disaster payments and reduce government costs.

But shortly after passing the Agricultural Risk Protection Act, Congress lost its fiscal will. One week before the presidential election, it passed a new $1.8 billion disaster bill to assist farmers hurt by bad weather. Two others followed in subsequent years, totaling more than $6 billion. Today, after a searing drought in the Plains, farm-state legislators are pushing for billions more in aid.

The result is that farmers often get paid twice by the government for the same disaster, once in subsidized insurance and then again in disaster assistance, a legal but controversial form of double-dipping, a Washington Post investigation found. Together, the programs have cost taxpayers nearly $24 billion since 2000.

The government pays billions to help farmers buy cheap federal insurance, billions more to private insurance companies to help run the program and billions more to cover the riskiest claims. And on top of all that, it spends billions on disaster payments.

"It should be one or the other," said Mark Orebaugh, a flinty 52-year-old who has suffered several years of bad crops in southwestern Kansas. "There should be a permanent disaster program or crop insurance that is enough to cover my losses."

Instead, there are essentially both.

"Everybody says the money is free, but we're all paying," said Charles Fisher, a central California farmer who helped oversee government disaster payments in his area for a dozen years. "Washington unbundles the money, opens the window and turns on the fan."

The money is blown all over the country, from New York to Nebraska to California, usually at election time, fanned by farm-state legislators.

A major share of the money goes to parched and flood-prone areas where farming is tenuous at best and "disasters" seem to happen every year, a review of thousands of records and interviews with dozens of farmers, economists, insurers and government regulators have found.

Farmers in Gaines County, a parched stretch of West Texas, collected nearly $66 million in the past five disaster bills. Cavalier County farmers in North Dakota, soaked by rain and floods, got $67 million. The money was in addition to $116 million that farmers in those two counties got in crop insurance payments.

Just four states forming a narrow swath in the middle of the country -- Texas, Kansas, South Dakota and North Dakota -- collected nearly four of every 10 dollars of the disaster aid handed out in the past decade, $3.8 billion in all, records show. Farmers in those states also collected $5.6 billion from crop insurance.

Those farmers have come to depend on both crop insurance and disaster payments, which together allow for covering up to 95 percent of the value of their crops. "Taxpayers are funding something good, the rural life," said Terry Aronson, a farmer in the flood-prone Devil's Lake area of North Dakota, who has received nearly $300,000 in disaster aid the past decade.

"No one wants to appear they are being chintzy with farmers," said Bruce L. Gardner, an agricultural economist at the University of Maryland and a former top USDA official. "In spite of all of these increases in subsidies, crop insurance really hasn't made a dent in the disaster payments."A Continuous Cycle

In the past 25 years, Congress has passed three major "reforms" of the federal crop insurance program in an effort to sign up more farmers and reduce their dependence on disaster aid. Instead, the result has been a continuous cycle in which Congress expands crop insurance only to turn around and hand out more disaster payments.

In 2000, then-House Agriculture Committee Chairman Larry Combest, a Republican representing West Texas, was instrumental in getting the most recent reform bill passed, which included the $8 billion in new premium subsidies. He cited the "countless billions" in disaster payments that were undermining crop insurance. In the Senate, Pat Roberts (R-Kan.) argued that expanded insurance would result in "less need" for disaster aid.

The government would now pick up an average of 60 percent of the cost of farmers' premiums. Farmers jumped at the cheaper insurance. Today, about 80 percent of all eligible cropland -- 240 million acres -- is insured at some level.

Yet only four months after the bill was passed, Congress authorized $1.8 billion in disaster aid. That was followed by $3.1 billion for 2001 and 2002 crop losses, and $3.5 billion covering 2003 and 2004. Still another $250 million was set aside after the 2005 hurricanes.

"In farm states, legislators have to appear they are doing something," said Art Barnaby, an agricultural economist at Kansas State University and an expert on crop insurance. "It can hurt them politically if they don't."

Combest, now a lobbyist representing agricultural interests, including crop insurance agents, declined to be interviewed. "I think I'll take a pass," he said. Roberts did not respond to requests for comment.

Disaster payments to farmers are a public record but, by law, the USDA keeps the names of recipients of crop insurance confidential. Thus there is no way to count how many farmers have collected both and in what amount. However, interviews with farmers and government officials indicate that farmers who get insurance payments also get most of the disaster money.

The USDA calculates how much to pay farmers in disaster money by first looking at how much they have received in crop insurance for losses. Farmers must show that they have lost at least 35 percent of their crop to qualify for a disaster payment. The maximum is $80,000. The total of their insurance payments, disaster aid and sales revenue from remaining crops is capped at 95 percent of what they would have earned if they had harvested and sold a full crop.Bountiful Harvests and Aid, Too

Tulare County in California is an example of a farming region where the use of crop insurance is extensive but farmers still draw millions in disaster relief. The county is part of the lush San Joaquin Valley, one of the largest and most productive agricultural regions in the world. The largely irrigated fields produce a bountiful harvest of oranges, lemons, olives, cotton and 150 other crops.

For 12 years, Charles Fisher, 73, helped to police the distribution of disaster payments to Tulare's farmers.

It wasn't the easiest task for Fisher, who chaired the local farmers' committee that approves disaster payments on behalf of the Tulare County branch of the federal Farm Service Agency. In one case, a nectarine grower sought help for weather damage after he had pulled down his own trees. Other farmers claimed to have suffered disasters when the weather was normal.

Fisher said he doesn't begrudge growers who have collected disaster aid, despite the cost to taxpayers. His own farm has gotten some. "Whether it's right or wrong, if they are offering it, you're foolish to turn it down," he said.

Tulare farmers have received a total of nearly $77 million in disaster payments since 1998. They have also netted $51.1 million in crop insurance. Yet the county harvest has been bountiful in most years, with agricultural sales reaching an all-time high of $4 billion in 2005.

The county hasn't suffered a true weather disaster since Christmas 1998, when it was hit with a freeze and torrential rains, according to local weather consultants and some farmers.

"Katrina is a disaster," said Tom Gruber, a local orange grower. "A hurricane in Florida is a disaster."

But very few Tulare farmers are rejected when they apply for disaster aid, records show. Of the 732 applications by orange growers for assistance in the past two disaster bills, only 33 were ruled ineligible -- less than 5 percent.

Don Laux, 78, of Porterville, is one of dozens of citrus growers who have gotten help.

Some of the orange trees on his 500-plus acres were planted in 1911 and have survived Tulare County weather for nearly a century. As do most citrus growers, Laux and his son Gary use wind machines, automatic irrigation systems, computerized weather stations and a private weather consultant to minimize their risks. They also take out crop insurance, which has paid them for losses. Still, Laux Land Co. has received $215,000 in disaster payments since 1998, according to USDA records.

"I think anyone could get along without it, but it would be a lot harder," Don Laux said. "Any little bit helps."

Last year, the Lauxes received $73,000 in disaster payments for losses on a portion of their 2004 crop of navels and Valencias. They based their claim on a warm spell that "hit the blooms" and caused some oranges to fall prematurely.

Most of their orchards came through okay, but when Don Laux checked with the packaging house that handled their oranges, he learned that yields per acre had fallen by up to 40 percent in some of their orchards. Armed with the records, the Lauxes filed for aid.

"We're not farming for the government, we're farming for ourselves," Gary Laux said. "We truly would like to make money growing crops. But there are a lot of influences out there we have no control over. It's nice to have a safety net."

Minutes of monthly Farm Service Agency meetings, obtained under the Freedom of Information Act, show that some Tulare growers have pushed the disaster program to the limit. In March 2004, for example, a grower sought a payment on 27.6 acres of nectarines he said he had grown three years earlier. After a field inspection and aerial photographs, the committee concluded that "there was no evidence of nectarines. The slides distinctly show pulled trees in bunches on the 27.6 acres."

A catfish farmer who put in a claim for fish lost because of heat "was unable to substantiate the viability of the operation." A field inspection found "a lack of evidence of fish or fish bones in the dried up ponds."

Both applications were rejected.'Everything but the Kitchen Sink'

Congressional sponsors of disaster legislation offer a variety of reasons for their bills. They say federally subsidized insurance doesn't cover all of a farmer's losses, and disaster aid fills the gaps. It helps to stabilize rural economies, which don't have many other options. And it offsets rising fuel and production costs while securing cheap food for Americans.

"Any suggestion that things are good in ag country does not meet the reality test," Rep. Jerry Moran (R-Kan.), chairman of a key House Agriculture subcommittee, observed in a floor speech last year. His office recently helped to coordinate a day of lobbying by farmers and agriculture groups pressing for billions in aid for the 2005 and 2006 crop years.

To get those costly disaster packages passed, their sponsors spread the money around. Recent disaster bills include millions for cottonseed producers and pecan and sugar beet growers; set-asides for farmers in Virginia and North Carolina; and $7.2 million for a transportation project benefiting a sugar grower's co-op in Hawaii. Since 1990, legislators have muscled through eight major disaster packages and several smaller provisions covering every year except the past two, including money for clams, oysters, shellfish, hay, sod, shrimp and lobster.

Many of the recent disaster packages have been shoehorned into large appropriations bills, including a military construction bill in 2004. That means legislators do not even get an opportunity to vote directly on the subsidies.

"The problem with ad hoc disaster programs is that in order to get them passed, they throw in everything but the kitchen sink," said Tom Buis, president of the National Farmers Union. The industry group favors overhauling the present system to make it more rigorous while still targeting farmers in need. "There's a lot of ways we can do this better. We need to start looking at the underlying cause of the problem, not just the symptoms."

Buis added that farmers don't expect to have all of their losses covered by disaster payments. "They're not being made whole now," he said. "What we have is a horrible public policy that needs to be fixed so we help farmers who truly have a need."

Among the ideas being considered by Buis and others is guaranteeing a portion of a farmer's income.

In recent months, lawmakers from the Plains states have pressed for billions more in disaster aid to cover the past two crop years, contending that farmers have been devastated by drought and rising costs. The Bush administration opposes the additional aid, noting that crops were at "record or near record" levels in 2005 and that millions would go to farmers who do not really need the money.

In a letter to Agriculture Secretary Mike Johanns, Sen. Kent Conrad (D-N.D.) wrote that not all farmers have "had the good fortune to produce above average crops," adding that the $4 billion wouldn't "come close to making farmers whole."A Perennial Safety Net

Conrad's home state highlights how disaster aid has become a kind of perennial safety net for risk-prone farmers. North Dakota ranks second, behind only Texas, in total disaster aid, with almost $1 billion in the past decade. Its farmers have suffered floods and droughts, with many getting payments over and over.

Federal agricultural disasters have been declared five out of the past six years in Cavalier County, where farmers grow wheat and barley on flat, wind-blown fields in the northeastern corner of the state. None of the farmers' applications for aid for their 2003-2004 crops was turned down, records show. "There was no reason to turn any down," said Michele Schommer, who heads the local office of the Farm Service Agency. "The whole county was bad."

Although accounting for 2 percent of all farms in North Dakota, Cavalier County has received more than 7 percent of the state's disaster payments in the past decade. The average total of $113,000 per farm was more than double the state average and nearly 20 times the national average.

At 6,300 acres, Dettler Farms is among the biggest in Cavalier County. It has collected disaster payments each time they were available in the past decade -- $450,000 all together. The farm has also received insurance payments nearly every year, said Steve Dettler.

Last year "was the worst year ever," Dettler said. Rains came during the planting season in June. "You couldn't get into the fields."

Dettler and other farmers are counting on more help. In late August, Conrad staged a rally of 400 farmers in Bismarck supporting a multibillion-dollar aid package to help farmers and ranchers in the western part of the state, which has been beset by drought. He was joined by Gov. John Hoeven (R).

The drought has actually helped Cavalier County by drying out fields that had been flooded; farmers there are harvesting one of their best crops in a decade. But Dettler said he hopes there is a disaster program to cover his 2005 losses.

"We depend on it being there every other year," he said. "It's an election year, and everyone's involved this time."

Conrad said that "it's a key and legitimate question" to ask how much aid farmers should get. But he added, "We're in something extraordinary. Go to the Gulf Coast, they have 100 years' experience with hurricanes. We don't say, 'Enough' to Florida, or to California and earthquakes, wildfires and mudslides. As a matter of national policy, we help out areas that have natural disasters."How Much Risk to Bear?

How much risk should taxpayers expect American farmers to bear on their own?

Mark Orebaugh struggles with that question while sitting at the kitchen table in his modest home northwest of Dodge City, Kan. He has received hundreds of thousands of dollars in federal crop insurance in the last four years. An additional $116,000 has arrived in disaster payments.

Finally, after a long pause, he answers that he could tolerate up to a "20 percent" crop loss. "I don't think 20 percent is a disaster," he said. "I could probably handle that if you average out the good and bad years."

But Orebaugh is uncertain and looks to his banker, Leon Flax, for help. Flax, tall and dressed in blue jeans, has worked with Orebaugh and other farmers for years. "I don't know," he says, shaking his head. "Not this year. I don't think you could handle anything this year."

A late freeze hit some of Orebaugh's crops. Then the temperature soared to 100 degrees in June and remained there for weeks, baking his wheat, corn and grain sorghum. The claims adjuster has already been by once, and Orebaugh expects him back soon. He hopes to collect about $200,000 in crop insurance.

Like most Kansas farmers, Orebaugh is heavily insured. With the help of government subsidies, he has covered up to 75 percent of the yields on the 6,000 acres he owns or leases.

Orebaugh said the insurance alone is not enough. To begin with, it does not cover all of a farmer's losses. In addition, if a farmer suffers poor harvests in back-to-back years, his insurance policy, which is based on his average yield over four years, covers less. This is a major sore point in areas such as Kansas, which has been hard hit by droughts.

"I'm not sure what more we can do," said Rebecca Davies, a regional director for the crop insurance program in Topeka, Kan. "We have coverage [plans] of up to 85 percent. What more could you ask for? They still pass disaster programs."

Kansas farmers have received $421 million in disaster payments since 2001, among the highest payouts nationally. That is in addition to $1.3 billion in insurance payments to farmers and $680 million in federal subsides to help farmers pay their premiums.

For Orebaugh and most Kansas farmers, the federal insurance is "a good deal." In the past four years, he has paid $81,730 in premiums but collected $295,796 in claims-- or $3.62 for every $1 he put in. That's higher than the state average, but Orebaugh farms on the western side of Kansas where water is scarce and much of the farmland isn't irrigated.

"There's just no water," he said. "We probably should never have developed those [fields] when we did 30 years ago because the water table was declining."

Orebaugh's grandfather immigrated from Germany in 1901. "He crossed two of the most fertile valleys in the country, the Missouri and the Mississippi, and settled in western Kansas," Orebaugh said. "Why he ever landed in this godforsaken valley I don't know."

A drought has plagued much of western Kansas, including Ford County, where Orebaugh farms, since 2000. Orebaugh has had two good crop years out of the last six. "This year is going to be a wipeout," he said.

The good years help to average out the bad. "I use the money to pay back my loans," Orebaugh said. But he quickly adds that he rarely gets ahead. "That's why we need disaster assistance. It's the only way we can pay back our loans."

This year, Orebaugh took on an additional 1,000 acres in his operation and has higher costs and a bigger bank loan, about $230,000. "Talk about a case of bad timing," he said. Now, he is "praying" for another disaster bill.

"We don't like it any more than the taxpayers do. With disaster assistance, we're at the whims of the politicians," he said. "But we need something. I don't care what you name it.

"It's feast or famine here. Economically, does it make sense? Probably not. Philosophically, I don't know. Americans want cheap food, and they want it when they want it."

Too Big For Disaster Aid, Farmer Chooses To Divide And Conquer (WP)

By Gilbert M. Gaul, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

NASHVILLE, N.C. -- When Hurricane Floyd flooded his crops in 1999, causing millions in losses, Dale C. Bone didn't get a dime from the government.

Bone was too big. His farming and packing business easily exceeded the government's cutoff of $2.5 million in annual gross income for federal disaster payments. "We were a lot larger than that," he recalled.

So following the hurricane, Bone got creative. Instead of continuing as a corporation, he restructured as a partnership with 13 different owners. That way, each partner could apply individually and fall below the government's income limit.

"We were forced to go into these partnerships to qualify," Bone said. "It's ridiculous. We should be able to get the payments regardless. It's the same people involved."

Soon, disaster aid was flowing to Bone's operations in eastern North Carolina, and it was all perfectly legal. Between 2001-2005, the Dale Bone Farms Partnership collected more than $4.7 million in federal disaster payments, records show. That made Bone, 63, one of the largest recipients of disaster aid in the nation. Still, he said, his losses exceed what he got in disaster aid.

Bone said the area was hit by a series of tropical storms and excessive rain. "Two thousand and four hurt the worst. We lost about 1,000 acres of sweet potatoes. We lost cucumbers with disease. Mildew was terrible. We've just had terrible weather."

Most of the payments Bone and his partners received came from the Noninsured Crop Disaster Assistance Program, or NAP, a little known federal plan for farmers whose crops do not qualify for federally subsidized insurance. Eligible crops include mushrooms, Christmas trees, ginseng, turf grass, sea grass and tropical fish. Bone said he qualified for cucumbers and sweet potatoes.

To apply for a NAP payment, growers must pay a $100 fee and meet certain deadlines. They have to lose at least half of their crop to a natural disaster, or be prevented from planting 35 percent of their intended acres. Growers get 55 percent of the average market price for losses.

Congress approved NAP in 1994 but expanded it in 2000. Since then, payments have grown sharply, topping $100 million each year and nearly $900 million since the program's inception. Unlike other disaster programs, NAP is fully funded and doesn't require annual legislation.

The Oak Ridge Fish Hatchery in Plant City, Fla., received $200,000 in NAP payments and $160,000 in regular disaster payments after two freezes killed tropical fish in some of its 400 open ponds a few years ago. "We have NAP because there's no crop insurance available for tropical fish," owner David Drawdy said. The firm, located halfway between Tampa and Orlando, sells to Wal-Mart and PETCO.

Steve Peterson, who oversees the NAP program, said fish hatcheries qualify as long as the fish are grown "in a controlled environment. We cover fingerlings, brood fish. We cover the food fish," he said.

For Dale Bone, who has retired from farming, the payments have ended. "I've sold my business," he said recently. "I'm down to zero. I'm out."

Most Farmers Skipping Subsidized Loans And Going For The Cash (WP)

By Gilbert M. Gaul And Sarah Cohen, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

There is an alternative to giving struggling farmers emergency disaster aid after every drought, hurricane and storm. Only farmers who cannot qualify for a commercial loan are eligible.

They can take out federally subsidized low-interest loans up to $500,000 for each disaster they experience. But the farmers tend to pass up the emergency loans in favor of the emergency cash.

For example, Nebraska farmers took out just nine emergency loans totaling about $389,000 between 2004-2006, records show. During roughly the same period, they collected more than $100 million in disaster payments.

"They don't want a loan," said R. Coke Gray II, head of the Farm Service Agency in Columbus County, N.C., where farmers have also gotten millions in disaster aid. "They want a disaster program because those are going to be dollars they don't have to borrow. If I was in their boat, I'd do it too."

Others say the farmers are just being smart.

"Farmers are very careful about taking on additional debt," said Brian Wolford, the top U.S. Department Agriculture official in Nebraska. "At the same time, I don't think any farmer counts on disaster aid because there are no guarantees."

Nationwide, use of the loans has declined sharply as disaster aid has increased. Farmers took out just 381 emergency loans in 2005, down from nearly 2,500 in 2000, records show.

The loans began in the late 1940s when the Farmers Home Administration began looking for a way to help farmers recover from natural disasters.

To qualify, farmers must be located in a county that has been declared a disaster by the secretary of agriculture. The declaration process is complicated and involves surveys, paperwork and meetings. Dozens of local, state and federal officials are involved, including two USDA employees who review applications and make recommendations to the secretary.

Each year, thousands of applications arrive in Washington. And so long as they meet the government's threshold that at least one crop or one farmer in a county suffered a loss of 30 percent or greater, they usually are approved.

"It is not a very high bar to clear," USDA Deputy Administrator John Johnson acknowledged in an e-mail to The Post.

Recently, as many as two of every three counties in the country have received declarations, prompting some to question the government's standard. "To me, we're not living in the Sahara," said Hunt Shipman, a former top USDA official. "So if we're having multiple years of disaster declarations, we may not have the right ruler to measure disasters."

Local officials, governors and farm state legislators campaign aggressively for the declarations, writing letters and making phone calls. Nebraska Gov. Dave Heineman made three requests this year on behalf of counties hurt by drought. He was joined by Republican Sen. Chuck Hagel, who wrote three separate letters to the USDA, according to a July press release issued by Hagel's office applauding a declaration covering 49 counties.

"Today's announcement is an important step to help farmers and ranchers . . .survive a difficult market and recover from damages caused by poor conditions," Hagel wrote.

Despite the effort, few farmers in Nebraska or elsewhere appear to want the loans that the disaster declarations enable.

Why do legislators go to all the trouble then? Hagel did not respond to requests for comment. Some USDA officials believe it is so legislators can put out press releases showing they are helping their farm constituents.

"There is also a public relations benefit for those officials who like to write letters requesting or supporting the designation," Johnson told The Post.

Still another reason is that the letters and disaster declarations attract public attention and help set the stage for disaster legislation that puts cash in the hands of farmers, some times years later.

DOJ_NMG_0081709

"Probably the most important thing it does is it signals there is a greater need out there," Wolford said.

'Farming Your Insurance' (WP)

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

WHITEVILLE, N.C. -- Crop insurance helps to protect farmers against the vagaries of weather. But it can also alter the landscape of farming in a region, resulting in higher losses for taxpayers.

Consider the lowly sweet potato.

For years, it was excluded from federal crop insurance. But in the late 1990s, growers and legislators in North Carolina successfully lobbied federal officials for coverage. Soon, the number of acres planted with sweet potatoes was doubling and tripling, as were the claims filed by farmers.

In Columbus County, a low-lying area tucked away in the southern corner of the state, the number of sweet potato acres quadrupled after federal crop insurance was introduced in 1998. Almost immediately, losses also began mounting: $1.4 million in 1999, $2 million in 2000, $3.3 million in 2001. Between 1999 and 2005, sweet potato farmers paid $954,264 in premiums but collected nearly $15 million in federal insurance payments -- a return of almost $16 on every $1 in premiums.

On one level, it was a case of bad luck, growers said. Starting in 1999 with Hurricane Floyd, the county was hit with a series of storms that roared in off the coast and dumped buckets of rain on their fields during the fall harvest. A root crop, sweet potatoes are vulnerable to standing water and rot easily.

"We just seem to have had one storm after another," said Phil Gore, a crop insurance agent who also grew sweet potatoes until a few years ago.

But other growers and government officials said the large losses couldn't be explained by bad weather alone. They said some of the farmers who started growing sweet potatoes had never grown them before. Others planted in areas known to be wet. Still others didn't take care of their crops, saving money on fertilizers and other production costs, only to turn around and file insurance claims when their yields were poor -- a practice known as "farming your insurance."

"I heard some farmers plant in dark, wet soil," said Michael Shaw, a county extension agent. "Others were planting their bushes far apart, so when the adjuster came it looked like they had a bad yield."

"There was definitely a problem with the insurance," said R. Coke Gray II, a local USDA official. "Someone could go out and put nitrogen on their plants. That makes them nice and bushy . . . but produces no potatoes."

Crop insurance officials became so alarmed about the sweet potato losses that they hired a consultant. In October 2003, the consultant reported that the high losses could not be explained by weather alone and that the losses for sweet potatoes "were remarkably higher than those of other crops."

Several members of the Federal Crop Insurance Corporation, which sets policy for the insurance program, wanted to eliminate sweet potato insurance in Columbus County. After lobbying by the North Carolina congressional delegation, a revised insurance plan was introduced with higher premiums and stiff restrictions on the number of acres that farmers were allowed to plant. Growers also had to hire a "scout" to inspect their crops before harvest.

Most of the changes went into effect in 2005, with dramatic results. The number of insured acres of sweet potatoes in Columbus County plummeted to 1,548, from a high of about 6,000. The lower figure was nearly identical to the number of acres planted in 1997, the year before insurance became available. Losses also took a nosedive, to $109,265.

"After they revised the program, it wasn't as easy to collect," said George Wooten III, whose family has grown sweet potatoes here for decades. "It's almost like the guys who were in it before insurance stayed in it, and ones who weren't left."

In Cities, Healthful Living Through Fresher Shopping (WP)

By Amy Goldstein, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

PHILADELPHIA -- When Larry Lawrence drops into ShopRite, he steers his shopping cart to the towering mounds of produce. "It is like I am being drawn," he said, "by the peaches and the plums and the bananas."

Lawrence, 57, has been eating more fruits and vegetables, and fresh fish, too, since the sprawling store opened five blocks from his house in Eastwick, an industrial swath of southwest Philadelphia that was chosen in the 1950s as the nation's largest urban renewal project. Now, Eastwick is one of the first sites of a new strategy for social change: a government campaign to bring supermarkets stocked with healthful food into neglected inner-city neighborhoods to improve public health.

The Pennsylvania Fresh Food Financing Initiative, leveraging $30 million in state money with $90 million in private funds, is the most ambitious of a spate of state and local projects around the country. They represent a different model for public nutrition programs, which have relied since the 1960s on federal subsidies, such as food stamps and WIC.

Healthful food is scarce in many inner-city neighborhoods, where much of the food comes from corner markets and greasy takeout places. Instead of subsidizing shoppers, the projects shift the emphasis to the private sector, offering coaching and financial inducements for grocers to go into areas they shunned for decades.

These initiatives grow out of new research exploring the relationship among proximity to fresh food, the nation's obesity epidemic and diseases such as diabetes that are affected by diet. "We tried to make the connection between grocery stores and public health," said R. Duane Perry, executive director of the Food Trust, a nonprofit group that, in a pioneering 2002 study, produced maps showing that low-income neighborhoods of Philadelphia with few or no supermarkets had high death rates from diet-related diseases.

A study in Chicago, released three months ago, measured the distance from every city block to the nearest grocery store and fast-food restaurant. It found that people in what it called Chicago's "food deserts" died early in greater numbers and had more diabetes, obesity and high blood pressure.

Such public health discoveries -- combined with an older view of supermarkets as tools of economic development -- have been spurring new policies around the country.

In the District, a mayor's commission on nutrition in July issued a study by a nonprofit group, D.C. Hunger Solutions, showing that obesity is highest in the city's two wards east of the Anacostia River, where poverty is greatest and access to grocery stores is worst. The D.C. government has worked to attract a Giant supermarket that opened last year in Columbia Heights and one being built in Congress Heights, but those efforts began years ago more out of a desire to revitalize the neighborhoods than to improve residents' eating habits.

Baltimore created a Supermarket Initiative in 2002 that has used city economic development funds to attract 19 stores so far. The California legislature passed a bill in August designed to give low-income residents discounts to buy fruits and vegetables -- and help mom-and-pop stores carry more fresh food.

Chicago's planning department held a "grocers' expo" in February for executives from supermarket chains across the Midwest, who were handed a book touting 50 spots in Chicago where stores are needed, plus financial incentives the city could offer. And the National Conference of State Legislators just brought lawmakers to Philadelphia from Louisiana, New Mexico and Michigan to learn how they might replicate the food-financing initiative.

Here in Philadelphia, the initiative's first two years have yielded a central lesson: Despite the fervor of politicians, civic groups, bankers and several grocers, creating successful supermarkets in poor city neighborhoods is hard. It is daunting to train workers, maintain security -- even to acquire enough land.

"The money, to be honest with you, was the easy part," said state Rep. Dwight Evans (D), the initiative's main political patron. "The toughest part is to make this work."

The Rev. Leon Sullivan, the renowned civil rights leader, developed Progress Plaza in North Philadelphia nearly 40 years ago as an example of black empowerment. For its first three decades, the shopping center was anchored by a series of grocery stores. The last one closed eight years ago, and now the only food available is Popeyes fried chicken. Nearby drugstores have added shelves of canned food and chips, but not produce.

Helen Love, 86, a widow and retired inspector for an electronics plant, is one of many original residents in the nearby townhouses of Yorktown, the model neighborhood for black residents that went up in the 1960s. Now, she and a friend, Marvella Lattimore, take turns every other week driving each other to a supermarket half an hour away. Love parks in a handicapped spot and is so tired when she gets home that, she said, "that's usually it for the day."

Across the street, Israel Edward, 74, who has stopped driving because of poor eyesight, takes the bus to Reading Terminal Market in Center City. "I only bring what my two arms can carry," he said. Next door, Doris Turner, 85, gets to a large grocery store about every two months, when a grandson in the National Guard can take her.

Evans, the legislator, lived near Yorktown as a young boy and remembers shopping at Best Market with his aunt Rosie. He remembers the race riots of 1964 along the street the supermarket was on, with nickels all over the ground from parking meters the looters had broken. And he remembers, in the few years after the violence, the disinvestment by white merchants.

So when the Food Trust's director brought him the maps of grocery stores and death rates, he understood their importance. As minority chairman of the Pennsylvania House Appropriations Committee, he has put $10 million in the state budget for the food initiative each of the past three years, requiring three times as much in private financing. The Food Trust helps with applications. The Reinvestment Fund, a nonprofit financing institution, has secured money from banks, screens applicants and awards the grants. The money can be used for marketing studies, land acquisition, environmental cleanup, city permits, construction, and help with worker training and store security.

So far, the fund has given grants for nine stores in Philadelphia and five elsewhere in the state. Most are for large, new supermarkets, but a few are helping corner stores expand or buy refrigeration equipment to carry more fresh food.

Not all succeed. A Shop 'N Bag opened in West Philadelphia in late 2004 and closed a year later -- a casualty of an inexperienced owner and delays in housing redevelopment that was to have generated customers, according to Evans and the Food Trust's Perry. And there have been snags. Fresh Grocer, which is to return a supermarket, at last, to Progress Plaza, was to have its opening this fall, but that will be delayed at least until late in 2007 -- the result of complications with permits and with renovations of the rest of the shopping center.

In an industry with typical profit margins of 1 to 2 percent, inner-city neighborhoods are "a far more complicated place to build your business," with higher costs and less demand for profitable luxury foods, said Jeffrey Brown, president of Brown's Super Stores, which owns the ShopRite in Eastwick. The store, near the Philadelphia airport, opened two years ago with help from a $5 million tax refund for capital investment and a $250,000 grant to train workers.

Brown's strategy here has been to align the business more closely with the neighbors than he does at his suburban stores. Before opening, he invited civic and religious leaders to lunch to talk over what they expected from the store. Working from scratch, his employees make sweet-potato pies and cakes, down-home potato salad, seafood cakes, and 100 other recipes catering to local tastes that he could not buy wholesale.

Brown conferred with the imams at local mosques about what foods meet Muslim residents' halal requirements. He has brought in a Western Union outlet for the neighborhood's Caribbean immigrants to wire remittances.

A community job bank has funneled 90 percent of the store's workers, many from families where steady jobs are unfamiliar, Brown said. He invited Maggie Powell, longtime president of the Eastwick Project Area Committee, to help teach new hires how to comport themselves at work. And when Powell's 39-year-old son was fatally shot in June, store managers took food trays to her house at no charge for three days.

In turn, Powell and local politicians helped to lobby the local utility company, Peco, after Brown was told the power could not be turned on in time for the store's grand opening. It was. Other problems prove harder to solve. When a manager catches a shoplifter, Brown said, the police say they are too busy with violent crime to come.

The store lost money in its first year, Brown said, but had a profit of close to 1 percent in its second.

The effect ShopRite and the other stores are having on nutrition is less well understood. Recent research, for example, that included rural, suburban and urban areas of a few states showed that black residents -- but not white ones -- had somewhat more healthful diets if they could buy fresh food nearby. A few months ago, Stephen Matthews, a sociologist at Pennsylvania State University, began a rigorous study in Philadelphia on whether the arrival of a supermarket changes the amount of fruits and vegetables people eat.

On a recent afternoon, Larry Lawrence, stopping in on his way home from work as a counselor for troubled boys, said: "I'm glad they moved in. There are two or three guys, all day long, putting out fresh stuff. Bananas. Strawberries."

Not all shoppers are attracted by the produce. "It's the sweet-potato cake. They don't have that at any other store," said Toinette Alexander.

Still, Brown, said, "we are doing $40,000, $50,000, $60,000 a week in fruits and vegetables. That is more fruits and vegetables than was happening before."

Medicare Slammed For Not Improving Lab-quality Rules (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 15, 2006

Some scientists and consumer health groups are angry that the U.S. Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services (CMS) has decided not to write new rules designed to improve the quality of laboratories that perform genetic testing, keeping in place current guidelines.

"We're very disappointed," said Rick Borchelt, spokesman for the Genetics and Public Policy Center. "After years of saying they were going to do this, they did a complete about-face ... with no justification. We're mystified."

Late last month, the Genetics and Public Policy Center -- along with the Genetic Alliance and the Public Citizen Health Research Group -- filed a petition with CMS demanding the agency create a "genetic testing specialty" under the provisions of the Clinical Laboratories Improvement Amendments (CLIA) of 1988, which CMS administers.

The groups argued that additional regulation was necessary to ensure high-quality genetic test results, which they say are now used to diagnose more than 900 diseases.

"Making sure that laboratories can accurately and reliably perform genetic tests is a fundamental requirement for the success of genetic medicine, and a fundamental obligation of CMS," said Kathy Hudson, director of the Genetics and Public Policy Center.

DOJ_NMG_0081712

"In 2000, CMS thought the creation of rulemaking with CLIA was a good idea," said Catherine D. O'Connell, a senior scientist with Tetracore Inc., a biotechnology research and development firm in Rockville. Until just a few months ago, she and others said, CMS said new rules to strengthen and ensure the quality of genetic labs should be under CLIA.

But now CMS says it "will focus on beefed-up oversight of genetic testing labs under current rules," Miss O'Connell said.

CMS recently informed an advisory panel that oversees CLIA that it has "scrapped the rulemaking effort," even though work to establish "specialty requirements for genetic testing" had been under way for years.

In an e-mail, CMS confirmed it has decided "there will not be a CLIA genetic testing standard" and offered a half-dozen explanations.

Key among them, CMS said, is that a "CLIA regulation would not resolve the problem that these tests are not currently FDA-approved, and, therefore, not clinically validated."

Besides, CMS said, it has no data indicating genetic testing labs "have any more problems than labs doing other kinds of testing."

Furthermore, the federal agency said, it is still not clear how such rules would address a host of sensitive moral issues, such as when doctors use tests that could show a patient is suffering from an incurable disease predict how long that patient will live.

CLIA standards "would not fix ethical, legal and social issues associated with genetic testing," CMS said.

What's more, CMS said, the genetic testing field is "so dynamic, it would be impossible to write prescriptive standards for these tests that would not go out of date before they are published."

Meanwhile, the Food and Drug Administration (FDA), which says it wants to take over the regulation of genetic testing, has been sending letters to clinical labs that do such testing. The letters warn the labs that they are violating federal law by providing these "unapproved medical devices (tests)" to clinicians, said Richard A. Samp, chief counsel of the Washington Legal Foundation. The labs were told they can "either submit voluntarily to FDA regulations" or stop providing the tests, he said.

The public interest law firm recently filed a citizen petition with the FDA, calling on the agency to cease its efforts to enforce its "medical device" regulations.

An FDA spokeswoman said the agency has fully explained why it thinks it should be regulating genetic tests in congressional hearings.

Citing Heavenly Injunctions To Fight Earthly Warming (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

WYANDOTTE, Mich. — To find St. Elizabeth Roman Catholic Church in this working class suburb south of Detroit, look toward the roofline, for the windmill. Not a big windmill, it is a spare steel structure maybe nine feet high, perched atop the rectory of the church and facing northeast into the winds that come off Lake Erie.

Yet the windmill, two solar panels on the roof, another atop the front porch and a solar water heating system above the garage are the pride of the Rev. Charles Morris, St. Elizabeth's priest.

Over the last five years, Father Morris has sharply reduced his small parish's energy use and emissions of carbon dioxide, the compound most scientists believe has led to global warming, and he has organized other congregations across Michigan to do the same.

"We're all part of God's creation," Father Morris said. "If someone like me doesn't speak about its care, who will? The changes we've made here, that's a form of preaching."

Over the last year, religious activism on global warming has won much attention. Last February, 86 evangelical Christian leaders backed an initiative to combat global warming, a move that broke the evangelical movement's broad silence on the issue but exposed stark divisions.

In October, 4,000 congregations of various faiths will show films on global warming, including "An Inconvenient Truth." [On Oct. 8, Christian, Muslim, Jewish and Buddhist leaders met in Philadelphia to discuss global warming.]

At ground level, clergy members and lay people have been working to increase awareness of global warming and to reduce their own greenhouse gas emissions. Many, like Father Morris, were active for years before the issue attracted wider concern. Encounters in their own lives awakened them to global warming, they said. But their faith and the imperatives they see in their Scriptures compelled them to act, they said.

"If you do worship the Creator, you take care of his creation," said Greg Wickersham, a high school teacher and a member of the environmental ministry at Intown Community Church in Atlanta, which is affiliated with the theologically conservative Presbyterian Church in America.

DOJ_NMG_0081713

"If we are made in his image, we should mirror his image in our dominion over the Earth," Mr. Wickersham said. "He is creative and sustaining, not destructive."

Father Morris is the executive director of the 124-member Michigan Interfaith Power and Light, the state affiliate of Interfaith Power and Light, the religious association that organized the screenings of the global warming films.

The Michigan organization's representatives speak to local congregations about global warming and ways to counteract it. They arrange for "energy audits," so people can learn how to reduce consumption without sacrificing comfort. Changes include replacing regular light bulbs with long-life fluorescent ones and more ambitious projects like installing solar panels.

In 2005 and the first three quarters of 2006 combined, energy-saving efforts by the group's members have prevented the release into the atmosphere of 14,130 tons of carbon dioxide, according to Enerficiency, an energy consulting firm. Investments in new technology are projected to save the group's congregations nearly $2 million "over the life of the new products," Enerficiency said.

St. Elizabeth itself has reduced its peak energy demand by 60 percent over the last five years and has reduced its annual energy bills by $20,000, Father Morris said.

Father Morris's interest in the environment was nurtured as he roamed farmland next to his childhood home in southern Ohio, times, he said, when he had "an experience of the divine."

His readings and his degree in urban planning sharpened his awareness of global warming. And his faith buttresses his activism, he said. He notes that the United States Conference of Catholic Bishops has urged greater care of the environment. He cites Biblical passages, like Genesis 2:15, that call upon humans to care for God's creation.

Father Morris has found allies in poor urban churches and well-to-do mosques and synagogues in the suburbs. Rabbi Daniel Nevins of Adat Shalom Synagogue in Farmington Hills, a northwest suburb of Detroit, draws inspiration from many of the Bible passages Father Morris cites. Rabbi Nevins focuses much of his efforts on bringing environmental concerns into some of the worship at Adat Shalom.

At Yom Kippur, as part of a ritual when Jews admit their sins before God, Rabbi Nevins added a passage he wrote about the "sin of destroying God's creation." As Jews celebrate the Sukkot holiday and sleep in temporary structures meant to evoke those that Jews lived in during their 40 years in the desert, they are also meant to see the beauty of nature and the fragility of their own existence, Rabbi Nevins said.

Still, it is slow going, he said. The sprawling Conservative synagogue has replaced many of its windows and lights and instituted a large recycling program, but Rabbi Nevins wants to do more. "There's not an active resistance, but people give lip service to environmental ideas and don't change their lifestyle," he said.

Many clergy members run into resistance stemming from theology, economics or politics. The Rev. Gerald Durley of Providence Baptist Church in Atlanta, a largely African-American congregation, said that parishioners often thought of global warming as a distant issue, while problems like crime or the spread of AIDS must be tackled now.

Mr. Durley said he reminded them that in the early 1980's, many blacks dismissed AIDS as a remote issue, too, one that affected only gay white men.

Despite the February statement by prominent evangelicals about global warming, many in the pews remain unconvinced, often because they see it as an issue of the political left.

"When I give talks on environmental stewardship at Christian colleges, I have students look me in the eye and ask, 'Is global warming real?' " said Dave Mahan, associate director of the Au Sable Institute of Environmental Studies, a Christian environmental education organization headquartered in Grand Rapids, Mich. "I answer that God wants us to lead a stewardly life whether or not there is global warming."

The Sisters, Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary, a Catholic religious order for women, used an opportunity to renovate their 73-year-old mother house in Monroe, Mich., to create a model of sustainable energy and water use.

The 376,000-square-foot building is heated and cooled by geothermal power, provided by some 240 wells dug on the order's property. Water from sinks and showers, or "gray water," is fed into a natural filtration and treatment system in a series of ponds and then recycled for use in toilets. Some lawns have been given over to natural meadows to reduce watering and mowing. Insulation is made of recycled materials. The building now saves $200,000 annually in energy costs.

Some neighbors find the shaggy meadows unsightly. The city had to be persuaded to allow the gray water scheme. But the order, the average age of whose members at the mother house is 86, is also asked regularly to advise other groups, religious and secular, on building energy efficient facilities.

"We are recreating the monastery of old, where people come to learn how to live into the next century," said Sister Janet Ryan, a member of the order's leadership council. "Our dream is that the mother house serves as something of an ecological lab. For a bunch of elderly women, we have a huge agenda."

Cartel Figure Lashes Out (DMN)

By Alfredo Corchado, The Dallas Morning News

The Dallas Morning News, October 15, 2006

Ex-informant held by U.S. says drug corruption is rampant

A former informant whose participation in drug-related murders in Mexico caused turmoil in the U.S. agency that paid him says that there were more killings than reported and that drug corruption extends into the U.S. and Mexican governments.

In sworn testimony and in response to questions submitted through his attorney, Guillérmo Eduardo Ramírez Peyro, the man known as "Lalo," provided new details about his work as a drug cartel operative and as a U.S. government informant, and he claimed to have personal knowledge of extensive government corruption.

Juárez story archive: Drugs, death and scandal

Mr. Ramírez also lashed out at his former U.S. employers, saying they are turning their backs on him after he helped them apprehend dozens of drug traffickers.

"With the names I provided they were able to arrest more than 50 people, and they took millions of dollars from drug proceeds from U.S. streets," he said. "In spite of that, I'm jailed here without any protection and without any guarantee that I will stay in the United States."

Mr. Ramírez, 35, is being held by the U.S. government at an undisclosed location in the Midwest, fighting deportation to Mexico, where he insists he faces "certain death."

U.S. authorities characterize him as a renegade informant whose independent actions led, in part, to the August 2004 killing of an El Paso man, Abraham Guzmán, outside a hamburger restaurant in that border city.

Mr. Ramírez made his remarks in a written response to questions submitted through his attorney, Jodi Goodwin. He had agreed to speak with reporters from The Dallas Morning News, which first reported about his role in the cartel killings in March 2004; the Mexico city weekly magazine Proceso; the London Observer; and Narco News, an Internet blog, but prison officials transferred him hours before the scheduled interview.

He apparently was moved at the request of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, the agency he served as an informant for four years, Ms. Goodwin said.

Implicating officers

Mr. Ramírez, in confidential memos to ICE, had described how he infiltrated Mexico's powerful Juárez drug cartel and on two occasions witnessed cartel-ordered assassinations and supervised disposal of the victims, including a U.S. citizen. The bodies were found in January 2004 buried in the yard of a Juárez home.

In his latest comments, Mr. Ramírez said the killings usually were carried out by night-shift Mexican police officers working for the cartel and using the nickname "La Linea," or The Line.

"Not all the victims were assassinated at the same house," Mr. Ramírez said. "Some were left on the streets. They would kill people all the time, people who were not buried in [the same house], but in other homes too." He said there were "many more" killings but did not elaborate.

Mr. Ramírez insists he played no direct role in any killing, but critics of his role with ICE have said he was not just a spectator, as agency officials have said.

Reports in The News about his role in the cartel killings rocked the El Paso office of ICE, where four special agents were investigated and two supervisors were transferred. ICE is part of the Department of Homeland Security.

"The U.S. government is afraid of Lalo's mouth," said Ms. Goodwin, "afraid that Lalo will tell the whole story, which will say that every step he took, every move he made, was with the full knowledge of his ICE handlers."

Mr. Ramírez says he would like to be placed in a witness protection program or sent to Europe.

On Aug. 5, 2005, a U.S. immigration judge granted his petition to stay, agreeing that he would face danger in Mexico. The U.S. government, which initially concurred, appealed that decision and now wants him deported. An appeals court overturned the judge's ruling, and Ms. Goodwin is now appealing that decision.

"Am I angry at the U.S. government?" Mr. Ramírez wrote. "No. I'm sad, hurt that after everything I did for ICE they now want to deport me back to Mexico to face a certain death."

ICE officials had no comment. Spokeswoman Leticia Zamarripa said The News' request for comment "was going through the normal review process" and no immediate response was available.

The agency's relationship with Mr. Ramírez was part of an ambitious undercover investigation aimed at snaring Vicente Carrillo Fuentes, then reputedly Latin America's most powerful drug lord.

Misconduct allegations

Critics of the operation have asked whether ICE agents could have prevented some of the killings across the border, and exactly what and when the U.S. attorney's office knew about the killings.

Questions have been raised specifically about the roles of Johnny Sutton, the U.S. attorney in San Antonio, and Juanita Fielden, assistant U.S. attorney in El Paso.

Sandalio González, former Drug Enforcement Administration agent in charge in El Paso, says Mr. Sutton ignored allegations of misconduct by ICE and Ms. Fielden that Mr. González outlined in a lengthy memo to the U.S. attorney's office and the ICE chief in El Paso. He says Mr. Sutton instead used his office to retaliate against Mr. González, who later retired.

"They were not interested in investigating the allegations in my letter; they were more interested in jamming me for writing the letter," Mr. González said.

Mr. Gonzalez made his allegations against Mr. Sutton and Ms. Fielden through the Merit System Protection Board in 2004. The News obtained the document containing his allegation through a Freedom of Information Act request.

Calls to Mr. Sutton's office in San Antonio were not returned. Ms. Fielden's office referred questions to Mr. Sutton.

Two years ago, ICE ordered an internal investigation to restore confidence in the El Paso office. Its findings remain confidential, but top supervisors Patricia Kramer and Giovanni Gaudioso were transferred to Washington. Two other agents were temporarily suspended, and Mr. Ramírez's main handler, Raul Bencomo, remains on administrative leave.

According to court affidavits, the agents said they were not told of the killings beforehand.

"What's clear is, Lalo will haunt us for a long, long time," said an ICE official, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Right-hand man

Guillérmo Eduardo Ramírez Peyro is a native of Mexico City and a former highway police officer in the southern state of Guerrero. In the late 1990s, he turned to the drug trade, developing schemes to help smuggle cocaine into the United States. In 2000, he started working as a U.S.-paid drug informant. He says that he earned $224,650 over a four-year period and that ICE still owes him $200,000 for various cases.

For an agency eager to bring down Mr. Carrillo Fuentes, Lalo was a major find. He was the right-hand man of Heriberto Santillán Tabares, considered a top operative in the Juárez cartel.

Among the scores of traffickers he helped bust was Mr. Santillán, who was sentenced to 25 years in prison in a plea bargain with U.S. prosecutors. In the deal, murder charges against Mr. Santillán were dropped.

Mr. Ramírez said he played the role of drug trafficker to help the U.S. government dismantle the cartel. He said he was in constant contact with his American overseers, talking to them three or four times a day. He said he occasionally briefed other U.S. agencies, including the FBI, the DEA and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives.

El Paso FBI spokeswoman Andrea Simmons said, "We don't confirm or deny whether we talk with certain people or whether we had any briefings with those people." ATF did not return calls seeking comment.

Mr. González said DEA agents met with the informant for briefings but were not told of his role in the killings.

Mr. Ramírez also alleged, in the responses through his lawyer, that some U.S. Customs inspectors and some members of the DEA had links to the drug cartel.

He said he turned over to his minders recordings of conversations in which Mr. Santillán talked about connections between the cartel and the "three letter" agency – which he took as a reference to the DEA – and the fact that "Vicente Carrillo Fuentes had absolutely no worries about the DEA."

David Monnette, DEA spokesman in El Paso, said: "We hold our workforce to the highest ethical standard, and we regard the ethical performance of duty as our first priority. We take very seriously any allegation of misconduct, abuse of position, or criminal action, and we continue to ensure the fair and impartial administration of justice and uphold the integrity and reputation of our outstanding workforce."

Mr. Sandalio, the former El Paso DEA chief, said: "That's entirely possible that the cartel had a hook in DEA. I'm not going to sit here and tell you there is no corruption in our government. Obviously there is."

'They knew everything'

Regarding the Abraham Guzmán case, Mr. Ramírez denied that he engaged in any freelancing that would have resulted in that slaying. He said that while he was in protective custody in San Antonio, his supervisor, Mr. Bencomo, implied that he should return to the border to help on a case involving a corrupt customs inspector. He said he was told the agency needed him to collect $25,000 owed to the inspector. Mr. Ramírez said he instead sent Mr. Guzmán, who was shot to death.

"They knew everything," he said. "For them to say I acted on my own is false."

DOJ_NMG_0081716

Mr. Bencomo's attorney, Mary Stillinger, rejected that version of events. "That is absolutely not true," she said. "Agent Bencomo had no idea he [Lalo] was coming to El Paso. He was specifically told not to do that."

In his written responses, Mr. Ramírez also rejected assertions Ms. Fielden made in an affidavit that it was only in late January 2004 that she knew the extent of the informant's role in slayings in Juárez. And he said that far from telling him to stop participating in such criminal activity, his ICE handlers had only one request: that he not tape any future killings. He said he had used hidden microphones to record cartel activities.

The former U.S. informant also impugned authorities in Mexico, saying he worked with corrupt local, state and federal officials, as well as members of the military.

"The Mexican government, the police, the military," he said. "They are the cartel."

In a sworn statement dated Aug. 11 and filed in federal court in Bloomington, Minn., Mr. Ramírez said he was told that the office of the Mexican president had an arrangement with a cartel. He said that Mr. Santillán "explained to me that President [Vicente] Fox took the position to arrange, consult with, the cartel from Juárez. ... He was going to attack the enemy cartels, being from Tijuana and from the Gulf, and then the cartel from Juárez would be operating ... without the government being ... on top of them."

Mr. Ramírez said he personally made arrangements with Colombian drug traffickers to transport drugs with the help of the Mexican navy and federal agents

The Mexican government flatly denied the allegations.

"Obviously there is no substance to what this man is saying," said Ricardo Cabrera, assistant to the government's top organized crime investigator, José Luis Santiago Vasconcelos. "We have been lauded by the U.S. government for our continuous fight against all drug cartels. This person is saying these things, making allegations of corruption, to save his case and fight deportation to Mexico."

IMMIGRATION:

Immigrant Convict Data Sought Information Should Be Public, Cox Says (AJC)

By Rebecca Carr, Cox Washington Bureau

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, October 15, 2006

Washington — A federal court of appeals hears oral arguments Tuesday in a case that has broad implications in the debate over illegal immigration and the public's right to know about illegal immigrant convicts who have not been deported as required by law.

Cox Newspapers is asserting in its appeal that the Justice Department should release the names, birthdates and identity numbers of illegal immigrants who have served prison time for serious crimes, including child molestation, manslaughter, drug dealing and drunken driving.

Cox, which includes The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, revealed in a published report four years ago that hundreds of felons were never picked up in Georgia by immigration officials after serving their sentences.

The Justice Department says that it has turned over some of the information requested by Cox under the Freedom of Information Act, which requires federal agencies to disclose government records to the public. The department gave Cox information about the illegal immigrants, including convicts' native country, date taken into custody and date of release, according to legal briefs filed in federal court.

But divulging personally identifiable information such as their full name, date of birth, alien registration number and FBI number would invade the privacy of convicted illegal immigrants and serve no public interest, Justice Department lawyers wrote in legal briefs.

The case raises the question of whether illegal immigrants should be granted the same privacy protections that citizens and legal residents have in the Freedom of Information Act.

The U.S. Supreme Court has ruled that privacy protections extend to personally identifying information and they encompass criminal convictions that are a matter of public record, Justice Department lawyers wrote in a legal brief.

The release of additional information would permit the public to connect the records with individuals, the Justice Department argued, creating a clearly unwarranted invasion of their privacy. One of the department's main arguments against disclosure is the possibility of error — that a person would be wrongly identified as an illegal immigrant.

The lawsuit was filed by the Washington bureau of Cox Newspapers, one of the nation's largest publishing companies with 17 daily and 25 weekly newspapers.

DOJ_NMG_0081717

U.S. District Judge Richard J. Leon issued a summary judgment ruling on Sept. 27, 2005, in favor of the Justice Department's decision to turn down Cox's request for personal information about the illegal immigrant convicts.

In that decision, Leon wrote that the privacy interest of the convicted illegal immigrants "far outweighs the public interest that might be served from disclosing this information."

Cox is appealing that decision in the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit, saying that the public has the right to know if the government has been derelict in its duty to deport convicts who are here illegally. The public also has the right to know if the convicts have repeated their crimes, according to Cox lawyers Jonathan D. Hart and Michael Kovaka.

The Cox lawyers argue that the lower court failed to identify the harm that would come from disclosing the names of the convicted felons who evaded deportation.

"Established notions of privacy confirm that criminals generally have no legitimate privacy interest in limiting public knowledge of their crimes," Hart and Kovaka wrote in a legal brief filed with the court.

Hart and Kovaka argue that criminal convictions are already a matter of public record.

Illegal immigrants do not have the same privacy rights as citizens and legal residents, Hart and Kovaka wrote. Indeed, the lawyers wrote, Congress specifically excluded undocumented aliens from the protections in the Privacy Act.

The case is important to the public because the information contained in the government database reveals that federal immigration officials are failing to properly execute the law, Kovaka said in an interview.

"At the very least this is an egregious inability of the government to fulfill its own obligations under the law and it is endangering the public," Kovaka said.

Cox's quest for information about illegal immigrants goes back four years.

On Dec. 15, 2002, the Cox Washington Bureau published an article in The Journal-Constitution that revealed that 20 percent of the illegal immigrants who had been incarcerated in Georgia's prison system were set free instead of being deported as required by federal law after serving their time.

At least eight of the criminals were convicted of molesting children, others for dealing drugs and robbery.

The Cox Washington Bureau filed a request for records under the Freedom of Information Act on Sept. 12, 2003, seeking records from the Justice Department about the State Criminal Alien Assistance Program.

The program keeps data on illegal immigrants in the prison system to reimburse states and localities for the costs related to the incarceration of illegal immigrants.

The Border Dividing Arizona (NYT)

By Joseph Lelyveld

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

When House Republicans calculated that their best bet for saving their majority was to run this fall as if illegal immigration and border security were the most urgent issues facing the country — bigger by far than that great unmentionable, Iraq — they were finally speaking the language of a Republican state legislator from Mesa, Ariz., named Russell Pearce. The Arizonan was there before Tom Tancredo, the Colorado congressman who talks of making a run for the White House on the issue; there before even Lou Dobbs and Rush Limbaugh if not Pat Buchanan. A fast-talking former cop, Pearce went into electoral politics only after it became clear that he wouldn't soon be able to realize his dream of becoming sheriff of Maricopa County, the area around Phoenix where more than half of Arizona lives. As a lawmaker, Pearce hasn't just embraced the issue of illegal immigration as a tactic; for him it's a passion — his opponents say an obsession — "the root cause" of almost any other problem Arizona and the nation face. Talk about terrorists and high crime rates, he'll say the border is undefended. Are schools failing? They're being overwhelmed by "a population that don't put a high value to education." Are there a million people in Arizona without health care? "Yeah, they broke into the country illegally. They came into the country poor, they're gonna stay poor. You've imported them!"

Russell Pearce's single-mindedness has proved to be a force in Arizona, setting the political agenda, helping to make illegal immigration the single most important and contested issue in the state. "He's in the catbird seat," a Democratic officeholder conceded last spring. Pearce can point to nine bills on illegal aliens that he has helped drive to passage in the State Legislature: to authorize major expenditures of state money on border enforcement, normally a federal responsibility; to deprive "undocumented" residents of social services; to ban Spanish as a language of communication by state agencies and officials; to define being in the state illegally as "trespass," a misdemeanor on the first offense and a felony on the second; to empower the local police to enforce immigration law. But nine times, the Democratic governor, Janet Napolitano, has turned him back with vetoes on crisply asserted fiscal and constitutional grounds, urging him and his Republican supporters to stop playing "political games."

"Shame, shame, shame on those who continue to ignore the No. 1 issue facing America," Pearce fumed last month when I visited his office at the State Capitol in Phoenix, which displayed not one but two portraits of John Wayne. The anathema he pronounced was intended not just for his governor but also for the Republican president and the Republican sponsor of the immigration-reform bill the president had backed; in Pearce's terms, "the treacherous, treasonous bill" the Senate passed in March. It was known as the McCain-Kennedy bill, McCain being, of course, Arizona's senior senator and, it is presumed, a leading contender for the 2008 Republican presidential nomination. And it contained two provisions Russell Pearce could not abide: a path to citizenship for longtime residents who, after entering illegally, held steady employment, learned English and paid their taxes (plus fines to be levied for entering the country without a visa); and an opening for hundreds of thousands of temporary "guest workers" to come across legally for limited periods of work.

Was he saying that John McCain himself was "treacherous, treasonous?" I asked, interrupting Pearce's discourse in midflow.

"Yes, I am," he replied, not pausing for breath as he raced on.

In Arizona, it becomes evident, the battle over illegal immigration is, in one of its dimensions, a battle over the future of the Republican Party in the state and, because of McCain's ambitions, nationally as well. It also becomes evident that what anti-immigrant zealots call an "invasion" is taking place not in spite of federal policies but, at least in Arizona, partly because of them. For 12 years the Border Patrol has deliberately funneled the immigrant flow away from settled urban areas like El Paso and San Diego (and, later, small Arizona border communities like Douglas and Nogales) into the Arizona deserts, where intruders can be more easily spotted, tracked and apprehended by its officers, using everything at their disposal, from high-tech sensors and drones to helicopters, jeeps, floodlights and horses. The number of arrests in Arizona alone has been running at more than half a million a year (slightly more than California, Texas and New Mexico combined for three years running). The number of arrests is larger than the number of individuals who get caught, since many are stopped two or three times. By the same token, it is almost certainly smaller than the number who eventually make it past the patrols — by a factor of two, three or four, depending on who's doing the extrapolating in order to score what point. The average number of arrests on Arizona's 376-mile border works out to more than 1,400 a day over the last two years. An Arizona politician running on the border crisis can therefore safely assert, since no one really knows, that 5,000 or 6,000 illegal aliens cross into the state every night.

What cannot be disputed is that year after year, hundreds die in the desert, usually from hyperthermia (267 by the official count in fiscal year 2005, and 199 for almost the same period in 2006). Among the people who make themselves heard on radio talk shows and in Internet postings, there are some who argue that the intruders get what is coming to them. "Break the law, pay the price. And another one bites the dust!" said a posting by a reader reacting to another report of a death in the desert. After crosses were displayed at a small pro-immigrant rally in Phoenix on Labor Day to commemorate the dead, a talk-show host named Bruce Jacobs, who speaks about little besides the "invasion" on his drive-time program on the Phoenix station KFYI, objected furiously to the display, in an accent that betrayed his own distant origins, in Ronkonkoma, on Long Island. "Whites didn't kill these people, America didn't kill these people," he said, his voice rising. "They killed themselves!" He meant that they'd be alive if they had stayed where they belonged, instead of giving in to the siren call of gainful employment in the globalized economy promoted by the United States.

So there's enough raw feeling out there and enough raw reality — or so you'd think — to make a state that has become the main thoroughfare for illegal border traffic responsive to the electoral line of House Republicans. While there were probably enough votes in the House last spring to enact some version of McCain-Kennedy had it been brought to the floor, that would have taken an ad hoc bipartisan coalition of Democrats and moderate Republicans — something the current House leadership forbids, allowing bills to come to a vote only when "a majority of the majority" supports them. The majority of the majority, responding to what's called its "base," wants to seal the border and deny permanent residence — which they say would amount to "amnesty" — to the uncounted millions of "illegals" already in the country; estimates run from 8 million to 11 million to more than 20 million (roughly half of whom happen not to have crossed the border on foot but simply overstayed visas).

Surely a red state that has supported a Democrat only once in the last 14 presidential elections might rally to such a program. But then how come Governor Napolitano, who's up for re-election next month, was so obviously unfazed by a showy visit by the House Republican leadership, including Speaker Dennis Hastert, to the border last summer and two hearings that were staged in her state as a way of whipping up support for the caucus's position? "If they don't know about the border by now, they don't want to know," she told me dismissively, spreading out her hands with the palms up and mugging a humorous look that said something like, "Who do they think they're kidding?" Then, realizing that my recording device could not capture her look, she filled in the blank with a sound culminating in a loud laugh. "Pshaw," she said. "That's how I'd describe it. Pshaw!" What was needed from Congress was a workable reform, she said, not more posturing.

A former U.S. attorney and state attorney general — described by her opponents as well as her supporters as "smart" and "tough" — Napolitano has been dealing with immigration issues for a dozen years. Political photo ops by newcomers to the border don't impress her. For all the Republican efforts to nail her on immigration, it will be a huge upset if she's beaten. Does she know something the majority of the majority in Washington has yet to figure out?

And how come, if the issue of illegal immigration is the House majority's ticket to remaining in power, its own creature, the National Republican Campaign Committee, was spending money in the Republican primary held last month to defeat one of Russell Pearce's most conspicuous allies, a down-the-line, seal-the-border, anti-immigrant crusader named Randy Graf, in the one House race in Arizona in which a seat was clearly up for grabs? A self-proclaimed Minuteman, running in the Eighth Congressional District — a border district in the southeastern corner of the state, the very one that gave rise to the volunteer militia known as the Minuteman Project — Graf was leading in polls of likely primary voters. Yet the smart money in both parties seemed to be betting that a Graf victory would guarantee that the seat, Republican for the last 22 years, would swing Democratic. So while national parties normally steer clear of local primaries — and virtually never intervene in the other party's — out-of-state Republican money was flowing in the Eighth to a moderate with a "common sense" approach to immigration issues not unlike John McCain's, while national Democratic money, in a peculiar twist, was paying for ads portraying that same moderate as a wimp on illegals, in hopes of putting the supposedly beatable Randy Graf over the top in the other party's primary.

In talking tough on the border and on illegal immigration, Republican candidates can be said to be running against themselves. After all, they control the White House, along with both chambers of Congress, which so far this year have produced two irreconcilable pieces of legislation and therefore a stalemate. The cleavage in the party is between those who want to systematize the country's widening dependence on foreign labor (the Senate version) — to try to take the "illegal" out of illegal immigration — and those who want to slam the door (the House version). Every 10 years or so Washington is seized with the issue of immigration, and eventually a complicated, contradictory law is produced, making matters worse. After supposed reforms in 1986 and 1996, it became conspicuously harder for migrants to come and go on a seasonal basis; therefore they stayed and, at great hardship and cost, brought their families. The systematizers talk about the needs of a global economy while more and more alien workers, depending on forged Social Security cards and driver's licenses, get paid off the books by subcontractors. Taking a more populist stand, Republican door-slammers call for a crackdown on employers who have become addicted to cheap labor, just as union leaders once did before union jobs were shipped abroad.

In a border state like Arizona, this history is not unknown; the promise of reform and the promise of enforcement are each viewed with a certain amount of skepticism. Besides, red states are seldom red all over; often they have patches of blue, especially around large cities and universities. Arizona's Eighth is decidedly purple. It takes in much of Tucson, which is liberal by Phoenix standards, and runs to the edge of the University of Arizona campus. Republicans have a registration edge, but nearly one-third of its voters call themselves independent. Many in older generations can remember voting for Morris Udall, a venerated liberal Democrat. Also worth mentioning may be the fact that its 9,000 square miles all belonged to Mexico until the 1853 Gadsden Purchase established the border where it now stands.

Since 1984, the district has been represented by Jim Kolbe, a friend of John McCain and like McCain a U.S. Navy Vietnam vet. Kolbe has been considered a leader on Capitol Hill in fights for the North Atlantic Free Trade Agreement and programs to combat AIDS in Africa. Ever since a gay publication threatened to out him 10 years ago, the congressman has lived with a label: "the only openly gay Republican in Congress." (For an example of the spread of knowledge in the information age, type those words into Google; you're instantly informed you have 958,000 "results.") Arizona's Eighth faithfully re-elected Kolbe thereafter and, having come out, he was quietly forthright on issues touching on sex and sexual orientation, identifying himself as pro-choice and a supporter of same-sex marriage. Kolbe seemed invulnerable, but in the 2004 Republican primary he got a bad scare from Randy Graf, who, running to his right on immigration and border issues, pulled in nearly 43 percent of the vote.

Last year Kolbe announced he was stepping down. When I visited his office on Capitol Hill in June, he insisted that he could have beaten Randy Graf by a wider margin in a rematch. Graf and the immigration issue, Kolbe told me, hadn't driven him from politics. ("I want to get out while people are still urging me to stay," he said. "I want to get out while I can walk out and not be carried out of here.") Kolbe had already endorsed one of Graf's primary opponents, Steve Huffman. He would never support Graf, he vowed. If, despite his best efforts, his old opponent took the nomination, Congressman Kolbe said, it was "an absolute certainty, guaranteed" that the seat would go Democratic. The Eighth could never be won, he said, by a "know-nothing party person — anti-immigrant, anti-abortion, anti-stem-cell-research, anti-gay-rights, anti-everything, right down the line."

Randy Graf is anti all those things, but his disposition is sunny and easygoing in a Midwestern way. He informs you pleasantly that he was born in St. Vincent's Hospital in Green Bay, Wisc., two months before Vince Lombardi became head coach of the Packers. Obviously he does not view this as a non sequitur. (Only 30 percent of Arizonans were born in the state, so it's not unusual for a politician to have been born somewhere else. John McCain, son of a naval officer, was born in the Panama Canal Zone; the state's other senator, Jon Kyl, a Republican, in Nebraska; Janet Napolitano, in New York City, then raised in Albuquerque.) Graf, who is now 47, moved to Green Valley south of Tucson to take up a post as a golf pro when Jim Kolbe was in his first term in Congress. Green Valley has a median age of 72.2 and a population, though it is only 40 miles from the border, that is 96.6 percent "white non-Hispanic," according to a Web site for retirees looking for a place to settle. Eventually Green Valley sent Graf to the State Legislature. Though many of his supporters were also from the Midwest, they were not inclined to think of themselves as migrants.

Graf's political mantra was standard for a Reagan Republican when he was elected to the state House of Representatives in Phoenix in 2000. He talked about lowering taxes, downsizing government, lowering taxes, protecting the rights of gun owners and lowering taxes. The year 2000 actually set the high-tide mark for the flow of illegal aliens in what the Border Patrol calls its Tucson sector — already by then its busiest — encompassing an area of 90,000 square miles along 262 miles of border and including all of Graf's legislative district: the Border Patrol detained 616,346 aliens that year in the sector. As Graf tells it, it wasn't the numbers or the growing presence of the Border Patrol giving chase on highways between Green Valley and the border that drove him to seize on the issue. It was an epiphany one evening in a supermarket. He found himself, so he says, in line behind a grandmother, mother and daughter from a single Hispanic family — the daughter, eight months pregnant — all making their purchases with food stamps and uncomprehending when the sales clerk addressed them in English. He had no way of being sure they were here illegally, but for Graf it became a vision of a connection between taxes and illegal immigration that needed to be elevated to a cause.

Sept. 11, 2001, added a whole other layer to this parable. "We live in a different day and age in the post-9/11 world," Graf now says. "Ninety-nine percent of them may be coming to support their families, but 1 percent of four million is still an awful lot of people."

The argument that the border must be secured because of the threat of terrorism remains largely theoretical. The Border Patrol keeps a count on non-Mexicans it detains (O.T.M.'s, they're called, for "Other Than Mexican"). Mostly they're from Central America and farther south, but a trickle can be traced to what the Department of Homeland Security classes as "special interest" countries (a euphemism that refers mostly to countries in the Muslim crescent from North Africa to Pakistan). In the Tucson sector, just 15 such persons had been picked up by Sept. 10 in the fiscal year that was about to end — scarcely one a month, a total that could easily be exceeded in an afternoon at a busy airport receiving flights from those same places. (In all its sectors, on the northern as well as southern borders, the Border Patrol detained a total of 418 aliens from the "special interest" countries in a period of nearly a year. The argument that the influx includes gang members and other criminal elements stands up better. The more difficult crossing the border becomes, the more opportunities there are for the human traffickers known as coyotes, who promise to steer those heading north to safe houses or cars driven by accomplices or relatives, at prices ranging as high as $2,000 a head. The Border Patrol keeps tallies of those it catches who prove to have criminal records, once its computers recognize their fingerprints. In the Tucson sector, about 440 a month are picked up with records of burglary, assault or narcotics charges. Coyotes, when they are caught, face charges of "alien smuggling" under the U.S. Criminal Code.)

Randy Graf's second epiphany was also not driven by numbers. It came at the start of 2004, when he heard a Republican president speak feelingly of immigrant families from Mexico who "bring to America the values of faith in God, love of family, hard work and self-reliance." Citing his own experience as a border governor, George W. Bush said that the border needed to be secured but also that a broken immigration system had to be made "more compassionate and more humane." Congress should "increase the annual number of green cards that can lead to citizenship," the president said. This was not what Graf wanted to hear from the leader of his party. He had a snapshot of himself and the president hanging in his office at the State Capitol; he turned the picture upside down and left it hanging that way for a couple of days as a symbol of his protest. And he decided to run for Congress, in opposition to what the president was calling a comprehensive reform.

Graf isn't interested in reforming the system; he wants stricter enforcement of laws on the books — "zero tolerance" for illegal migrants, those trying to cross the border and those already here. If that takes putting the National Guard on the border in a military role and giving the local police the authority and resources to enforce immigration law, he's all for it. In 2004, Graf, Russell Pearce and Randy Pullen, a Republican national committeeman, were the prime shapers of Proposition 200, an Arizona state ballot initiative designed to limit the spending of government funds on services for anyone in the country illegally. Governor Napolitano and every single member of the Arizona Congressional delegation opposed it, yet it passed with 56 percent of the vote.

An "honest debate" is needed about "changing demographics," Graf argues. The mass border crossings are not just illegal; in their scale, they suggest that the cultural identity of his adopted state could change. "You can almost say that Los Angeles has been transformed already," he says, clinching his point with an example he seems to think will cause a shudder. A half million immigrants demonstrated there last spring. The mayor, a Latino himself, supported them. Graf saw that as a warning for Arizona.

One pillar of Graf's support has been in the retirement communities around Green Valley, where few residents seemed to wonder who built their houses or mowed their golf courses. Another was in frontier Cochise County, where the U.S. Army subdued the Apache chief Geronimo, where the shootout at the O.K. Corral occurred, where the Wobblies battled the copper bosses — and where, after all that history had been turned into lore for tourists, ranchers who graze their cattle on large tracts of scrub land leased from the state became infuriated by the constant incursions of illegal aliens in large numbers. In their desperate passage, the intruders cause regular livestock losses by snipping fences, by littering the desert with plastic bottles and other debris that can play havoc with the delicate insides of a ruminant and by now and then partaking of a calf, despite the risk that even a small roasting fire might betray their whereabouts. The Graf campaign got under way in the county in 2004 at about the same time as the Minuteman Project; inevitably, they formed an alliance — the candidate, having declared himself a Minuteman, receiving the endorsement of the movement's leader, Chris Simcox.

I'd encountered Minutemen at the Hispanic rally at the Capitol in Phoenix on Labor Day, which failed dismally to attract a respectable fraction of the estimated 150,000 who turned out on Phoenix's streets in May waving banners and signs that said, somos america or we are america. This time the signs of the counterdemonstrators were almost as conspicuous. you are central americans, we are north americans, you are trespassers, so — vacate — leave, a Minuteman placard demanded. what part of illegal don't you understand? asked another. I hadn't gotten far trying to chat with the people planted under those signs, so I asked Randy Graf to introduce me to a Minuteman. To my surprise, he managed to match me up with one from my part of the country, a former consultant on new product lines who once worked in Manhattan and last lived near Princeton, N.J., before retiring in Sonoita, where he now tended several head of longhorn cattle as a hobby.

No other houses or human activities are visible in the view through the picture windows of Gene Cafarelli's spacious high-ceilinged stucco home, exquisitely sited on a piece of what was once a 2,000-acre ranch, now divided into two dozen parcels for high-end dwellings like his, none of which are supposed to be visible from any other. What you see is not obviously different from what a Spanish conquistador passing this way in the 16th century might have seen — a long view across a rolling valley, usually dun-colored but now, in September, turned green by the heaviest rainy season in years, to the Whetstone Mountains shimmering at a distance. But when Cafarelli goes out at night, he packs a gun, something he never thought to do in New Jersey.

Although he has had no direct encounters with migrants, he senses their presence. Some of his neighbors have had their homes broken into while they were away; necessities like food and clothing were seized, tradable luxuries like TV's and laptops left behind. Elderly neighbors have heard Spanish outside their windows at night; the serene landscape is actually teeming. Cafarelli imagines that he was often at close quarters with illegal immigrants when he commuted to New York, but he didn't recognize the look. Now he thinks he would. If there's a problem of racism, it's the racism of the Mexican ruling classes, he thinks, cynically pleased as they are to export their poor in return for dollar remittances in the billions that the laborers then send home.

The Minuteman Project was in part symbolic, he acknowledged, a way of calling attention to the failure of government to secure the border. The volunteers have no power of detention; they can only call the Border Patrol when they spot intruders through their night-vision binoculars. (In fact, other citizen patrols have been known over the years to detain migrants at gunpoint.) Now, despite his 68 years, the semiretired consultant — tall, white-haired, bronzed — is in training with a new search-and-rescue team the Minutemen are forming. Humane Borders, a Tucson church group, trucks fresh water to stations it has planted in the desert along heavily traveled routes. The Border Patrol sends out its own rescue teams to treat dehydrated, footsore aliens. Even the Minutemen, known widely as vigilantes, have their kinder, gentler side, it seems. The day before, Cafarelli was on two four-hour training missions in the bush, returning just before midnight. Each man carried two gallons of water, one for himself, the other for anyone they might encounter. As it happened, they encountered no one.

"I've always admired people who combine intellectual activity with action," Cafarelli told me. In his mind, the Minutemen are patriots deserving of the description.

In the minds of other Arizonans, the Minutemen and the broader anti-immigration movement put at risk major sectors of the economy, which have long depended on a supply of migrants. Cochise growers, for instance, are often on the other side of the issue from its ranchers. I spoke to an onion farmer who said he expects to plant 100 acres next year instead of 200 because he didn't think he'd be able to hire enough harvesters. "They yak about securing the border, yak about 'no amnesty,"' the farmer said. "We need to secure the border, but we've got to have a guest-worker program." A builder I spoke to couldn't say enough about the work ethic of the migrants employed on his projects, primarily roofing or putting up drywall. "God, do I love my boys," he said. "Mind you, I don't know whether my boys are legals or not." He would not be surprised, the man admitted, to learn that 25 percent of them had given him bogus Social Security numbers.

Randy Graf, the former golf pro, wasn't the only self-described Minuteman running. Early in the year another offered himself as a Republican candidate against Governor Napolitano, running essentially a one-issue, tough-guy campaign on Arizona's responsibility — whatever the feds did or failed to do — to control its own southern border. Were it not for the fact that he bore Arizona's most potent political name, Don Goldwater — a real estate investor and nephew of the late senator — would have been described as a political nonentity: his campaign résumé mentioned that he'd been a delegate to one national convention, volunteered in some campaigns and served as a den leader for the Cub Scouts. Some active Republicans said they had never heard of him. But running basically on shoe leather, the illegals and the name — "A name you know, a name you can trust," his brochures said — the candidate, who proved to be a tireless campaigner, overcame a lack of funds and built a lead over the summer in polls on the Republican primary race.

Goldwater's most original promise was his pledge to empower the local police to detain illegal aliens and corral them in an encampment on the border — a "temporary tent city," he called it — where they could be put to work building fences and clearing the desert of the refuse they and those like them had scattered when they came across. When a Spanish news agency reported that Goldwater wanted to build a "concentration camp" for illegals, he demanded and got a retraction, but not before a statement had been put out in Washington by Senator McCain denouncing any plan for a concentration camp on the Arizona border.

I chatted with Goldwater in September outside a movie theater in the northernmost shopping mall on Scottsdale Road, where the desert and Scottsdale's newest housing tracts bump against one another. The theater was previewing a documentary called "The Border War," and a large audience of anti-immigrant stalwarts had turned out. I'd looked for evidence that his uncle had crusaded on the question of immigration, I told the candidate, and hadn't found any. Barry Goldwater, he said, always felt strongly about the rule of law. How was he feeling these days, I asked, about Senator McCain? "He knows he won't control the state party when Don Goldwater is elected governor," the candidate said with calm certitude. "He's facing a revolt by the grass roots."

Randy Graf endorsed Goldwater. So did Russell Pearce, one of several more prominent Republicans who'd flirted with the idea of taking on Janet Napolitano. ("I'd love to get in the ring with her," he said.) Another was Maricopa County's popular, showboating sheriff, Joe Arpaio, a former station chief in Mexico for the Drug Enforcement Administration who seems to enjoy the attention he gets when he hints he might run for higher office but then never does. (It was Arpaio who put up Arizona's first tent city in Phoenix, to house the county jail's overflow behind razor wire, making the point that there would be no limit to jail capacity in his jurisdiction. It has since become a photo op for presidential candidates, including George Bush in 2000 and Mitt Romney, the governor of Massachusetts, this year. Pearce, once Maricopa's chief deputy, says it was all his idea.) Most obvious as a potential candidate was Representative J.D. Hayworth, a late but fervent convert to the cause of sealing the border, who finally decided, he says, that in a time of national crisis it was more important that he hang on to his seniority in the House, for Arizona's sake.

Each said he thought Napolitano could be beaten. Each had a reason not to take her on. That left the little-known Goldwater facing off in the Republican primary against Len Munsil, a "movement conservative for 20 years," by his own description, whose dogged campaigning on pro-life, pro-abstinence, anti-pornography, anti-same-sex-marriage issues had won him a solid base among evangelicals. For Munsil — an able candidate but far to the right by Arizona standards — illegal immigration seemed at first to be an afterthought. But just after Labor Day, with less than two weeks to go to the primary, he proclaimed it his highest priority. As governor, he pledged, he would station the National Guard on the border, spend state money to put sensors and fences where the federal authorities had yet to put them and establish a new Arizona Border Patrol to back up the U.S. Border Patrol, which already has 3,300 officers in the state and stands to have more than 5,000 by 2008 under President Bush's promised expansion of the federal force.

Janet Napolitano watched the escalating arms race between the two far-right Republican gubernatorial candidates with wry humor and maybe a hint of disdain, from her office on top of a stubby tower that is built into the Arizona Capitol. She wondered where her opponents would find the cash to back up their costly promises. Would they raise taxes or cut programs and if so, which ones, she asked, offering a preview of her own campaign. Her way had been to proclaim, in August 2005, a state of emergency on the border and demand that Washington station Guard troops there and pay for them. She wrote to Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and, after a month, heard from a deputy who said it was a matter for the Department of Homeland Security. Then she sent a legal brief in the form of a letter jointly addressed to Rumsfeld and the secretary of Homeland Security, Michael Chertoff. All she got back was an answering legal brief from deputies with more citations of laws and policies, bland assurances of how seriously they'd considered her plea, how earnestly they recognized the problem, how deeply they intended to deliberate on it and how little they could do. Then in May everything changed: the president announced in an Oval Office speech that he was sending the Guard to the border to take on some of the Border Patrol's auxiliary duties. The next day he flew to Yuma and posed for pictures on the border with Janet Napolitano. Arizona newspapers reported that he'd embraced her plan. Republicans who'd geared up to fight Napolitano on border issues were less than pleased. Their president had made it possible for this Democrat to claim that progress was being made. (In the same way, she's even likely to benefit from the recent announcement that the Department of Homeland Security will be paying Boeing $67 million over the next eight months to develop a system combining radar, ground sensors, cameras and unmanned aircraft that will first be tested in Arizona.)

In fact, the number of border intruders actually started to come down over the summer. This may have had more to do with the heavy monsoon rains than with the National Guard. Napolitano herself suspects that some Mexicans have yet to figure out that the Guard is on the border to build roads, repair fences and set up observation posts, not to shoot border crossers. "I know people need a sense that laws are being enforced," she told me. "They get nervous and frustrated when they think it's out of control. And Arizonans got to the point where they believed — I believed — it was out of control." Those, she figures, who want to seal the border and bar immigrants, period, rather than "manage the border" won't vote for her anyway. Those who want a system that's less cruel, less chaotic are ready, she says, to consider realistic approaches.

So when Republicans accuse her of talking a good game and doing little or nothing, she'll retort, she says, "When are you going to call on Washington, D.C., to do their part?" Her idea of a workable system is more expansive than the bill the Senate passed. Like President Bush, she would go beyond a temporary "guest worker" program to a system that would allow for more visas and green cards for Mexican workers seeking permanent residence. The numbers would have to be adjusted to changing economic circumstances. Most important, there would have to be real penalties for American employers who hired illegals. Many such employers contribute to political campaigns, which may be why, year after year, Congress has withheld financing from agencies charged with making the sanctions it long ago enacted stick.

Napolitano presents herself as a problem-solver, not an ideologue. ("I think that's just so anachronistic," she remarked when I noted the absence of liberal rhetoric in her pronouncements.) Her tone is brisk, managerial; the language she uses is markedly cooler than the appeals to tradition and compassion found in Bush's several addresses on the subject. But she is prepared to ask, in response to Russell Pearce's complaints about the high costs of educating the huge number of Spanish-language children in Arizona schools, "whether we want to take a failed national immigration policy out on a child in school."

"I'm the governor of this state," Napolitano continued, a suggestion of heat now in her voice. "I've got, let's assume, 160,000 kids in school who speak Spanish. They need to read and write and speak English if they're going to succeed in school. And they've got to succeed in school if they're going to succeed in life. To me, if you don't deal with these issues forthrightly, you're well on your way to creating a permanent underclass."

Arizonans, she says, are not easily sold on simplistic solutions to the border crisis involving little besides expenditure on law enforcement and technology. Earl de Berge, a Phoenix pollster, offered some survey results from May that seemed to show that a "comprehensive" reform had its own appeal in the state: 73 percent said it should be made possible for migrant workers to enter and leave the country without breaking the law.

It's often argued that work-seeking Mexicans drawn to the border should instead find the line at a consulate where they can apply for a visa, then wait their turn. What's missing from the discussion is the realization that there basically is no such line for the sort of semi-skilled border-crossers I repeatedly encountered on roadsides from Tucson on south, forlornly waiting to be processed and taken away by ICE (the unusually apposite acronym, for an agency called Immigration and Customs Enforcement, is pronounced as one word). On State Highway 86, a road heading west from Tucson, for instance, there were 15 who'd just been hauled from two old Chevy Cavaliers that had their backseats removed and blocks of wood jammed into the springs so that the back of the car would ride unnaturally high, not betraying the weight of the human cargo inside, covered by blankets. For the Border Patrol a high-riding old car, in which only two passengers are visible, can be as much of a tip-off as one that sags. These were young men who said they'd come all the way from Chiapas in southern Mexico to find work.

Here's the data on legal immigration from Mexico: In fiscal year 2005, according to U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, a division of the Department of Homeland Security, 157,992 Mexicans were admitted to the United States on immigration visas, less than half the number that were caught entering the Tucson sector illegally in that same period but still about 14 percent of all immigrants who legally entered the United States that year. Of the Mexican total, 45 percent were immediate family members of persons who had already qualified for legal residence; another 40 percent were more distant relatives of legal U.S. residents, most of whom had to wait 15 years or more to have their papers processed, paying regular fees to government agencies to keep them pending. The remaining 15 percent were people who either got in on special visas for highly qualified immigrants with technical training and skills deemed to be desirable, or were among the small number officially sponsored by a prospective employer.

The men from Chiapas lined up next to the ICE bus had no such connections. Typical of the thousands bused back across the border every day, they may have had relatives in the United States. But it's highly unlikely that these relatives would have been legal residents. Therefore, if the migrants were determined to take the jobs that were undoubtedly waiting for them in Phoenix and points north, east and west, on construction and landscaping crews or in hotels, slaughterhouses or poultry factories, then the trek across the desert, scary and expensive as it was bound to be, would have been their only obvious and realistic way in.

Russell Pearce sees them, these newcomers, when he drives through the district he represents, which happens also to be the district where he grew up. They shape up early each morning in the city of Mesa at the major intersections along Broadway, an area that was the heart of the original Mormon settlement here. Sometimes Minutemen demonstrators show up with their placards and noisily chase them into sidestreets, hoping to embarrass the crew bosses and ordinary householders who come by in their pickups to engage them for a day or a few hours. Many of the migrants, it is presumed, are in transition, hoping to put aside enough cash to finance the next stage of their journey, which will take them to California or Illinois, Nebraska or North Carolina.

But some settle in Mesa. This is evident from the latest figures published by the Census Bureau in its American Community Survey. In 2005, Mesa — now the nation's 40th biggest city — was found to be 24 percent Hispanic, up from 19.7 percent only five years earlier. Its overall growth was 10 percent, more than half that growth obviously Hispanic, enough to give the City Council district around the Mormon Temple a Hispanic majority. (This could be read as a fulfillment of a panel in the frieze that goes around the temple, a panel said to depict "the Hispanic people. . .leaving their old homes and coming to join the people of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.")

But there are still no Latinos on the Mesa City Council and no discernible increase in the number of Latino voters. Kyle Jones, a Mormon in his second term representing the district, said he would have considered stepping aside for a highly capable Latina candidate who ran against him in the last election if he had thought she had a chance of winning. She came in third, finishing with only 18 percent of the vote, behind not only Jones but a Minuteman running to Jones's right and drawing votes from that portion of the community that is permanently riled by their newer neighbors' tendency to hold big parties in front yards instead of on more seemly rear patios, and to play loud, unfamiliar music in an unfamiliar language. Mesa is farther from the border than Cochise County. But since it's sometimes a destination, not a thoroughfare, resentments accumulate just as surely.

The gap between the demography of his district and its voter profile strongly suggests to Pearce that the new residents are virtually all illegal. In his lexicon, that makes them "felons." Overall, 7 or 8 percent of the state's population may fall into the category of those who crossed the border without going through any legal channel, accounting for at least one-fourth and possibly one-third of its Hispanic residents. Russell Pearce acknowledges that children born in this country to these migrants are entitled to citizenship under the 14th Amendment, but he thinks something should be done about that.

When Pearce puts the tax burden on Arizona citizens resulting from unauthorized immigrations at well over $2 billion, he's rolling together the citizen and noncitizen Spanish speakers in public schools. What's often missed in the public debate is the fact that individual immigrant families often are neither strictly "legal" or "illegal" but an ambiguous blend. The father may have a green card, the mother not; the older children may not be naturalized, while the younger are deemed citizens by birth. In such households, there's an abiding fear of doing anything that might call attention to the dubious status of some of its members. So a child who has been an outstanding student may be discouraged by her family from applying to college if her Social Security number, or even that of a sibling, won't stand up to scrutiny.

I met one evening in September with five young women and their mothers, residents of a remarkably rundown trailer park in western Mesa that looked as if it hadn't been refurbished since the Korean War. Meaning to encourage candor, I said I didn't need to know their last names. Lucy, a high-school senior whose English was easy and idiomatic, completely unaccented, did much of the talking. She already understood, she said, that the local community college would be beyond her reach. Her father had spent thousands on lawyers without seeming to bring the noncitizens in the family closer to legal residence. The obstacles seemed insurmountable.

"I don't want people to think we're, like, invading," Lucy said. "We're just trying to make, like, a better life."

The Republican races got a little crazy in the last days before the primary on Sept 12. Len Munsil, the movement conservative battling for the nomination for governor on the strength of his stand on family-values issues, found himself accused, in a "push poll" of uncertain origins, of having fathered an illegitimate child. This crusader for abstinence before marriage then had to confess that he and his wife had yielded to temptation and conceived the first of their eight children a month before their wedding. In the race for Jim Kolbe's seat, the congressman's designated successor, Steve Huffman, was "unendorsed" by The Tucson Weekly, which had backed him, for refusing to talk about a bungled undercover mission by a campaign aide caught snapping pictures through a window of a home occupied by an opponent's former wife.

Before the results were in, two Arizonas were put on display in events held in separate hotel ballrooms. The first was a dinner honoring Congressman Kolbe, which brought 600 persons connected to Tucson's business, political and cultural elites together in the ballroom of a resort in the foothills of the Catalina Mountains. These were people who prided themselves in their ability to work across party lines. The Democratic governor was there to lead the celebration, which included videotaped tributes by Condoleezza Rice, Bono and John McCain on big screens and a cycle of love songs rendered by a soprano, winding up with "Our Love Is Here to Stay," which she sang sitting knee to knee with the honoree. Kolbe seemed swept away but managed a response in which he bemoaned the rise of extreme partisanship in Congress and the decline of the art of compromise. He then thanked supporters, friends and relatives, ending with his partner, a Panamanian national, who half-rose from his seat next to Janet Napolitano to receive a round of applause that did not sound perfunctory.

The mood was decidedly more righteous and embattled in the smaller, second ballroom in a south Tucson hotel, where fewer than 200 of Randy Graf's supporters gathered on primary night for what they hoped would be a victory party. Testing the ability of the party to come together, I asked one of Graf's supporters whether he'd be able to back Huffman if his man lost. "I'd vote for any derelict off the street before I voted for him," the man said. An hour later the crowd was shouting: "Randy! Randy! Randy!" as their candidate claimed victory.

But there wasn't much evidence in the results of a groundswell of fresh anger over border issues strong enough to determine the outcome of the races in November. Don Goldwater, the one-issue candidate Graf and Russell Pearce had backed, was easily beaten by Len Munsil, who waited till the last days of the campaign to broaden his base by running a TV ad in which John McCain, the nemesis of anti-migrant diehards, called him "a man we can trust."

Even Graf's victory raised questions about his prospects, for his percentage of the vote was no greater than what he drew two years earlier. If the result was to be read as a referendum on immigration reform, it was hard to miss the fact that the combined vote for two runner-up candidates who supported a new guest-worker program — the Kolbe position all these years — amounted to slightly more than 50 percent among Eighth District Republicans. A portion of those voters were now likely to be tempted to defect to the Democratic nominee, Gabrielle Giffords, a vivacious former state senator, just 36 years old, who lines up with McCain and Napolitano to support a "viable guest-worker program that meets the needs of Arizona's economy." Of course she's also for "improved border security," more Border Patrol agents, more technology in the form of radar, sensors and drones. Arizona, she says, has paid a heavy price for Republican failures on the border. Like the governor, she aims to show that the immigration issue underscores the need for change in Washington; in other words, that the abiding anxiety about the border and illegal aliens can be made to work for Democrats. It may come as a surprise to tacticians in the Republican House caucus, but no candidate in red-state Arizona or anywhere else is calling for less border security.

Having battled his way to the nomination on the issue, Randy Graf's best shot now is to portray Gabrielle Giffords as a coddler of illegals, "an extreme liberal" (as she is described in a negative TV ad put up by the Minutemen) who yearns to hand out Social Security benefits to illegal aliens. (The ad even shows a check made out to "Illegal Alien.") Anything can happen in a campaign, but the first poll showed Giffords, the Democrat, with a commanding lead. Of course it's also possible that the Republicans will make little headway on the immigration issue in Arizona, or beyond, but still retain control of the House. In that case, the "majority of the majority" would be likely to continue to bar any vote on a version of the reform that passed the Senate. They'd do so out of an instinct not to cede power to moderates in their own ranks.

Randy Graf seemed to define the breach in the Republican Party when I asked him whether he'd seek Senator McCain's support. "I look forward to talking to John McCain," he said. "It will give me a good opportunity to talk about immigration with him." McCain had meant to withhold his endorsement from Graf but reversed himself for the sake of a Republican majority in the House and his own relations with his party in his home state. His endorsement was silent on Graf's anti-immigrant stand. And in fact, the senator had no plans to meet the candidate.

Straining The Stork With 300 Millionth (WT)

By Joyce Howard Price, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 15, 2006

The U.S. Census Bureau says it expects the nation's population to reach 300 million on Tuesday, 39 years after the 200 million mark was reached and 91 years after the county's population hit 100 million.

The 300 millionth person will enter a country that's much different than it was in 1967, when Life magazine designated the birth of Robert "Bobby" Ken Woo Jr. as a population milestone, naming him the nation's 200-millionth resident.

"In 1970, immigrants constituted less than 5 percent of the U.S. population," said William Frey, a demographer at the University of Michigan and the Brookings Institution, adding that today, they are 12.1 percent.

When the population reached 200 million on Nov. 20, 1967, there was no accurate tally of Hispanics in the United States. The first effort to count them came in the 1970 census, which found a total U.S. population of 203 million and 9.6 million Hispanics. There are about 43 million Hispanics in the country today, according to the Census Bureau.

The United States "was not a melting pot" when the 200-millionth American arrived, Mr. Frey said. "But we're now becoming a new melting pot."

Carl Haub, a senior demographer with the Population Reference Bureau (PRB), agreed.

The American melting pot disappeared after the 1920s and did not return until well after the government "liberalized its immigration laws in 1965 and stopped discriminating against those from areas other than Europe."

The Hart-Celler Act of 1965 did away with national-origin quotas, in which 70 percent of all immigrant slots were given to natives of just three countries -- the United Kingdom, Ireland and Germany, according to the Center for Immigration Studies (CIS), an organization that opposes unbridled immigration.

In fact, sharp increases in immigration started in the mid-1980s and have continued since.

"The 1990s had the biggest increases in numbers of immigrants" of any of the previous six decades, Mr. Frey said.

DOJ_NMG_0081726

Although the Census Bureau says the newest population milestone will be reached at about 7:45 a.m. Tuesday, it is "not going to make an attempt to identify the 300-millionth person," spokesman Robert Bernstein said. The bureau also did not identify the 100- millionth American, who was born in 1915.

He said there is no way to know whether the 300-millionth person will be a baby born in this country, an immigrant who arrives here by plane or an illegal alien who surreptitiously crosses the border from Mexico.

The Census Bureau based its estimate of when the U.S. population will reach 300 million on the expectation that the nation will register one birth every seven seconds and one death every 13 seconds, while net international migration is expected to add one person every 31 seconds. The result is an increase in the total population of one person every 11 seconds.

The United States will join China and India as the third country to be home to at least 300 million people.

For weeks, Mr. Frey has predicted that the "300-millionth person will be a Hispanic male born to immigrant parents in Los Angeles County on October 17."

Mr. Frey bases his prediction on the fact that Hispanics are driving the population increase the nation is experiencing.

Why Los Angeles County?

"Half of the growth in the United States is Hispanic, and Hispanics have made their greatest gains in Los Angeles County, California," he said.

Both he and Mr. Haub predicted the child will be male because, worldwide, the proportion of male births to female births is 5 percent higher.

However, Mr. Haub said the PRB thinks the 300-millionth person is "most likely to be a white non-Hispanic male," since non-Hispanic whites still constitute nearly 70 percent of the total U.S. population. That proportion is down from 83 percent in 1967.

"The U.S. population is growing by 2.8 million yearly, and Hispanics account for 1.3 million of that growth. But there are 2.3 million births in the majority population annually, and only 900,000 births among Hispanics. So it's more likely the 300-millionth person will be a white non-Hispanic," he said.

But white non-Hispanic Americans will lose their majority by 2050, when they will make up one-half of the total population and minorities will account for the other half, Mr. Bernstein said. By that time, he said, Hispanics will account for about a quarter of the U.S. population.

Many were shocked in 1967 when Life magazine designated Mr. Woo, a fourth-generation Chinese-American, as the 200-millionth American.

The Census Bureau had predicted the 200-millionth American would arrive between 10:58 a.m. and 11:02 a.m. Nov. 20 of that year.

Life said it dispatched 23 teams of reporters and photographers to stake out hospitals in 22 cities to await the birth. Mr. Woo, now a Harvard-educated lawyer, was born at an Atlanta hospital at 11:03 a.m., so his birth came closest to the predicted time.

But Mr. Frey said he "never bought" Life's choice, arguing that it should have been a white suburban boy, given the demographics of the time. Census data indicate that whites constituted nearly 89 percent of the population in 1960, a total that included Hispanics. But supporters of Life's pick note that Mr. Woo did grow up in the suburbs.

As for the nation's new population landmark, Mr. Frey said, "More important than the numbers are how we got there, which was through immigration and increased fertility."

The United States is unusual among many developed countries in that it consistently has an excess of births over deaths. Immigration is also a contributing factor, because so many of the Hispanic women entering this country are of child-bearing age, and they tend to have more children than other women.

One-fifth of all children younger than 18 in this country are either foreign-born or in a family where at least one parent was foreign-born, according to a PRB report. Nearly half of all children younger than 5 are members of a racial or ethnic minority, and such children are much more likely to live in poverty. Black and Hispanic youngsters top the list, with a third of black children and 28 percent of Hispanics living below the poverty line, the report found.

Mr. Frey said he is grateful to see the increased immigration, because it is bringing both "younger and more diverse" populations to this country at a time when "our own population is growing older." By 2030, he said, "12 [percent] to 20 percent of the population will be seniors," 65 and older.

But not everyone thinks the 300 million population marker is a reason to celebrate.

"Americans are not pleased with the rate of population growth," said Roy Beck, executive director of NumbersUSA, a group that advocates lower immigration.

A national survey of 1,000 likely voters that his group conducted in September "reveals great discomfort about the rapid U.S. population growth being caused by federal immigration policies," according to a statement from NumbersUSA.

DOJ_NMG_0081727

The poll showed that about two-thirds think increased population will "negatively impact the quality of life in America, such as causing more congestion, overcrowding and pollution," the group said.

The survey also showed that America's largest population groups -- whites, blacks and Hispanics -- are worried about the Census Bureau's forecast that the nation's population will grow by another 100 million by 2043.

According to the survey, Hispanics, by a ratio of 6-to-1, said their quality of life would be negatively affected if that happens in the next 50 years. The ratio was 9-to-1 for blacks and whites. Fewer than 12 percent of respondents said they thought the projected population growth would have a positive effect on their lives.

CIS spokesman John Keeley said none of that surprises him.

"Things are already pretty dire," he said. "Look at circumstances right here in the D.C. area: the horrible rush hours, the high cost of housing, the crowded conditions in schools and the increased job competition.

"Immigration, legal and increasingly illegal, have detrimental roles in this exploding population," Mr. Keeley said.

"Rapid population growth is creating a host of societal concerns; yet it is not even being acknowledged [by policy-makers] beyond this 300 million figure," he said.

The result, Mr. Keeley said, is a "population density so stultifying you can't move."

In its report, "The United States at 300 Million," the PRB warns: "If current poverty rates for minority children continue unabated in the future, then the health and well-being of substantial numbers of children may be compromised."

Mr. Keeley said it's already time to worry about the nation's staggering growth. "We need agriculture, but unchecked growth is putting stress on natural resources. This means we will increasingly confront an inability to provide food."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Air Force Memorial Dedicated (WT)

By Gary Emerling

The Washington Times, October 15, 2006

The only branch of the U.S. military that had been lacking a memorial in the D.C. area now has one to call its own.

President Bush, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and other dignitaries yesterday presided over the dedication of the U.S. Air Force Memorial -- a towering set of stainless-steel spires that pierce the skyline from a perch overlooking the Pentagon.

"Under these magnificent spires, we pay tribute to the men and women of the Air Force who stand ready to give all for their country," Mr. Bush told an audience of 1,400, including many blue-clad Air Force personnel.

"And looking from this promontory to a place once filled with smoke and flames, we remember why we need them," said Mr. Bush, referring to the nearby Pentagon, which was hit by a hijacked airplane during the September 11 terrorist attacks.

The $30 million memorial sits on a prominent hilltop east of the Navy Annex and next to Arlington National Cemetery.

Initial plans called for a site near the Iwo Jima Memorial, which sparked a squabble between the Air Force and the Marines. The dispute ended when Congress, in the 2002 Defense Authorization bill, authorized the memorial to be built at its current site.

Designed by renowned architect James Ingo Freed, who died Dec. 15 at age 75, the memorial consists of three spires -- the tallest of which reaches 270 feet into the air -- that soar skyward to evoke the bomb-burst formation of the Air Force Thunderbirds precision-flying team.

An Air Force star is embedded in granite directly beneath the spires. The area surrounding the memorial includes two granite inscription walls, a bronze honor guard statue and a glass contemplation wall to honor fallen airmen.

"This memorial has been a labor of love," said H. Ross Perot Jr., chairman of the Air Force Memorial Foundation. "This memorial says to everybody who visits, ... 'This is the spirit that helped build our Air Force.' "

The ceremony also served as a lesson on the Air Force, complete with flights by planes that served throughout its history.

First came a Stearman PT-17 biplane, with a formation featuring an F-22A Raptor ending the procession.

Officials also recounted the names of heroic airmen since the inception of the Air Force, which began in 1907 as a division of the U.S. Army Signal Corps and achieved its status as a separate military branch in 1947.

From the heroic exploits of Lt. Col. Jimmy Doolittle's raiders in World War II to the missions of pilots in Operation Enduring Freedom, the efforts of airmen past, present and future were lauded.

"The Air Force Memorial is thus a magnificent tribute to each of the 54,000 men and women who preceded us into the heavens on wings of valor," said Gen. T. Michael Moseley, the Air Force's chief of staff.

The event also included a gravity-defying demonstration by the Thunderbirds, who soared above the memorial in a bomb-burst formation and left behind only tails of smoke.

DOJ_NMG_0081728

"To all who have climbed sunward and chased the shouting wind, America stops to say: 'Your service and sacrifice will be remembered forever and honored in this place by the citizens of a free and grateful nation,' " Mr. Bush said.

After the ceremony, event organizers said an estimated 30,000 people were expected to attend an open house in the Pentagon's south parking lot, which included a concert by country singer Lee Ann Womack.

The Air Force Memorial will open to the public on Tuesday.

At Long Last, A Va. Air Force Memorial (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, October 15, 2006

President Bush helped the Air Force make a dream come true on Saturday, dedicating a hilltop monument for the service to the memory of airmen lost defending America and to those that fight for it still.

"A long blue line of heroes has defended freedom in the skies above," Bush said. "To all who have climbed sunward and chased the shouting wind, America stops to say your service and sacrifice will be remembered forever and honored in this place by the citizens of a free and grateful nation."

Bush spoke at the base of three soaring steel stalks, meant to evoke the famed Air Force Thunderbirds' "bomb-burst" maneuver, that glinted in the bright sun.

The dedication ceremony concluded with a dramatic demonstration of the real thing by members of the precision flying team. Their four jets flew straight upward in close formation and released silver contrails as they peeled away from each other. A fifth plane followed, flying through the middle of the vapors while spinning.

The $30 million United States Air Force Memorial, 15 years in the making, is set on a ridge next to Arlington National Cemetery and overlooking the Pentagon and the nation's capital beyond.

"Under these magnificent spires, we pay tribute to the men and women of the Air Force who stand ready to give all to their country," the president said. "And looking from this promontory to a place once filled with smoke and flames, we remember why we need them."

As the Air Force's history was recounted by a series of speakers, a succession of aircraft — from a replica of Orville Wright's historic biplane to an F-117A Nighthawk Stealth fighter — flew overhead.

The 17,000-ton metal spires that are the centerpiece of the memorial arc as high as 270 feet into the air.

"This memorial soars. It soars in space and in the imagination," Air Force Secretary Michael Wynne said. "These three spires echo our values: integrity, service and excellence. ... This memorial is a brilliant symbol of freedom and the spirit of flight."

Nearby are also two inscribed granite walls and an 8-foot bronze "honor guard" statue of four figures. A glass wall engraved with the "missing man" formation — a signature maneuver to honor those missing and fallen in the military — provides the only images of aircraft.

"This memorial says to everybody who visits, today and tomorrow, 'This is the spirit that helped build the Air Force. This is the sacrifice that helped defend our freedom. This is the courage that helped build our nation.' On behalf of a very grateful country, and a grateful people, it says, 'Thank you,'" said H. Ross Perot, Jr., chairman of the memorial's board of trustees and a former fighter pilot in the Air Force Reserve.

The memorial was the last major work of architect James Ingo Freed, who died in December. Among his other projects is the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington.

The Air Force was the only military branch without a monument around the capital. Efforts to change that, though, were stymied by controversy, lawsuits and congressional action until the current site and design went forward.

The memorial was first planned for a spot on the other side of Arlington National Cemetery, and Freed's design of a suspended five-pointed star won the competition in the mid-1990s. But the Marines disputed the location, saying it encroached on their cherished Iwo Jima Memorial nearby.

Lawsuits ensued and legislation was passed to prevent construction. Eventually, a new site was donated and the designing process had to start over. Freed won again with a design said to be inspired after the architect saw the Thunderbirds on television.

The design has been trumpeted for its modern appeal and its reflection of the Air Force's advanced technology.

DOJ_NMG_0081729

They all came yesterday, the avionics guys, the swaggering pilots, the military brats in shirts featuring a photograph of their dad in Guam, and those who flew everywhere from the Russian coastline to the Persian Gulf.

Frank Veale Jr., 73, who joined the Air Force in 1950, arrived with an uncle on his mind, a captain in the old Army Air Corps who died after being captured in the Philippines. Just a few feet away, Walt McGinnis, 79, from San Antonio, and his son, Kevin, 46, talked in jest about how the elder McGinnis could have easily lost it over Korea.

"He got shot at a few times," said Kevin McGinnis, a retired Air Force lieutenant colonel.

"You're never scared," the elder McGinnis said, reflecting on the moment and looking at his son. "You're just busy."

Under a blue sky pierced by a triumvirate of curved spires soaring more than 200 feet in the air, thousands of veterans and family members armed with well-traveled war stories came to an Arlington promontory and a Pentagon parking lot for the dedication and official unveiling of the U.S. Air Force Memorial. For the Air Force, which had been the only military branch not to have its own Washington memorial, the dedication completed nearly 15 years of effort to build a monument in the capital region to more than 54,000 airmen killed in action.

The dedication ceremony, which included speeches by President Bush and Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, came nearly 60 years after the Air Force's creation as a separate service. Up by the memorial, hundreds of VIPs joined current and retired Air Force brass underneath the dizzying monument. They milled about its wide base, read inscriptions on adjacent granite walls, heard from dignitaries and watched the U.S. Air Force Band and Honor Guard perform.

Down by the Pentagon's parking lot, where the jutting spires could be seen in the distance, other former airmen and their relatives toured military aircraft and visited information booths. Mostly, they ambled around, sharing old stories filled with talk of B-29s or C-141s and reminiscing about the mundane tasks they just happened to perform on historic days.

Seaton Phelps, 84, from Edenton, N.C., sat in the parking lot in a back row seat, facing the distant memorial. He was part of the Air Force's predecessor, the Army Air Corps. He served in England during World War II.

"I helped prepare the planes for the paratroops on D-Day," he said. "We didn't know what was going to happen. We just helped get the planes ready -- C-4 gliders and C-47s."

When asked what he thought of the memorial, he smiled. "I don't know how to express it," he said. "It's just nice."

Nearby, Frank Veale Jr., an aircraft radar specialist during the Korean War, said he came to the dedication to remember his uncle, an Army Air Corps captain who died as a prisoner of war. "He lived through the Death March, but then he died on a POW ship that sank," he said as he walked by a booth hawking Air Force pins and hats. "He was my favorite uncle."

Then, Veale told some stories of his own, with a brash wit and carefree attitude common among airmen. There was one about how he withstood ceaseless monsoons in Okinawa while living in flimsy tents. "But we had a Quonset hut where we went for chow," he said. "That was the one good thing about the Air Force -- good chow."

Lest he forget any close calls -- many airmen have them, and it doesn't take much to get these guys going -- Veale recalled a perilous trip from a military base in Florida to England.

"We were going over the Atlantic, and I happen to look out the window, and I see that one of the propellers had stopped," he said. "This guy yelled at me and said, 'The propeller's out.' And I said, 'Don't worry, we got three more.' But right as we landed, a second propeller had feathered out, on the same side. We would have been in the Atlantic had we not been landing."

At the ceremony, Ross Perot Jr., son of the former presidential candidate and chairman of the Air Force Memorial Foundation, told the audience, "This has been a labor of love." Indeed, the memorial once was designed as a five-pointed star to be located near the famed Iwo Jima statue, but the Marines protested the encroachment on their memorial, and the plan was thrown out. Perot, an Air Force veteran, said 140,000 people helped donate money to the $30 million memorial.

The veterans were not the only ones feeling proud. Spouses and children were there, all bound by a life that they inherited and a military perspective that they cultivated as their own. Maryruth Ormsbee and Anneliese Hollis, who traveled from Fort Worth with their husbands, Clyde and Kenneth, showed pride merely by saying what their spouses did. "My husband was in explosives ordnance," Ormsbee said of Clyde. "He put bombs on airplanes. Took them off. Blew them up."

"My husband was in radar and then in simulators," Hollis said.

"We really wish that more wives would be with their husbands. Not many of them travel with them anymore," Ormsbee said.

"I second that," Hollis said.

By the ceremony's end, Air Force Capt. Erica Rabe, 32, was standing beneath the spires, anticipating the famous "bomb burst" maneuver by five F-16 jets known as the Thunderbirds. "We don't have as much history as the other branches, but we have the same amount of courage, professionalism, dedication and patriotism, so it's about time," said Rabe, who added that her father was an Air Force pilot who recently died. "He would have loved to have seen this."

Just then, directly above the spires, four F-16s screamed across the sky, zoomed upward and curved outward, before a fifth jet rocketed straight through the middle, twisting in endless corkscrews.

One Proud Poppy ... But (NYDN)

By Thomas M. Defrank, Daily News Washington Bureau Chief

New York Daily News, October 15, 2006

WASHINGTON - At this month's christening of the nuclear aircraft carrier bearing his name, former President George H.W. Bush delivered a rousing endorsement of his son.

"I am very proud of our President," the elder Bush said in rain-swept ceremonies in Newport News, Va. "I support him in every single way with every fiber in my body."

Yet many of his closest former aides beg to differ.

Indeed, one of the worst-kept secrets in Bush World is the dismay, in some cases disdain, harbored by many senior aides of the former President toward the administration of his son - 41 and 43, as many call them, political shorthand that refers to their numerical places in American presidential history.

For five years, the 41s have bit their collective tongues as, they complain, the 43s ignored their counsel. But as the war in Iraq has worsened and public support for the current administration has tanked, loyalists of the elder Bush have found it impossible to suppress their disillusionment - particularly their belief that many of 43's policies are a stick in the eye of his father.

"Forty-three has now repudiated everything 41 stands for, and still he won't say a word," a key member of the elder Bush alumni said. "Personally, I think he's dying inside."

To 41 loyalists, the bill of indictment is voluminous. Some alleged 43 has betrayed his father's middle-of-the-road philosophy by governing as a divider, not the uniter he promised in the 2000 campaign. Others, like former 41 speechwriter Curt Smith, argue 43 isn't conservative enough.

"Conservatives want limited government, a balanced Middle East approach, a foreign policy that builds, not destroys, and general, not special, interest," Smith said. "Bush 41 endorsed all of the above. Bush 43 supports none."

A common refrain of the 41s is that 43's muscular approach to foreign affairs - what one derided as "cowboy diplomacy" - has estranged the U.S. from its allies and diminished its authority around the globe.

The ultimate sticking point for the old guard is Iraq. They cite the appointment of 41's close friend and former secretary of state, James Baker, to chart a new Iraq policy as belated vindication.

The 41s remain incensed, however, that Brent Scowcroft, 41's national security adviser and once a top outside adviser to this administration, has been demonized since he wrote a 2002 article opposing an Iraq invasion.

"What Brent said is now the accepted wisdom," a senior 41 hand said, "and everyone believes 41 agrees with him, though he'll never say it."

While the 41s do most of the finger-pointing, aides to the current President reject the criticism as nitpicking from out-of-touch malcontents.

They also bash the 41s for going public, charging much of the damaging material in Bob Woodward's new book, "State of Denial," was provided by 41 partisans.

"Nobody has a monopoly on wisdom," a 43 staffer said, "especially those whose information may not be as good as when they were in power."

The family-feud fault lines were on dramatic display at the carrier christening festivities, where both camps turned out in full force.

"We're all on our best behavior," a top 43 official joked.

A few moments later, however, one of 41's most prominent counselors couldn't resist.

Trading social gossip at a reception, the ex-aide noted that former Secretary of State Colin Powell was in attendance. "He should be here," the adviser noted. "We didn't fire him" - a barbed reference to Powell's departure as 43's top diplomat after four years of bureaucratic fisticuffs with Vice President Cheney and Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, two frequent targets of the 41s.

"Everyone knew how Rumsfeld acts," another key 41 assistant said. "Everyone knew 43 didn't have an attention span. Everyone knew Condi [Rice] wouldn't be able to stand up to Cheney and Rumsfeld. We told them all of this, and we were told we don't know what we're doing."

Another top former 41 loyalist confided that several ex-colleagues remarked on a perceived "stature gap" between father and son as they sat on the dais.

The 41s concede their broadsides are awkward for their ex-boss, but say they're motivated by a desire to protect his legacy.

In fact, the 41s suggest a singular irony: the unpopularity of the son's administration may be rehabilitating the father's.

"By comparison, the old man looks better and better," a senior 41 hand said, with undisguised satisfaction.

States, Not Feds, Tending To Nation's Uninsured Children (LAT)

Ronald Brownstein Washington Outlook

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

It's inspiring, truly, that everyone in Washington is so concerned about the health and well-being of the 93 teenagers who serve as pages each year for the House and Senate.

But it would be nice if the nation's political leaders could spare a moment for another 8,310,000 young people who appear to have escaped their notice.

That, according to the Census Bureau, is the number of children younger than 18 in America who lack health insurance.

Until recently, children had been a bright spot in a dismal healthcare picture. Since President Bush took office, the total number of people in America without insurance has jumped from 39.8 million in 2000 to more than 46.5 million in 2005. The percentage of people receiving healthcare through their employer has dropped every year since 2000.

Children haven't been immune to that trend. The share of children receiving healthcare through their parents' employer has also been falling. But until last year, government had stepped in to offset those losses.

From 1998 through 2004, the number of children enrolled in Medicaid (a state-federal partnership for the poor) and the Children's Health Insurance Program (a state-federal partnership for children in working poor families) swelled by more than 5.6 million. That expanding public safety net steadily reduced the number of uninsured children, despite the continuing erosion of employment-based coverage.

In 2005, the latest year for which figures are available, that relatively benign picture darkened. Employment-based coverage for kids continued its decline. But with state budgets squeezed, the number of children receiving insurance from public programs also fell. These twin retrenchments produced a jump of nearly 400,000 in the number of uninsured children — the largest annual increase since 1995.

Most Americans would probably be surprised by the profile of the 8.3 million kids without insurance. Nearly nine in 10 live in families where at least one parent works, according to a recent study of census data by Families USA, a healthcare advocacy group. Nearly six in 10 live in two-parent families. Almost a third of uninsured kids live in families where both parents work.

Less surprising are the consequences of lacking insurance. Analyzing another government survey, the report found that children without insurance were much less likely than those who were covered to receive regular check-ups, and much more likely to have unmet medical needs. Children without coverage were three times more likely than insured kids to go an entire year without seeing a doctor.

These trends have provoked little discussion in Washington, where Bush and Congress have failed to agree on any serious steps to reverse the rise in healthcare costs and the decline in access. So the initiative is shifting to innovative states. "A lot of these efforts are born out of frustration with Washington," said Ron Pollack, executive director of Families USA. "It's like, we can't continue to wait for Godot."

Illinois, under Democratic Gov. Rod Blagojevich, has launched a program that allows all parents to buy subsidized insurance for their children, with premiums set at a sliding scale based on income. As part of the universal coverage plan that Massachusetts' Republican Gov. Mitt Romney signed this year, the state will insure through Medicaid all children in families earning up to three times the poverty level (about $60,000 annually for a family of four).

Bill Richardson, the Democratic governor of New Mexico, this year pushed through a plan ensuring access to insurance for kids 5 years of age and younger and said that if reelected, he would extend coverage to adults (partly by requiring employers doing state business to provide insurance).

In November's election, the crucial healthcare battles are being fought over ballot initiatives in California and Missouri.

In both states, broad coalitions of public health advocates are pushing for tobacco tax increases to finance expanded coverage. The Missouri plan, known as Amendment 3, would raise tobacco taxes 80 cents a pack, mostly to cover more low-income kids and adults. The California proposal, Proposition 86, is more ambitious: It would raise taxes $2.60 a pack to provide access to insurance for the estimated 800,000 children in the state without it.

These efforts dramatize both the possibilities and the perils of expanding coverage at a state level. If the initiatives succeed, they could send "a signal nationally" that encourages other states and eventually Washington to act, notes Wendy Lazarus, founder of the Children's Partnership, a leading sponsor of the California proposition.

The problem is that, compared with Washington, states have more limited revenue sources to finance expanded coverage for kids. That has led advocates in Missouri and California to focus on tobacco taxes (which carry the added public health benefit of discouraging smoking).

But by targeting cigarettes, they have stirred a ferocious counterattack from the tobacco industry. The Missouri amendment is faring better in polls than its California counterpart, but neither is guaranteed to survive the barrage of advertising the tobacco industry is funding in each state.

From both a policy and a political perspective, it probably doesn't make long-term sense to rely so heavily on one industry — even one so culpable for compounding the burden of death and disease — to fund more healthcare coverage.

Guaranteeing insurance for all kids should be a national priority, with a national solution and a broad funding source. States are taking important steps, and could take more in November. But until Washington commits to the cause, America will continue to live with the shame of denying reliable healthcare to one in every nine of its children.

'Stakes' Rise For Bush, Even In Speech (HC)

By Julie Mason

Houston Chronicle, October 15, 2006

Tougher-talking president uses word 11 times during his latest news conference

WASHINGTON — With the Republican political message galloping out of his control in the final weeks of the congressional campaign, President Bush tried corralling it last week with a news conference in the Rose Garden.

The news conference didn't produce much news, but it did produce other noteworthy things.

Bush has been using a different speaking style lately, with more angry-sounding, often highly partisan rhetoric and stronger body language.

He grips the podium, jabs a finger and raises his voice. He squares his shoulders, mocking Democrats and scoffing at critics of his policies.

Bush, who relishes political combat, is in full-throttle campaign mode.

Key issues for Bush are North Korea and the Middle East, where the stakes, Bush said, "are really high." And numerous: Bush alluded to the "stakes" 11 times in just more than an hour in his Rose Garden news conference.

In fact, "the stakes couldn't be any higher," Bush said. "I understand the stakes. I'm going to repeat them one more time."

He added, "As a matter of fact, I'm going to spend a lot of time repeating the stakes."

The stakes are high for Bush in November. If he can't lead his party to another majority in the House and Senate, his domestic agenda may wind up as scraps of forgotten rhetoric. He could also face stronger and more effective resistance to his Iraq policy.

So far, his efforts to campaign on tax cuts and the war on terrorism largely have been eclipsed by other events — the Mark Foley scandal, intelligence leaks, a spate of critical books and North Korea's purported nuclear test.

With Bush trying to restore his political footing at the press conference, he said again, "The stakes are really high."

Bono finds what he's looking for: face timeIt's hard enough sometimes for Bush's friends and allies to get aboard Air Force One. The chance to walk up the airplane steps, pause at the top and turn for a little wave is a closely guarded privilege.

Rock star philanthropist Bono, in Chicago last week for an AIDS prevention event, noticed the president's airplane on the tarmac and scrambled into a little last-minute meeting with Air Force One's chief passenger.

Bono and Bush, politically at odds, have forged a strange friendship over the years. Bono has met with the president several times, asking for more money for Africa and help with other issues.

For his part, Bush seems amused — even when the Irish rocker turns up in the Oval Office somewhat dishevelled and wearing sunglasses.

It often draws Bush's ire when others, especially journalists, show up in similar states of dress.

Anyway, reporters awaiting takeoff on the big plane back to Washington were surprised to see Bush, Bono and model Christy Turlington strolling across the tarmac toward Air Force One together.

At the pivotal moment on the top of the stairs, Bono flashed a peace sign.

White House deputy spokeswoman Dana Perino said the three spent about 12 minutes in Bush's private office on board.

Their meeting was mostly social. Bono thanked Bush for keeping the focus on AIDS and Bush thanked Bono for thanking him.

Snow can campaign for GOP on the jobWhite House spokesman Tony Snow initially said he would use vacation days to campaign for Republican candidates in the Nov. 7 election.

He is the first White House spokesman to add fundraising to his regular duties. But the White House clarified its policy last week, saying Snow is permitted to raise money for Republican candidates while working at his taxpayer-funded job.

"Mr. Snow, like other commissioned officers in the White House, is construed to be on duty 24 hours a day, seven days a week, and therefore is not required to track vacation or leave time," a note to reporters said.

Snow's travel expenses for campaigns are paid by the Republican National Committee.

Short take·"One has a stronger hand when there's more people playing your same cards," Bush said last week, on multilateral diplomacy.

Man Allegedly Climbs White House Fence (AP-Y)

AP, October 15, 2006

The Secret Service on Saturday apprehended a man who climbed over the fence along the North Lawn of the White House.

Around 6:30 p.m. EDT, Alexis Janicki, 24, jumped the fence, said Secret Service spokeswoman Kim Bruce. He was immediately apprehended by the Secret Service uniformed division and taken into custody.

Janicki was charged with trespassing and possession of a controlled substance, which was cannabis, Bruce said. He was turned over to the District of Columbia's Metropolitan Police Department for processing.

President Bush was at the presidential retreat at Camp David in Maryland when the incident occurred.

OPEC To Meet To Discuss Cut In Oil Output (NYT)

By Bloomberg News

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

Oct. 14 — The Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries, which produces 40 percent of the world's oil, will hold an emergency meeting in Doha, Qatar, on Oct. 19 to discuss a 1 million barrel-a-day output cut, an OPEC delegate said.

The group will convene in Qatar to discuss a voluntary supply cut aimed at reviving oil prices that have fallen by a quarter in the last three months. Members will debate whether to cut actual production or to lower the cartel's 28 million barrel-a-day output quota.

The 10 members with quotas pumped 27.6 million barrels a day last month, according to Bloomberg data. Iraq is currently exempt from the quota system.

Crude oil for November delivery rose 71 cents, or 1.2 percent, to close at $58.57 a barrel on the New York Mercantile Exchange on Friday. On Oct. 12, futures touched $57.22, the lowest since Dec. 19. The contract slipped 2 percent in the last week.

OPEC's next scheduled meeting was to be held on Dec. 14 in Abuja, Nigeria.

The 11 members of OPEC are Saudi Arabia, Iran, Venezuela, Iraq, the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait, Nigeria, Libya, Indonesia, Algeria and Qatar. More than half of the group's output is from the Persian Gulf.

Competitive Era Fails To Shrink Electric Bills (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

A decade after competition was introduced in their industries, long-distance phone rates had fallen by half, air fares by more than a fourth and trucking rates by a fourth. But a decade after the federal government opened the business of generating electricity to competition, the market has produced no such decline.

Instead, more rate increase requests are pending now than ever before, said Jim Owen, a spokesman for the Edison Electric Institute, the association for the investor-owned utilities that provide about 60 percent of the nation's power. The investor-owned electric utility industry published a June report entitled "Why Are Electricity Prices Increasing?"

About 40 percent of all electricity customers — those in 23 states and the District of Columbia where new competition was approved — mostly paid modestly lower prices over the past decade. But those savings were primarily because states, which continue to have some rate-setting power, imposed cuts, freezes and caps at the behest of consumer groups that wanted to insulate customers from any initial price swings.

The last of those rate protections expire next year, and the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and other federal agencies warn in a draft report to Congress that "customers may experience rate shock" as utilities seek to make up for revenue they did not collect during the period of artificially reduced prices and to cover higher costs of fuel. They warned that "this rate shock can create public pressure" to turn back from electricity prices set by the market to prices set by government regulators.

The disappointing results stem in good part from the fact that a genuinely competitive market for electricity production has not developed.

Concerned about rising prices, California and five other states have suspended or delayed transition to the competitive system.

And voters around two California cities, Sacramento and Davis, will decide next month whether to replace investor-owned utilities with municipal power in hopes of lowering rates. Drives are under way to expand public power in Massachusetts. In Portland, Ore., the city council tried and failed to buy the local utility company.

Electric customers in other states are facing rude surprises.

In Baltimore, an expected 72 percent rate increase in electricity prices has aroused so much protest that the state legislature met in special session, where it arranged to phase in the higher costs over several years. In Illinois, rates are about to rise as much as 55 percent.

The three New York area states opened their electricity markets to competition, with different results.

In Connecticut, residential electric rates rose up to 27 percent last year to an average of $128 a month, and are expected to go up as much as 50 percent more in January.

In New Jersey, rates rose up to 13 percent this year, and are poised to go much higher.

New York residential customers, by contrast, paid an inflation-adjusted average of 16 percent less in 2004 than in 1996, a state report said. It is not known how much of that is attributable to government-ordered rate cuts, but the state benefited from huge increases in power generated by its nuclear plants and by buying power from New England plants that, starting next year, may have less electricity to sell to New York.

The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission and five other agencies, in the draft of the report to Congress, are unable to specify any overall savings. “It has been difficult,” the report states, “to determine whether retail prices” in the states that opened to competition “are higher or lower than they otherwise would have been” under the old system.

Joseph T. Kelliher, the commission chairman, said Friday that eventually “market discipline will deliver the best prices” and noted that every administration and Congress since 1978 had pushed the industry toward competition. He added that the commission recognized a need for “constant reform of the rules.”

Under the old system, regulated utilities generated electricity and distributed it to customers. Under the new system, many regulated utilities only deliver power, which they buy from competing producers whose prices are not regulated. For example, Consolidated Edison, which serves the New York City area, once produced almost all the power it delivered; now it must buy virtually all its electricity from companies that bought its power plants and from other independent generators.

The goal is for producers to compete to offer electricity at the lowest price, savings customers money.

Independent power producers, free-market economists and the Clinton Administration cheered in 1996 when the federal government allowed states to adopt the new system. The new rules “will benefit the industry and consumers to the tune of billions of dollars every year,” Elizabeth A. Moler, then chairwoman of FERC, said at the time. She said the new rules would “accelerate competition and bring lower prices and more choices to energy customers.”

But that has not happened. A truly competitive market has never developed, and, in most areas, the number of power producers is small. In New Jersey, for example, only six companies produce power, and not all of them sell to every utility.

Some utilities have decided to buy electricity not from the cheapest supplier but from one owned by a sister to the utility company, even if that electricity is more expensive. That has been the case in Ohio.

And if electricity is needed from more than one producer, utilities pay each one the highest price accepted in the bidding, not the lowest. This one-price system, adopted by the industry and approved by the federal government, is intended to encourage investment in new power plants, which are costlier than older ones.

But critics say that, as in California five years ago in a scandal that enveloped Enron, the auction system can be manipulated to drive up prices, with the increases passed on to customers. What is more, companies that produce electricity can withhold it or limit production even when demand is at its highest, lifting prices. This happened in California, and the federal commission has found that it occurred in a few more instances since then. Critics say that more subtle techniques to reduce the supply of power are common and that the commission shows little interest in investigating.

Bryan Lee, a FERC spokesman, said complaints of manipulation are investigated, but only last year did Congress give the commission the legal tools to punish manipulators.

Under the new system there have been some big winners — including Goldman Sachs and the Carlyle Group, the private equity firm — that figured out that there were huge profits to be made in one area of the new system.

Such investors have in some cases resold power plants they just bought, making a large profit. In other cases, investors have bought power plants from the utilities at what proved to be bargain prices, then sold the electricity back at much higher prices than it would have cost the utility to generate the electricity.

Richard Blumenthal, the Connecticut attorney general, said the supposedly competitive market has been “a complete failure and colossal waste of time and money.”

He asked the federal commission to revoke competitive pricing in his state, but the commission dismissed the complaint last Wednesday, saying the state had not proved its case.

Advocates of moving to the new system say that, in time, the discipline of the competitive market will mean the best possible prices for customers. Alfred E. Kahn, the Cornell University economist who led the fight to deregulate airlines and who, as New York's chief utility regulator in the 1970's, nudged electric utilities toward the new system, said that he was not troubled by the uneven results so far.

"Change," Professor Kahn said, "is always messy."

But some advocates of introducing competition to the electric industry have soured on the idea. They include the Cato Institute, a leading promoter of libertarian thought that favors the least possible regulation and that concluded earlier this year that government and electric utilities have made such hash of the new system that the whole effort should be scrapped.

"We recommend total abandonment of restructuring," Cato said. If the public rejects a greater embrace of markets, Cato wrote, the next best choice would be a "return to an updated version of the old" system.

The conflicting results among the many studies of electric prices stand in contrast to the sharp, unambiguous drops in the prices of telephone calls, air travel and trucking.

One study by the utility economist Mark L. Fagan, a senior fellow at the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard and a consultant to various businesses who favors a competitive system, found that the new system often produces better results. He found that in 12 of 18 states that restructured, prices were lower for industrial customers than they would have been under the old system. But he also found that prices were somewhat lower than his model predicted in seven of 27 states that did not open to competition.

In Virginia, a state that did not move to the new system, a report last month by the agency that regulates utilities found "no discernible benefit" to customers in the 16 states that had gone the farthest and warned that electricity prices in those states "may actually be increasing faster than for customers in states that did not restructure."

And Professor Jay Apt, a former astronaut who runs the electricity study center at Carnegie-Mellon University, found that savings from introducing competition to sales of electricity to large industrial customers "are so small that they are not meaningful."

Regardless of the debate over the effectiveness of the new system, electricity prices are expected to rise in the next few years for several reasons apart from any rise in the price of coal, natural gas, oil, uranium and other fuels.

A study issued in June by the Edison Foundation, which represents investor-owned utilities concluded that utilities would have to raise rates to upgrade local distribution systems and to finance long-distance transmission lines, as well as for new power plants. The study found that utility profit margins had thinned and financial strength had weakened. It called for relief in the form of higher rates.

After Years Of Growth, What About Workers' Share? (NYT)

By Eduardo Porter

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

JOB growth is starting to slow, and wages are barely keeping up with inflation. Five years into a relatively robust economic expansion, it's understandable that many American workers feel that they are not getting their fair share of the pie.

In fact, the share of the economy devoted to workers' wages and benefits has eroded in the United States over the last five years. But if it's any consolation, the trend for workers in other rich industrial nations isn't much better.

The portion of the economy going to the workers in wages and benefits is perhaps the broadest measure of the workers' share of economic growth. The numbers are based on how many workers are employed and how much they are paid for their toil.

In the United States, this economic slice, including wages, health insurance and pension benefits, declined 2.5 percentage points from 2000 to 2005, to 56.5 percent of gross domestic product, according to the United States Bureau of Economic Analysis.

Workers in some countries have lost even more. According to data from the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, the forum of industrialized countries, the workers' share of gross domestic product in Germany fell 3.1 percentage points over the last half-decade. In Japan, the decline was 3 points.

Over all, the workers' share of the economy fell in 4 of the Group of 7 industrialized nations.

The recent declines are hardly atypical. While there have been some periods when the workers' share has risen, the overall trend since the 1970's has been downward in most industrialized countries.

Economists have identified some important forces causing this erosion, but they are mostly perplexed by the long decline. "It's a bit of a mystery why the labor share is falling so much," said Alan B. Krueger, a professor of economics at Princeton.

DOJ_NMG_0081736

Olivier Blanchard, a professor of economics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, added, "The complete, integrated story remains to be told."

For workers, perhaps the most important question is, how long will the slide continue?

Workers in the United States appeared to get a break for a few years in the second half of the 1990's, when robust growth bolstered employment and increased labor's bargaining power. Workers' share of the economy grew 2.3 percentage points from 1995 to 2000.

But that increase proved fleeting. While the uptick led some economists to expect a similar rebound in this decade, many are losing hope.

"The longer the recovery is delayed," Mr. Krueger said, "the less confident I am."

To begin with, consider changes in the composition of the American economy. In 1975, manufacturing accounted for 28 percent of output, while finance accounted for 18 percent, according to an analysis by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. By 1995, the relative importance of these sectors had flipped — with finance accounting for 27 percent and manufacturing for 22 percent.

This shift took a chunk out of the workers' share because banks and other financial companies use fewer workers than manufacturers to do what they do, and they don't pay their workers proportionally more.

And well-known forces continue to whittle away at the workers' share. Cheap imports from China and cheap call centers in India have increased the competition for jobs. New technologies have also replaced many middle-income workers. And immigration is on the rise in much of the industrial world.

Though economists do not fully understand how these forces are affecting labor markets, most seem to agree that, one way or another, they are eating into the workers' share of the pie.

In the United States, where labor unions have lost much of their bargaining power and few workplace regulations limit employers' decisions, companies have had an easier time reducing real wages. In the last year, wages have risen only enough to keep pace with inflation. In real terms, the wages of nonmanagement employees in the United States are now 10 percent below their level in the early 1970's, according to Labor Department statistics.

In Western Europe, collective bargaining has been more successful in keeping wages up. These differences affect the distribution of the workers' share. America's low-wage labor market is virtually nonexistent in the European Union. There is no Western European equivalent of the American earning $5.15 an hour, the federal minimum wage, on the overnight shift as a convenience store cashier. A $7-an-hour baby-sitter is nearly impossible to find in London. Over all, the wage distribution in Europe is much less polarized than it is in the United States.

BUT the institutional differences have done little to halt the slide in the share of the economy that is devoted to workers' compensation.

Mr. Blanchard suggested that the decline in the labor share in Europe might have been prompted in the 1970's by strong unions pushing up employee wages — which led companies to shed workers, eliminating many occupations entirely — the late-night cashier, for example — and replacing others with machines.

"The decline in the wage share is bound to level off," said David Grubb, a labor economist at the O.E.C.D. But the question is, when will it stop falling, and how?

If historical experience in the United States serves as any guide, workers' compensation could still fall a long way. It was a different world then, but it is worth noting that in 1929, workers had less than half of the economic pie.

An Iffy Road To Lower Rates (NYT)

By Conrad De Aenlle

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

JUST when it looked as though a Federal Reserve interest-rate cut might be on the way, the Fed sent a message to Wall Street: not so fast.

That, at least, was the way many traders interpreted the record, released last week, of the last meeting of the central bank's policy makers. It revealed that the policy makers continue to be concerned about inflation. That concern had been largely lifted in the minds of traders, but the Fed's statement is likely to revive it, especially this week, when reports are due on September wholesale and retail prices.

After steep falls in energy prices, a Bloomberg News poll of economists forecasts rare price declines — negative inflation figures — for both reports. No such softness is anticipated, however, in the more widely followed core numbers, which exclude food and energy items.

DOJ_NMG_0081737

The Bloomberg poll predicts that core consumer prices, to be reported on Wednesday, will be up 0.2 percent, the same increase as in August. Producer prices, due on Tuesday, are expected to be up by the same figure, after a 0.4 percent decline in August.

Russ Koesterich, senior portfolio manager at Barclays Global Investors, warned that if the core numbers exceeded projections, the stock market might not take the news well.

"What the Fed has told us is they're data dependent," he said. "To the extent that we have outsized numbers, it's going to be significant. The market has written off the likelihood of further hikes. By talking about the possibility of cuts, they're putting the cart before the horse."

Investors' high hopes may have backed them into a corner, with the Dow Jones industrial average trading at record levels, he cautioned.

"The stock market is discounting a Goldilocks scenario: the economy will gently slow in '07 and the Fed can cut, but the slowdown will not be so severe that it will hurt earnings," Mr. Koesterich said. "It's possible, but it's very optimistic, and it's a priced-for-perfection environment."

Weighing the prospects for such a soft landing, he added, "you have to hope the market will get it, but it doesn't often turn out that way."

DATA WATCH On a busy economic calendar, readings on Tuesday for September industrial production and capacity utilization are expected to show little change.

The next day, data on September housing starts and building permits are forecast to show further declines in the housing market.

White House Upbeat About GOP Prospects (WP)

By Michael Abramowitz

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

Self-Assurance of Bush, Rove and Others Is Not Shared by Many in the Party

Amid widespread panic in the Republican establishment about the coming midterm elections, there are two people whose confidence about GOP prospects strikes even their closest allies as almost inexplicably upbeat: President Bush and his top political adviser, Karl Rove.

Some Republicans on Capitol Hill are bracing for losses of 25 House seats or more. But party operatives say Rove is predicting that, at worst, Republicans will lose only 8 to 10 seats -- shy of the 15-seat threshold that would cede control to Democrats for the first time since the 1994 elections and probably hobble the balance of Bush's second term.

In the Senate, Rove and associates believe, a Democratic victory would require the opposition to "run the table," as one official put it, to pick up the necessary six seats -- a prospect the White House seems to regard as nearly inconceivable.

The Mark Foley page scandal and its fallout have many Republicans panicked, but Rove professes to be taking it in stride. "The data we are seeing from individual races and the national polls would tend to indicate that people can divorce Foley's personal action from the party," he said in a brief interview Thursday.

The official White House line of supreme self-assurance comes from the top down. Bush has publicly and privately banished any talk of losing the GOP majorities, in part to squelch any loss of nerve among his legions. Come January, he said last week, "We'll have a Republican speaker and a Republican leader of the Senate."

The question is whether this is a case of justified confidence -- based on Bush's and Rove's electoral record and knowledge of the money, technology and other assets at their command -- or of self-delusion. Even many Republicans suspect the latter. Three GOP strategists with close ties to the White House flatly predicted the loss of the House, though they would not do so on the record for fear of offending senior Bush aides.

At this point in the 2002 and 2004 election cycles, Bush was on the offensive, racing around the country and providing public lifts to many candidates. This year, by contrast, is mostly about defense. Bush lately has been stumping for vulnerable House Republicans who, only a few weeks ago, seemed safe for reelection. Meanwhile, Bush' s own unpopularity has made House and Senate campaigns think twice about using him.

"You have to be careful where you take him," said an adviser to a GOP candidate in a close Senate race. In the past, this source said, the White House usually dictated where the president went. "They are probably more cooperative. They will go into the places and formats we suggest," he added.

To Rove and the small cadre of operatives who have been at his side throughout the administration -- including Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman and White House political director Sara Taylor -- confidence flows from a conviction that a political operation that has produced three consecutive national victories is capable of one more, despite voter disaffection with Iraq and GOP scandals in Washington.

Republican officials say the three closely coordinate strategy, with constant e-mails and a daily conference call. They see this familiarity -- in many respects it is the same team leading GOP strategy as in the past two elections -- as one advantage they have over Democrats, whose leaders on Capitol Hill and national party officials have been at odds on strategy.

So far, there have been few surprises in the Bush-Rove playbook, which seems little changed over the past four years. It includes tapping the powers of incumbency, mobilizing Christian conservatives and others in the GOP base, and seeking to polarize the electorate around national security and taxes. A huge effort to raise money by Bush, Vice President Cheney and first lady Laura Bush seems to be paying off: By Taylor's calculation, the various GOP campaigns and party committees will have a $55 million money advantage in the final three weeks of the campaign.

The RNC is also planning another big get-out-the-vote drive in the final three days before the elections. Rove believes that many of the polls in individual House and Senate races understate what he expects to be a GOP advantage in turnout, according to one party strategist who has heard him discuss the midterms.

Taylor, an Iowa native and protege of Mehlman's, said the administration recognized long ago that this would be a difficult campaign, coming in the sixth year of a presidency. "History suggests this will be a tough year for us," she said. "But at some point, the weight of our structural advantages makes up ground. And the message is really more important than all of that. When it comes to the war on terror, people have confidence in the policies that are keeping the country safe."

Polling suggests that may be changing -- the recent Washington Post-ABC News poll found that 53 percent of Americans disapprove of Bush's handling of terrorism, the lowest number he has ever received on what has been a signature strength. But in every campaign appearance, Bush continues to attack Democrats for being purportedly soft on national security.

The frustration for the White House is that, until two weeks ago, the Bush-Rove plan seemed to be having an impact. The White House used the anniversary of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks as an opportunity to redefine the Nov. 7 elections around the terrorism issue. A modest uptick in Bush's approval ratings followed, and GOP lawmakers began to feel better about their prospects.

But recent events combined to change the campaign conversation. These include the leak of a classified intelligence document suggesting that the Iraq war was complicating the fight against terrorism, a Bob Woodward book alleging administration deceptions about the war, and -- perhaps most critically -- the Foley scandal, which raised questions about whether the GOP tolerated the abuse of minors to protect one of its own.

Nonetheless, White House officials say the president plans to use the final weeks of the campaign to try to reshape the national agenda and to help as many candidates as he can, starting this week with fundraisers for Sen. George Allen (Va.) and Rep. Don Sherwood (Pa.), who is in trouble after admitting an extramarital affair.

"The president is going to be articulating the big issues and do so in a way that grabs people's attention," Rove said, although he quickly added that he believes many of the races will turn on local issues.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), who chairs the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, predicted that it will not work: "The bottom line is that people are tired of the president and his policies, and he has been unable to escape it."

He voiced skepticism that Bush is helping Republicans much, despite what he concedes is the president's fundraising prowess. "Most candidates don't want to show up in public with him, and those that do are embarrassed," Schumer said. "If Bush were popular, these races would not be close."

A key focus is Tennessee, central to GOP hopes of holding the Senate, where Republican Bob Corker is locked in an expectedly tight race with Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. (D). Bush has visited there twice, and Republicans anticipate another visit from Bush and the first lady. White House officials have also pushed Corker to go after Ford more aggressively.

Taylor, who with Rove helps determine Bush's political travel, said the president has helped raise money for some of the most endangered GOP House incumbents, such as Reps. Heather A. Wilson (N.M.) and E. Clay Shaw Jr. (Fla.). Some of Bush's focus more recently has been on helping GOP candidates who are in less intensely competitive districts, she said, citing recent presidential stops on behalf of California Reps. John T. Doolittle and Richard W. Pombo. "For Democrats to take back control of the House, they have to go to this outer ring," she said. "One of the things that's important now is to make sure this outer tier is solid and candidates have the resources they need."

Amy Walter, who tracks the House races for the Cook Political Report, views such stops differently. "It speaks to the fact that there are Republican districts that are now in serious jeopardy," she said.

Democrats Have Intensity, But G.O.P. Has Its Machine (NYT)

By Robin Toner

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 14 — Clif Kelley, a retired economist from Columbus, Ohio, is the walking, talking, fuming embodiment of what pollsters say is a defining feature of this election: the intensity of Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0081739

Mr. Kelley and a handful of fellow Democrats in Franklin County's 21st Ward began meeting about two years ago, calling themselves Grassroots 21. Today they have a newsletter, a blog and on one recent Sunday a sprawling audience crammed into Mr. Kelley's suburban backyard for a rally on a semi-rainy day.

Mr. Kelley reminded his friends that he vowed two years ago he would not die under a Bush administration. "You can see I've been holding on," he said as the audience roared.

Mr. Kelley is 89. And angry. He says he simply "can't wait" for Election Day.

Voter intensity is a critical element in politics, especially in midterm elections, when Americans' interest and turnout are typically much lower than in a presidential election year. Pollsters say enthusiasm among Democrats is particularly high this year — significantly higher, by several important measures, than the intensity of Republicans.

Republican strategists counter that they can compensate for any gap in enthusiasm with their legendary get-out-the-vote operation. The party has built its electoral success in the last two elections on identifying and producing nearly every obtainable Republican vote at the polls; this time may be more challenging, they say, but no different.

"I do think our base is coming together and will be coming together later, but four weeks is an eternity in this business," said Representative Tom Cole, an Oklahoma Republican and longtime party strategist. Republicans will ultimately be motivated to vote, Mr. Cole said, and they will turn out on Election Day even if "this is a race where professionalism has to make up for enthusiasm."

Even so, in the latest New York Times/CBS News poll, conducted Oct. 5-8, 46 percent of Democrats said they were more enthusiastic about voting this year than in previous Congressional elections, compared with 33 percent of Republicans.

A similar trend appears in recent polls by the Pew Research Center and Gallup, which show that Democrats' level of engagement is higher than in the midterm elections of 2002, 1998 and especially 1994, when a Republican landslide gave the party control of the House and Senate.

Democratic strategists consider this new intensity a critical advantage throughout the ups and downs of a campaign narrative driven at various times by war, national security scares, gas prices and, most recently, the scandal surrounding former Representative Mark Foley, Republican of Florida.

"There's been a consistent pattern for the better part of a year that Democrats are pretty focused on what they're voting for and what they're voting against," said Geoffrey Garin, a Democratic pollster, "while Republican voters are feeling ambivalent on both fronts."

Voter intensity can bubble up from the grass roots, but it can also be stoked (or dampened) by the candidates' campaigns and harnessed by a sophisticated turnout campaign.

Conservative voters have many reasons to be less enthusiastic this year, analysts say, including their party's deficit spending and the scandal over Mr. Foley's conduct toward Congressional pages, not to mention an array of local Republican scandals in Ohio. But if the Republican get-out-the-vote drive, known as the 72-Hour Project, lives up to its billing, said Andrew Kohut, head of the Pew center, "the turnout consequences for the G.O.P. might not be as dire as these poll numbers suggest."

The Republican machine was on full display last weekend in Ohio, where volunteers worked phone banks in all 88 counties on what the party called Super Saturday. They contacted 100,000 carefully selected potential Republican voters and knocked on the doors of 50,000. When the day was done, Jason Mauk, the political director for the state party, said, "I think that really discredits the notion that Republican voters and volunteers are not energized."

At one of those phone banks, in downtown Columbus, the energy level was high, fueled by endless trays of doughnuts, bagels and pizza. Shift after shift of volunteers rotated through, with a steady murmur of voices reading a script, urging a vote, offering to arrange an absentee ballot: "This is a very important election year, and your vote will help determine Ohio's future."

One of the volunteers, Laurie Sutton, said: "I hit the phone banks every night. I'm addicted to it."

At midday, several of the top Republican candidates came by to rally the troops. Betty Montgomery, who is running for state attorney general, acknowledged the challenges facing Republicans this year but summoned the memory of the Ohio State football coach Woody Hayes. "We know how to win," she said. "We know the fundamentals. He would say, 'Execute the fundamentals!' "

Ms. Montgomery recalled the 2004 election, when Ohio delivered the presidency to Mr. Bush, largely on the basis of the Republican turnout operation. "We blew their socks off," she said of the Democrats. "They didn't know what hit them."

But Ohio Democratic leaders say they do know what hit them two years ago and vow that it will not happen again. "The Republicans talk about that 72-hour operation as if it's the best thing since electricity," said Chris Redfern, chairman of the Ohio Democratic Party. "The fact is, I believe we will be competitive."

Underscoring the rivalry, Ohio Democrats said they also completed 100,000 calls that Saturday. Around the country, though, some Democrats wonder whether their party can match the well-financed 72-Hour Project, created by the Republican National Committee; some of the outside groups who worked on voter turnout for the Democrats in 2004 have curtailed their efforts, although party campaign committees insist that they have stepped forward to fill the gap.

Ohio is a state where the partisan war has raged, with little interruption, since 2004. But polls suggest that around the nation, voters understand what is at stake in these midterm elections.

Two major factors drive the Democratic intensity, analysts say: anger about the war in Iraq and other Bush administration policies, and optimism about their chances this year.

"I feel like there's some hope to get more Democrats elected this time," said Virginia Crossett, 53, a Democrat and veterinary technician in Louisville, Ky., who was interviewed in a follow-up to the recent Times/CBS poll. Half of the Democrats who were more enthusiastic about voting said they felt that way because victory was in reach.

"I think most of the Republicans are doing a horrible job, and I don't feel like my life is any better whatsoever in the last six years — and probably worse," Ms. Crossett said.

The flip side to the Democrats' optimism, of course, is that the prospect of Democratic control is a powerful motivator for many Republicans.

"A lot of issues are important to me, major issues like the war on terror, what's going on in Iraq, North Korea and Iran, immigration and the Mexican border," said Rick Nunley, 40, a Republican from North Canton, Ohio, who works in industrial sales. "Those issues will be affected drastically in the not-too-distant future if there are major policy changes or shifts in the government."

Republicans say they will keep working to harness their vote. Holly Pendell, a veteran Republican volunteer who works for the United States Chamber of Commerce, was canvassing a suburban Columbus subdivision last Sunday with her "walk book" that identified which houses to visit. The advertising campaign started so early and became so intense that people "can't even make sense of the ads," Ms. Pendell said. "That's why door-to-door is so important."

Democrats say they will be doing the same, while also counting on the intensity of the Clif Kelleys of the country. When the Democrats lost the presidential race in Ohio two years ago, it was a painful defeat to many on the local level. But Grassroots 21 has made real progress in its neighborhood, Mr. Kelley said, and "it gave us confidence that we could so something."

"What really pushes us now is the issues," Mr. Kelley said. "We're mad. I'm mad."

The group, in fact, recently adopted a new logo: the Fighting 21st.

Dems Facing Proven GOP Turnout Machine (AP-Y)

By Liz Sidoti, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 15, 2006

In the battle for control of Congress, Democrats hope enthusiasm trumps Republican efficiency.

Otherwise, they concede, they will have problems on Nov. 7 as a party still struggling to catch up with the GOP's ability to turn voters out of seeming thin air.

"Makes me green with envy," says Ellen Malcolm, the president of EMILY's List, which backs female candidates who support abortion rights. She was speaking of the Republican Party program that relies on reams of polling data, publicly available information and consumer choice records to identify likely GOP voters in even the most Democratic precincts.

Republicans most recently put their prowess on display in California, where they turned out enough conservatives in June to elect Brian Bilbray to the House, and a few months later in Rhode Island, where they motivated moderates and independents to vote for Sen. Lincoln Chafee in a primary.

Democrats hope technology is not the deciding factor in the upcoming election that will determine the majority party in the House and Senate. Democrats need to gain 15 seats in the House and six in the Senate to knock Republicans from power.

"They don't have some secret stash of voters," says Karin Johanson, executive director of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

"If the Republicans are less enthused, the independents are breaking our way, and the Democratic base is highly enthused, then we're in very good shape," she said.

For now, at least, polls indicate Democrats have momentum on their side.

Likely voters say they have a low opinion of Congress and favor Democrats over Republicans to control the House and Senate. These voters also say they trust Democrats more than Republicans to handle the economy and the situation in Iraq, although it is unclear whether that sentiment will carry over to Election Day.

An Associated Press-Ipsos survey found 47 percent of Democrats are angry at the GOP-controlled Congress, while only 15 percent of Republicans are enthusiastic about their congressional leadership. An AP-Pew poll found that anger is driving Democrats to vote.

DOJ_NMG_0081741

Getting people to vote is even more of a challenge in a midterm election year. Voting levels drop compared with presidential election years. In 2000, 59.5 percent of people in the U.S. age 18 or older voted. That fell to 46.1 percent in 2002, then climbed to 63.8 percent in 2004, a presidential election year.

As recently as the 1990s, the Democratic Party consistently won the turnout battle, relying on aggressive work by precinct captains and labor leaders in urban areas home to Democratic base voters.

Republicans started to retool their efforts after 2000 when Democratic presidential candidate Al Gore won the popular vote by 543,895 over George W. Bush. Bush won the electoral vote and the presidency, and his top strategist, Karl Rove, was determined to change how the party turned out voters.

"The Republican Party kind of stared death in the face and said if we don't figure out how to do better, we're going to lose," said Terry Nelson, the RNC's deputy chief of staff in 2002 and the Bush campaign's political director in 2004.

So, Republicans built a massive database of voters.

They compiled information about individuals that is available in public records and in consumer data that the GOP buys from vendors. Voter profiles contain everything from a person's age, address and voting frequency to their magazine subscriptions, preferred drinks and vehicles owned.

With an expansive voter file, Republicans then can use computer modeling to parse out individual voters in Democratic precincts whose consumer habits indicate they may lean toward the GOP. Republicans then can tailor messages to them based on their lifestyle habits and voting behaviors, and personally reach out to each of them to vote.

A final push comes just before an election, when volunteers with detailed voter lists make phone calls, knock on doors and send mail to encourage people to turn out — specifically those identified as most likely to side with Republicans but also most likely to stay home.

The system helped the GOP keep majorities in Congress and the White House in 2002 and 2004.

"The Republicans have about a four-year head start on where the Democrats are now," said Michael McDonald, a Brookings Institution expert on voter turnout. "The good news for the Democrats: You can catch up pretty quickly."

Democrats have been scrambling to do just that. But progress in setting up a party-centered operation like the RNC's has been slow, leading to disputes within the party and prompting allied groups to set in motion their own turnout efforts.

In 2004, Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry drew 16 percent more votes than Gore had in 2000. Republicans did even better — Bush's votes increased by 23 percent.

Karen Finney, spokeswoman for the Democratic National Committee, said chairman Howard Dean has invested $8 million in the party's voter file this year, committed $12 million to get-out-the-vote efforts and is using the same voter identification and turnout techniques as Republicans in six states.

"The Republicans were further ahead of us last cycle. They just had much better data and were able to do more sophisticated things with it," Finney said. But this year, she said, through the combined efforts of the DNC, the House and Senate committees and the party's allied groups "we will have the resources we need to get our voters out."

Absent a large-scale party-driven program, the House and Senate Democratic campaign committees set up their own voter identification and turnout initiatives using the same techniques Republicans rely upon.

Additionally, labor and progressive organizations started a turnout campaign similar to the GOP's. Coordinating the effort is America Votes, a nonprofit group that played a similar role in 2004.

This time, America Votes is supplying coalition members voter data compiled by a new firm founded by Harold Ickes, a former White House aide under President Clinton. The America Votes effort, estimated to cost $25 million, is targeting Michigan, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Minnesota, Colorado and Wisconsin.

Labor unions have pledged to spend $40 million on turnout operations, and MoveOn.org, the liberal group, says it has budgeted $12 million.

The RNC planned to spend $60 million this fall on both advertising and get-out-the-vote efforts to protect the GOP's narrow majorities.

Incumbency Is Clear Winner In House Midterms (WT)

By Donald Lambro, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 15, 2006

The overwhelming majority of House incumbents have little if any serious opposition in November's midterm elections, whose outcome likely will be decided by 30 to 40 tossup races out of a total of 435 contests.

That is the inherent contradiction in an election portrayed as a titanic battle of fed-up voters unhappy with members of Congress when, in fact, a majority approve of their representatives' performance in office and are expected to return most incumbents to Washington, many by large majorities.

DOJ_NMG_0081742

"This happens to be a year when more competitive House seats are in play, but it's still a small universe," said Norman Ornstein, a political analyst at the American Enterprise Institute. "The vast majority of members, no matter how strong the wind is blowing, no matter how much the public wants change, they are immune from it."

While voter approval of Congress has plunged to 32 percent in the wake of the lobbying and congressional-page scandals, a Washington Post-ABC News poll of voters last week found that at least 60 percent liked and supported their representatives.

"The old adage that voters hate Congress but love their congressman continues to ring true. Incumbents are hard to beat," said Jonathan Collegio, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

The number of noncompetitive House elections range from 354 to nearly 400, according to various analysts who have surveyed the individual campaigns.

"There are probably around 380 out of 435 seats that are simply not competitive at all," Mr. Ornstein said. "You still have about 30 or so that are in the pure tossup category and close to another 30 that are leaning one way or the other."

A comprehensive survey of House seats by Congressional Quarterly's CQPolitics.com said there was a "total of 354 seats (or 81 percent of the House)" safe for the incumbent party.

CQ also found that 55 House members had no major-party opponent, though most had third-party, independent or write-in opposition who were not considered a threat to their re-election. Of these 55 lawmakers, 45 were Democrats and 10 were Republicans -- "an indication that the Democrats sought to field as many candidates as possible in an election year in which the national political environment favors them," said CQPolitics.com senior writer Gregory L. Girouix, who conducted the 50-state survey.

Elections analyst Stuart Rothenberg said 59 House seats are "in play," including 51 Republican seats and 8 Democratic seats. Twenty-six of these seats, all held by Republicans, are considered "tossups," while another nine Republican seats are either favored to go Democratic or leaning in that direction.

The Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats to take majority control of the House, which they lost in 1994. That was the year when Republicans, without losing any of their own races, won a net gain of 18 seats in open contests and defeated 34 Democratic incumbents for a total 52-seat gain.

The predominant reason most representatives remain safe is redistricting, the redrawing of congressional lines every 10 years to maintain proportional representation in each district. Redistricting has become a high-tech, computer-designed art, in which the majority party in the state legislatures, armed with the latest census tracts, can move enough voters into districts to protect their lawmakers from serious challenge.

"The dynamics of redistricting still works to create safe districts in most cases," Mr. Ornstein said.

Washington Drags At Lawmakers' Campaigns (LAT)

By Mark Z. Barabak, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

Deficits, the Iraq war and the Foley scandal hurt House members seeking higher office.

LAS VEGAS — For 10 years, Jim Gibbons has represented a big chunk of Nevada in Congress, enjoying the advantages of incumbency as he coasted to one easy reelection after another.

But as he tries to move up to statewide office this fall, Gibbons isn't promoting all those years spent in Washington. Instead, the Republican lawmaker has focused on attacking his Democratic opponent as a tax-raising liberal and talking up his knowledge of Nevada "corner to corner."

Asked about Congress, Gibbons replied brusquely: "I'm running for governor." A few moments later, however, he acknowledged, "You'd have to be kidding yourself [to] think that some of these media stories about what's happening back there aren't being viewed and watched here."

Gibbons, a square-jawed former airline pilot, is one of 16 House members — nine of them Republican — who have tried to move on to either a governorship or the Senate in this year's midterm election. Most have struggled in a political climate that nonpartisan pollster Andrew Kohut described as "anti-incumbent, anti-Washington, anti-Republican."

In Minnesota, where GOP Rep. Mark Kennedy trails badly in his Senate bid, being linked to Congress is like being strapped "to one of those 15th century torture devices" that squeeze tighter and tighter, said University of Minnesota political scientist Lawrence Jacobs.

In Colorado, where Republican Rep. Bob Beauprez is trying to become governor, "the Washington burden" has all but killed his chances, said Floyd Ciruli, an independent polltaker in Denver.

Even here in Nevada, where Gibbons is ahead in polls, Republicans fret that the Mark Foley sex scandal and other frustrations with the GOP-run Congress could depress party turnout and cost them an open governor's seat in Carson City.

DOJ_NMG_0081743

"It's the 'X' factor of 2006," said Phil Musser, executive director of the Republican Governors Assn., which recently launched a TV ad assailing Gibbons' Democratic opponent, state Sen. Dina Titus, to help shore up his support. "It's no secret," Musser added, "that it's not the best year to be a member of Congress running."

Of the 16 House members who have sought higher office this year, two were eliminated in primaries, including Nebraska's legendary ex-football coach Tom Osborne, who lost to Republican Gov. Dave Heineman in a major upset. Most of the rest are locked in close contests, or else trail far behind their noncongressional opponents. (Two House Democrats running for Senate and governor in Ohio seem to be immune, thanks to the state's fiercely anti-Republican mood).

It is not just the controversies enveloping the GOP-run Congress that have burdened those seeking a political change of address, though they certainly haven't helped. Along with Foley, the Florida Republican who abruptly quit when his explicit messages to teenage House pages were made public, three other GOP members of Congress have been forced to resign during the current session, including former Rancho Santa Fe Rep. Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who is serving a federal prison term for bribery.

In Iowa, gubernatorial hopeful Jim Nussle, an eight-term Republican congressman, has had to explain the record deficits run up during his years as chairman of the House Budget Committee. Facing a tough challenge from Democratic Secretary of State Chet Culver, Nussle doesn't talk much about Washington. Instead, he stresses his years as a county prosecutor before being elected to Congress in 1990.

In Wisconsin, Democratic Gov. James Doyle has called attention to the unpopular war in Iraq — unduly politicizing it, critics say — by flying state flags at half-staff for every Wisconsin soldier killed. He has lately pulled ahead of Republican Rep. Mark Green, who voted to support the invasion.

Democrats, too, are facing guilt by political association with Congress, which is suffering its worst approval ratings in more than a decade.

In Maryland, 10-term Democratic Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin has been blistered by his Republican rival, Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, for the 20 years he has spent on Capitol Hill. "What you just watched was the problem of Washington," Steele said in a recent debate. "They run their mouths, but they do not listen."

But the larger weight of woes is being borne by Republicans. There are more of them aspiring to higher office, and — as the party in power — the GOP represents the status quo, which is not a helpful thing in this restive election season. "If you're unhappy, [elevating] a member of Congress is probably not the change you have in mind," said Jennifer Duffy, a nonpartisan analyst with the Cook Political Report.

Even under better circumstances, moving up from the House is rarely easy, said Thad Beyle, a University of North Carolina expert on the nation's governors, who puts the typical election odds at no better than 50-50. That is because most members of Congress represent only a fraction of their state, requiring them — however long they have served on Capitol Hill — to essentially start campaigning from scratch.

Such is the case with Gibbons in Nevada, even though his district — more than 105,000 square miles, stretching from Reno to the edge of this famously sybaritic city — is one of the largest congressional districts in the country.

Las Vegas and Clark County make up roughly 65% of the state electorate and have their own Democratic representative in Congress. For Gibbons, who favors cowboy boots along with his monogrammed French cuffs, that means introducing himself to hundreds of thousands of new voters — not to mention the more than 5,000 new residents arriving here each month. There simply aren't enough hours in the day, he laments, to shake all those hands.

To win statewide, a Republican needs to minimize losses in the Democratic south, perform well in Reno and Washoe County in the north, and run up the vote in "the rurals," as the rest of Nevada's 17 counties are known. To that end, Gibbons has played on long-standing regional resentments, portraying legislator Titus as a Las Vegas politician with little regard for the rest of the state.

Titus has responded by trying to wrap Congress around Gibbons' neck. Her TV ads have assailed "Washington waste," and she attacks Gibbons as a failed lawmaker who has not delivered for the state despite his party's majority status. "He's forgotten about Nevada," she said in an interview.

Titus, who has served 18 years in Carson City, contrasted her record on healthcare, environmental issues and balancing budgets — a requirement under state law — with the red ink and toxic atmosphere on Capitol Hill. "You don't see that kind of partisanship in the Legislature," she said in a Georgia twang that some Nevadans consider a liability.

Gibbons, who served in the Legislature before going to Congress, scoffed at the comparison. "Being in Carson City is like playing slow-pitch softball with your best friends," he said. Working in Washington is like "playing shortstop in a hardball, fast-pitch game in the third game of the World Series."

DOJ_NMG_0081744

Though serving in Congress may be nothing to brag about this election season, Gibbons said his ability to perform at both levels should count for something. "I think voters in the state of Nevada are quite smart and they will analyze their needs … and make a choice based on who they think is the best candidate for the job," Gibbons said.

Not, he suggested, on events 2,500 miles away.

Up or out

Sixteen House members have sought to move on to a governorship or the U.S. Senate in this year's midterm election.

Fourteen face voters in November:

· Rep. Bob Beauprez, R-Colo., running for governor
· Rep. Sherrod Brown, D-Ohio, running for U.S. Senate
· Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin, D-Md., running for U.S. Senate
· Rep. Jim Davis, D-Fla., running for governor
· Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., D-Tenn., running for U.S. Senate
· Rep. Jim Gibbons, R-Nev., running for governor
· Rep. Mark Green, R-Wis., running for governor
· Rep. Katherine Harris, R-Fla., running for U.S. Senate
· Rep. Ernest Istook, R-Okla., running for governor
· Rep. Mark Kennedy, R-Minn., running for U.S. Senate
· Rep. Jim Nussle, R-Iowa, running for governor
· Rep. C.L. "Butch" Otter, R-Idaho, running for governor
· Rep. Bernard Sanders, I-Vt., running for U.S. Senate
· Rep. Ted Strickland, D-Ohio, running for governor

Two others were defeated in primaries:

· Rep. Ed Case, D-Hawaii, lost U.S. Senate primary
· Rep. Tom Osborne, R-Neb., lost gubernatorial primary

Candidates Taking Aim At Lobbyists (WP)

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

The dirtiest word on the campaign trail this year is "lobbyist."

In close contests from Connecticut to California, Republicans and Democrats are attacking each other for getting too close to "special interests" and lobbyists. The accusation, a longtime election staple, is carrying greater heft than usual, election experts agree, thanks to the guilty plea of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff in January and the recent e-mail scandal of former representative Mark Foley (R-Fla.).

"The lobbyist has become the prime caricature for having too much power in Washington," said Evan Tracey of TNS Media Intelligence/CMAG, a nonpartisan research firm that monitors political commercials. "Lobbyists and special interests are the biggest bogeymen of this election."

Candidates and independent organizations have run more than 300 political ads suggesting that the incumbents, the challengers or both have been co-opted by narrow interests or, worse, have actually lobbied. Many more such ads are planned in the tightest House and Senate races.

In one congressional district in eastern Florida, each candidate has tried to lay the taint of lobbying on the other. Rep. E. Clay Shaw Jr. (R) upbraided his Democratic rival, state Sen. Ron Klein, a lawyer, for working as a lobbyist at the local level -- a suggestion that Klein dismissed as "a personal attack." In response, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) bought ads accusing Shaw of championing special aid to drug companies in Medicare legislation.

Maryland's Senate contenders, Lt. Gov. Michael S. Steele (R) and Rep. Benjamin L. Cardin (D), have also traded insinuations in TV ads that the other is too sympathetic to "special interests."

Lobbyists have never been popular, and Democratic leaders have signaled for months that "corruption" would be central to their assault on the GOP. But as ethical misdeeds on Capitol Hill have multiplied, politicians of both parties are betting big that voters will reject candidates who appear to be too involved with professional favor-seekers.

DOJ_NMG_0081745

"First there was Abramoff; now there's Foley," said Paul A. Miller, president of the American League of Lobbyists, a lobbyist trade group in the capital. "Corruption has risen to play a major role in this election, and lobbyists are a target."

Allegations of lobbying are as likely to come from Republicans as from Democrats. In the rematch of Rep. Michael E. Sodrel (R-Ind.) and former representative Baron P. Hill (D), Sodrel disparaged Hill for joining a D.C.-based lobbying firm last year rather than returning home after his defeat for reelection. "It speaks volumes about him," said Cam Savage, Sodrel's campaign manager.

Sen. Maria Cantwell (D-Wash.) has been attacked by her Republican opponent for sponsoring more than $11 million in earmarked appropriations for the clients of Ron Dotzauer, a former boyfriend, current campaign adviser and head of a lobbying firm.

"This is a year in which Congress has been rocked by scandal, much of it between members of Congress and lobbyists," said Elliott Bundy, spokesman for Mike McGavick, Cantwell's challenger. "We have discussed how her connections to this lobbyist have affected her official duties."

Democrats berate Republicans for their lobbyist connections with equal vigor. The DCCC put up ads in Arizona against Rep. J.D. Hayworth (R) that charged him with taking more than $4 million in contributions from "lobbyists and special interests." And in California, a group called Americans for Conservation went after Rep. Richard W. Pombo (R) for advocating the sale of public land "after mining lobbyists threw him a fundraiser."

The DCCC also paid for TV ads against Rep. Nancy L. Johnson (R-Conn.) that asked, "When Washington special interests wine and dine Nancy Johnson, what do you think they talk about?" The punch line: "It probably isn't you."

Tracey said dozens of similar ads are playing across the country. Portraying politicians as being in the thrall of unpopular interests, he said, "is an easy catch phrase that seems to work," especially in what is shaping up as a year in which many voters are dissatisfied with the federal government.

Millionaire candidates who are funding their own campaigns are particularly heavy users of the anti-lobbyist theme. Typical is Jim Pederson, the Democratic business executive running for Senate from Arizona. His slogan is "Nobody's Senator But Ours." In one of his commercials he proclaimed: "I'm even willing to finance much of my campaign with my own money to keep my independence from special interests."

Polls suggest that expressing such disdain could be a winning tactic. The latest USA Today-Gallup survey showed that no other issue topped "corruption in government" as Election Day nears: 86 percent of those asked said that corruption will be either important or very important to their decision at the ballot box -- the same percentage that named the Iraq war as important to them.

Democrats have a clear advantage on the issue, according to a Washington Post-ABC News poll this month. When respondents were asked which party they trusted to handle various issues, Democrats led Republicans on ethics by 19 points. The chief reason apparently is that most of the lobbyists and lawmakers caught misbehaving -- including Abramoff and Foley -- are Republicans.

But no one has welcomed an accusation of excessive coziness with lobbies and lobbyists; candidates invariably cry foul for fear of the political fallout. Cantwell's campaign has said the senator was helping her constituents with the controversial earmarks, not Dotzauer. Other lawmakers on the receiving end of such attacks also say the ads overlook the good intentions of their public service.

Lobbyists believe they have been wronged as well. The American League of Lobbyists sent letters and press statements to Republican and Democratic campaign committees complaining that the attacks against it are unfair, and also hypocritical because the parties are constantly leaning on the league for contributions. "If you think we're the biggest problem in the system, return our money," league president Miller said. He said no one has taken up his challenge.

Nonetheless, whenever lobbying becomes an issue in a race, both sides react quickly. In Missouri, Democratic Senate candidate Claire McCaskill aired an ad that inquired about Sen. James M. Talent (R): "What kind of a person takes $280,000 from oil companies, then gives them $14 billion" in legislated benefits? The National Republican Senatorial Committee shot back that the commercial distorted the senator's "record more than a fun-house mirror ever could."

In Minnesota, both candidates for a House seat have expressed queasiness about the lobbying that was done by a railroad to secure federal loans, including help it received from Sen. John Thune (R-S.D.). During the two years before his election to the Senate in 2004, Thune was paid $220,000 to lobby for the Dakota, Minnesota & Eastern Railroad. As a senator, he proudly championed the railroad's effort to expand a federal program so that it could be eligible for a record $2.3 billion loan to assist its expansion in Minnesota.

In the district that includes Rochester, Minn., Rep. Gil Gutknecht (R) said he is "troubled" by the process that led to the law's change and intends to negotiate the best deal he can for his constituents. His Democratic challenger, Tim Walz, said he wants the law rescinded and has made his opposition a focus of his campaign.

"Lobbyists are writing the legislation that's going through," he charged. "This is a breakdown of government in general, and the people are appalled."

An Ad Takes The Democrats' Campaign Straight To Bush (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

The September Fund, a new independent group founded by the Democratic operative Harold M. Ickes, produced this 30-second spot. It was first broadcast Thursday on CNN and will be shown in as many as a dozen competitive Congressional districts starting next week.

PRODUCER Jimmy Siegel

THE SCRIPT So what's our exit strategy from Iraq?

Why do our soldiers have to keep dying?

What about affordable health care?

Can't we support stem cell research?

Why did we let down Katrina victims?

Why won't Congress do anything?

Pass a decent minimum wage?

Why are we losing so many jobs to overseas?

(Narrator:)

O.K., it's kind of ridiculous to think you're ever going to get an answer from this (pause) bush.

But it's also kind of ridiculous to think you're going to get an answer (cue a picture of President Bush) from this one.

Text: Demand Answers. Vote for Change.

ON THE SCREEN A succession of Americans are standing in a park posing the questions to a shrub. The handheld camera moves in and out to show the people and the plant. The bush, of course, does not respond to their questions, and they walk away in disgust. The photograph of Mr. Bush makes him seem befuddled.

ACCURACY The advertisement makes no real challengeable claims of fact. It reflects the Democratic critique of the president's policies on Iraq and stem cell research and is critical of the administration's response to Hurricane Katrina. Congress has not acted on several major issues, including immigration and Social Security. The federal minimum wage has not risen in almost a decade.

SCORECARD This is the first advertisement from the group formed by Mr. Ickes, who has said he hopes to raise as much as $20 million to counteract the Republicans' significant financial edge in this election. Mr. Ickes has not said how much he has raised nor has he named his major donors. He has also not revealed what races he plans to single out. While Mr. Bush is not on the ballot anywhere, the September Group hopes to tie Republican candidates across the country to what Democrats claim are the failures of the Bush administration and the Republican-led Congress. The producer, Mr. Siegel, a well-regarded former Madison Avenue advertising executive, has also made commercials for Eliot Spitzer, the Democratic candidate for governor of New York.

JOHN M. BRODER

A Gender Insurgency In Politics (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

Men have been making policy in Washington for as long as most of us can remember. But much of the political future rests in the hands of women.

In the narrowest terms, with Democrats needing 15 seats to capture a majority of the seats in the House of Representatives, there are 17 highly competitive districts with female candidates.

More broadly, much of the voter mobilization effort in both parties -- and their allied groups -- is aimed at women, especially those who normally vote in presidential years but skip the midterm elections.

That this election could result in placing a woman, Nancy Pelosi, in line to be speaker of the House for the first time in history only emphasizes the growing role of women in setting the political course.

Dennis Simon, a Southern Methodist University political scientist who has studied female candidates for Congress, has issued his statistics describing filings for 2006.

He reported last week that women made up 16 percent of the candidates running in this year's congressional primaries, an all-time high and the ninth consecutive election cycle in which that proportion has increased.

DOJ_NMG_0081747

The total of 136 women nominated for House seats this year is only one fewer than the record set in 2004. And odds are good, Simon says, that the number of women elected will be higher this year than the 67 in the last Congress.

Of the 65 women seeking reelection -- 42 Democrats and 23 Republicans -- only six are regarded as vulnerable, all from the GOP side. Three of them -- Reps. Marilyn Musgrave of Colorado, Deborah Pryce of Ohio and Heather Wilson of New Mexico -- have female opponents, so the maximum loss of seats held by women would be three.

That contrasts with the 53 races in which women are challenging incumbents and the 18 open seats with female candidates.

One of the most heavily contested open seats, Minnesota's 6th District, has opposing female nominees, Republican Michele Bachmann and Democrat Patty Wetterling.

Overall, more Democratic women are in competitive races than Republican women. There are 39 Democratic challengers to incumbents, compared with 14 Republicans. In the open seats, 12 Democratic women and six Republican women are running. Simon credits the disparity largely to the work of groups such as Emily's List, which recruits and trains pro-abortion-rights Democratic women to run and raises money to support them.

Comparable efforts on the GOP side have been far less extensive or successful, Simon said. Martha Rainville in Vermont may be the Republicans' best hope to capture a seat. She is running for a seat left open when independent Bernard Sanders, who caucuses with the Democrats, decided to seek an open Senate seat.

Democrats have several other challengers in addition to the races already mentioned. Among the potential winners are Lois Murphy, running again after a narrow loss in 2004 in Pennsylvania; Tammy Duckworth, a wounded Iraq war veteran running for an open seat in Illinois; Diane Farrell in Connecticut; Gabrielle Giffords in Arizona; Darcy Burner in Washington; Kirsten Gillibrand in New York and Christine Jennings in Florida. Add Wetterling in Minnesota, Patricia Madrid in New Mexico and Mary Jo Kilroy in Ohio, and it is a formidable lineup of talent, boosting the Democrats' chances of gaining control of the House.

Backing these candidates is a grass-roots effort to draw more women to the polls. A number of groups, both left and right, are engaged in the campaigns. I bumped into one unusual program, sponsored by the AFL-CIO last week, called "Stirring the Pot." Small groups of women, half a dozen to two dozen, met on Tuesday evening for living-room conversations about health care, education and job security and to encourage each other to vote.

I talked to Monique Schmittou, one of 20 women who met for a potluck supper in Canton, Mich. A single mother who has a teenage daughter and cares for an elderly mother, Schmittou recently was laid off from an auto-parts company for which she had worked 10 years.

Now facing the loss of her health insurance, she joined others in discussing what she calls "a crisis" for many in her community. Before they broke up, they addressed about 250 cards to other Canton women, urging them to vote next month.

It may be that women like these will give the men in power a needed kick in the pants -- to get them moving on the real issues.

Voters' Allegiances, Ripe For The Picking (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

IN May 1980, the pollster Richard Wirthlin huddled with his presidential candidate, Ronald Reagan, to plot a course through what looked like a daunting landscape for their party. Just over half the country told pollsters that they were Democrats or leaned that way, compared with just 30 percent that said they were Republicans — a gap that had held steady more or less since the New Deal.

The rest is political history. By winning over millions of white working-class Democrats, Mr. Reagan cut that gap in half and ushered in 26 years of Republican dominance at the voting booth.

Now, on the eve of the midterm elections, surveys show mounting impatience with both the war in Iraq and Republican rule. Some political analysts — including Mr. Wirthlin — say they see a chance for a potential Democratic comeback, an opportunity for another historic realignment of the political parties.

"I would not be surprised," Mr. Wirthlin said, noting a small slip in the number of voters who say they lean Republican combined with an unusual spike in the number who reject both major parties.

In recent Harris Interactive polls, the number of respondents who refuse to acknowledge a preference for either party has risen to about 25 percent of the electorate from about 12 percent for most of the last decade.

Much of this increase in independents, he said, is probably accounted for by former Republican voters not quite willing to say they lean Democratic, but also unlikely to turn out this year.

DOJ_NMG_0081748

"It is a red flag that Republican politicians need to watch," Mr. Wirthlin said. Although Republicans have long outperformed Democrats at turning out their voters, he added, "this year they may be raking water up a hill."

Dramatic shifts in political allegiance are clear only in retrospect and hard to foresee. The White House strategist Karl Rove long predicted that President George W. Bush would cement a Republican majority that could govern Washington for decades.

On the other side, Ruy Teixeira, a Democratic pollster, and John B. Judis, a liberal journalist, responded with their 2002 book, "The Emerging Democratic Majority," published just months before the Republicans defied history to enlarge their majorities in the midterm elections. There are reasons to consider a Democratic resurgence a long shot. No Democratic presidential candidate has won a clear majority of the national vote since Jimmy Carter in 1976, in the aftermath of Watergate. President Clinton won with pluralities, thanks in part to the third-party candidacy of H. Ross Perot in both elections. And in the first midterm of his presidency, in 1994, Democrats lost decisively in the battle for control of the House, which reflects national political trends more closely than the Senate.

Still, polls showing Democrats poised for big gains this fall in both chambers of Congress are reigniting the debate: Can Democrats crack apart the Reagan coalition of white blue-collar workers, evangelical Protestants, Southerners and chambers of commerce? Or will shifts in population toward the outer suburbs, the South and the West combine with the Democrats' secular, liberal Northeastern image to keep the party a minority in national elections for years to come?

At the heart of the debate is the war in Iraq, which pollsters on both sides agree is the biggest factor propelling Democratic hopes for the fall.

To many analysts, the backlash against the war is an inevitable and transient reaction that could fade when the Republicans pick a new standard-bearer in 2008. John Mark Hansen, a political scientist at the University of Chicago, said every conflict since the Mexican-American War has hurt the president's popularity and cost his party in midterm elections. Even in 1942, less than a year after Pearl Harbor, the Democrats lost 45 seats in the House and 9 in the Senate — during "the good war" and at the start of what turned out to be their party's ascendance.

Democrats, though, argue that Iraq may be singular. No other fight has been so closely associated with one party or its leader. None has been justified with arguments that crumbled as quickly as the suspicions of weapons of mass destruction or an Iraq-Qaeda tie. And the war's end, for now, remains far out of sight.

"Iraq has the potential to be to the Republican Party on national security what the Depression was to the Republican Party on economics," said Representative Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois Democrat who is chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

The Democrats' hope is that the war changes the reputations of the two parties in a way that may ultimately lead to remaking their constituencies as well, just as Roosevelt's New Deal formed a lasting bond with union members and urban immigrants. President Johnson's Great Society programs, on the other hand, eventually delivered the South to the Republicans by linking the Democrats to civil rights and liberalism — a gradual shift that reached a sudden tipping point with Mr. Reagan's election. By tarnishing the Republican image of greater competence in foreign affairs, Democrats say, the war could open new inroads for their party among the white working-class voters who have voted Republican since the Reagan days.

White voters without a college degree make up about half the electorate, according to the census. And Democrats have long contended that those voters should be the natural constituency for their party's brand of economic populism.

But the white working class has voted overwhelmingly for Republicans since Reagan. President Bush widened the Republican advantage among such voters from a margin of 17 percentage points in 2000 to 23 percentage points in 2004, according to exit poll data compiled by Mr. Teixeira, a senior fellow at the Century Foundation.

One reason for the Republican edge with those voters, many pollsters say, has been the party's reputation as the one that shares their values, especially those of traditionally religious Christians. But another major factor has been national security. By two to one, voters in 2004 trusted Mr. Bush over his Democratic opponent, Senator John Kerry, to handle terrorist threats. Now, that security edge has all but disappeared. Among white voters with no college education, approval of the president's handling of the war on terrorism had plummeted from a margin of 22 percentage points the summer of 2004 to just 7 percentage points last week, according to a New York Times/CBS News poll.

And the Republican advantage as the party that shares voters' "moral values" declined from 12 percentage points to only 5 points — within the poll's margin of error. (Several polls show that voters also now favor the Democrats to manage the war and the economy.)

"Iraq is the squandering of the national security premium the Republicans have been living on," Mr. Teixeira said. The Republicans' failure at "standing up" to foreign threats, he argued, had diminished their credibility on a whole cluster of "values" issues like "standing up for what is right" as well.

That, he contended, is vindicating his argument for a Democratic ascendance: if the Democrats can cut their margin of defeat among white workers, they can build a durable national majority from their coalition of professionals, women, African-

DOJ_NMG_0081749

Americans and the fast-growing Hispanic population. Although Mr. Bush's popularity with Hispanics at one time threatened to dislodge them from the Democratic bloc, the Republican moves this year to build a wall along the Mexican border has effectively pushed them back.

"That is fatal," Mr. Teixeira said.

Turning momentary popularity into a more lasting majority, of course, takes more than a midterm election. For one thing, voters typically develop a party preference based on the political atmosphere at the time they come of age and grow more attached to that party over the course of their lives. The voters who came of age in the 1930's, for example, have remained the most solidly Democratic. Fifty-seven percent are Democrats and only 38 percent are Republican, according to the American National Election Study.

Recent surveys and exit polls suggest that the Democrats have regained the upper hand among the young voters who entered the electorate over the last 15 years, and political scientists say dismay at the Iraq war is likely to prolong that trend.

"The longer Bush's approval ratings stay in the mid-30's, the more lost young Republicans there will be in the next generation," said Donald P. Green, a political scientist at Yale. But by the same rule, voters who came of age in the Reagan era are reliably Republican. Voters around the age of 36 are the only age group in which Republicans outnumber Democrats, according to 2006 surveys by the Pew Research Center. And it will be decades before they pass through the populace, "like an elephant through a boa constrictor," Professor Hansen said.

The true political consequence of the Iraq war also remains to be seen. American voters may hate wars, but they also favor candidates who take a muscular approach to foreign affairs, Professor Green said. Since the Vietnam-era peace movement, Democrats have had a reputation as peaceniks. It has cost them votes, especially among white working-class men and especially since the Reagan era. Unless Iraq leads to a new caution about military force, the war may not do much to change that.

"The usual card the Democrats would play would be 'get out of war,' " Professor Green said. "That just reinforces it."

Others argue that the travails of the Bush administration will be less transformative than the Democrats hope. "In the Depression, birth rates plunged way down," said Michael Barone, a political analyst. "They stopped having sex. They put their kids to bed hungry. In my opinion, the Iraq war is not that kind of event."

"If the Republicans suffer losses, it is a negative verdict on competence rather than ideology," he continued. "If you look at domestic issues, what are the Democrats talking about? The minimum wage is the first thing they mention, and it is a 1938 law."

Mr. Barone, who is associated with the theory of a lasting Republican majority, argued that essential elements remained unchanged. The party is strongest in the regions with the highest growth rates — the South and West — and it dominates 97 of the 100 fastest growing counties in the country, mostly booming "exurbs" on the outskirts of cities.

And whatever happens in Iraq, little has changed to the Democrats' reputation as the party of secular, elite liberals.

"Next to race, church attendance is the strongest correlation with voting," said Michael Dimock, associate director of the Pew Research Center. "America remains very religious. A lot of people tell us that someone who does not believe in God is not an acceptable candidate for president. Anything but that."

What's more, Democrats will need solutions to capitalize on their opportunity, said Professor Jack Pitney Jr. of Claremont McKenna College.

"Franklin Roosevelt had a clear answer, a very specific program, the New Deal," he said. "Do the Democrats have the same kind of clear answer to Iraq? It is damaging to Republicans, but it is hard to see how it is constructive to Democrats."

Still, Mr. Wirthlin, puzzling at Republican troubles even in a relatively prosperous economy, pointed to Sept. 11.

"Foreign policy took on a different and darker edge with the destruction of the twin towers," Mr. Wirthlin said. "My assumption is that was a mega-event that refocused people politically from 'myself and my neighbor and getting a job' to 'how are we doing in the world?' "

And at the moment that has meant an even greater focus on the war in Iraq, he said, turning what was once the Republicans greatest strength into a major liability.

Allen And Webb In Virtual Tie, Post Poll Says (WP)

By Robert Barnes And Michael D. Shear, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

Northern Virginia Voters' Views Differ From Rest of Commonwealth

Virginia Sen. George Allen (R) and Democratic challenger James Webb are virtually tied in a race that could shift the balance of power in Washington and which reinforces the differences between Northern Virginia and the rest of the commonwealth, according to a new Washington Post poll.

DOJ_NMG_0081750

Allen gets 49 percent, compared with 47 percent for Webb, within the 3 percentage point margin of error for the poll conducted over three days last week. With few respondents saying they are undecided and most seemingly locked in for their candidate, the poll indicates that the candidates' strategies for turning out supporters will be vital and that changes in the national political climate could tilt the outcome.

President Bush's approval rating among Virginians who say they are likely to vote is about the same as it is nationally. But fewer people in the state say their feelings about Bush will influence their Senate vote, compared with the number in a national poll. And in a sign that the greater Democratic enthusiasm seen nationally is also evident in Virginia, the poll finds that fewer of those who say they are certain to vote Nov. 7 identify themselves as Republicans than a year ago.

The three issues that poll respondents cite most frequently as extremely important -- the situation in Iraq, the war on terrorism and ethics in government -- are all volatile subjects heading into the campaigns' final weeks. The poll shows that Allen has a sizable advantage among those who cite terrorism and that Webb is not doing as well as Democrats nationally in turning the Iraq war and Republican congressional scandals into issues that work for his side.

Northern Virginians are increasingly Democratic -- more distrustful of the war in Iraq and the president and more supportive of Webb than the rest of the state, according to the poll. The region is the economic engine of the commonwealth and the source of much of its growth, and on many issues, its urbanizing and diverse population seems to agree more with the rest of the nation and less with those who live south of the Rappahannock River.

No matter who wins, a race filled with drama and controversy has won unprecedented attention from the electorate. Fifty-two percent of likely voters in the survey say they are following the race "very" closely; the previous high in Post polling goes back to 1989, when 39 percent of Virginians showed high interest in L. Douglas Wilder's bid to become the first black candidate to be elected governor in any state.

Independent Gail Parker receives 2 percent of the support in the poll.

For Webb, the 60-year-old Democratic Party newcomer who launched his campaign eight months ago, the poll provides new evidence that his underfunded, long-shot bid has created one of the country's most competitive races.

"We are extremely encouraged by these numbers," said Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd. "We've always maintained that the more people learned about the real George Allen, the more they would feel he's wrong for Virginia. We will build upon this momentum, and we know we will win."

But the poll contains plenty of concern for the former Navy secretary and author from Falls Church. Webb owns a solid lead only in Northern Virginia, and his supporters, as a group, are far less enthusiastic about his candidacy than are Allen's voters. One of the selling points for his candidacy was that his military background and service in the Reagan administration would appeal to Republicans, but he does no better among the GOP in the Post poll than Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) did in the state in the 2004 presidential race.

Allen, 54, can be content that after what might be the most tumultuous campaign any incumbent has seen this election cycle, he still has a bond with Virginians who elected him governor in 1993 and senator in 2000. A strong majority of those in the poll say they think of him as honest, trustworthy and a leader, and 57 percent approve of how he's doing in the Senate.

"We've always known the race was going to be close," said Allen consultant Chris LaCivita. "After being subjected to one of the meanest campaigns of attempted character assassination in the commonwealth's history, we are confident that the people are going to vote on issues. When they vote on issues, Allen wins."

But there are serious doubts about Allen in the poll. The percentage of voters who say they don't like Allen has increased dramatically from a year ago, and 43 percent now say they have an unfavorable opinion of him. By a large margin, independent voters sided with Allen six years ago when he ousted Democratic Sen. Charles S. Robb; this year, he's essentially tied with Webb among that group. And nearly one in five polled say they feel Allen was being intentionally racist when he called an Indian American supporter of Webb "macaca." An additional 44 percent view the comment as racist but say they don't think Allen intended it that way.Dueling Controversies

Allen's remarks might have as much as anything to do with why the race is so close.

His macaca comment caused a national controversy -- the film clips a staple on Youtube.com and his changing explanations a gift to late-night comedians. It was followed by articles charging that as a University of Virginia student in the 1970s, Allen regularly used a racial epithet to describe blacks. Allen denies that.

And he stumbled when answering questions about his previously unacknowledged Jewish ancestry.

Allen responded by putting Webb on the defensive about a 1979 article Webb wrote condemning the idea of women in combat and at the Naval Academy. Webb apologized for the inflammatory language he had used, such as calling the overwhelmingly male dormitory at the academy a "horny woman's dream," but Allen has spent more than $1 million on ads spotlighting the issue because he said it shows a disrespect for women.

DOJ_NMG_0081751

It is unclear from the poll how much those so-called character issues will affect the campaign -- 17 percent say Webb's comments are important to their vote, as opposed to 25 percent who say they feel the same way about Allen's remarks -- but they have given the race a nasty tone.

"I didn't like the way the race has sort of turned to all of these sort of negative things," said Vicki Merkel, 52, a teacher from Vienna who says she will vote for Allen. "Why do people say those things? And why are we digging way into the 1970s anyhow?"

She is among the 64 percent of those polled who say the campaign has been too negative, but voters are split almost evenly about who is to blame. Allen's supporters say the media have been tougher on their candidate, and overall, 36 percent of the respondents say the media have treated Allen unfairly, compared with 19 percent who say the same about Webb.A Plunge in Popularity

Allen was once one of the commonwealth's most popular politicians. But now Gov. Timothy M. Kaine (D) and the state's senior senator, John W. Warner (R), have much better favorability ratings, as does former governor Mark R. Warner (D).

Allen's favorable rating in Post polls of likely voters has plunged from 63 percent last fall to 53 percent today, and his unfavorable numbers have increased from 31 percent to 43 percent. Fifty-three percent of those polled have a favorable opinion of Webb; 37 percent have an unfavorable opinion And although Allen refuses to promise he would serve out his six-year term instead of trying for the presidency in 2008, the poll shows Virginians are opposed to the idea.

By a margin of 56 percent to 35 percent, poll respondents say they don't think Allen would make a good president, including 20 percent of those who say they will vote for his reelection.

But Allen's supporters appear loyal in other ways. Although Republicans nationally worry that their base might be turned off, 43 percent of Allen's voters say they are "very" enthusiastic about his Senate campaign, as opposed to 25 percent of Webb's.

"I just like the way he talks," said John Sullivan, 79, retired from the Navy and living in Loudoun County. "He's very forthright about things and conservative, which I am."

Apart from Northern Virginia, Allen is well thought of throughout the state, the poll shows, and voters say he's doing a good job. And on issues, he has several significant advantages.

Among those who say the U.S. campaign against terrorism is extremely important in their decision, two-thirds favor Allen. By contrast, voters who say the war in Iraq is extremely important split their votes evenly between Allen and Webb, who made his opposition to the war a cornerstone of his campaign. The same is true for those who cite "ethics in government" as a top concern.

Allen has a similar lead among those who consider taxes extremely important -- he has spent a considerable amount of money on advertisements saying that Webb would vote to roll back tax cuts -- and among those who say immigration is extremely important to their decision.

In addition, the poll shows that Allen does not suffer from the gender gap that has afflicted other Republican candidates in the past. In every Virginia election for the past decade, Democratic candidates for governor and Senate have held leads among women. But 49 percent of the women polled say they would vote for Allen, compared with 47 percent for Webb.

Webb is struggling with women more than previous Democrats have. In 2005, Kaine led among likely women voters by nine points in late polls, and former governor Warner had a double-digit lead among women going into Election Day.A Leap From Unknown

Perhaps the most positive news for Webb in the poll is the tightness of the race, considering that he was largely unknown even in late spring and that Allen spent about $9.5 million on his reelection, compared with Webb's $2 million.

On personal characteristics such as honesty, family values and leadership, Webb scores nearly as highly as Allen, who has been a fixture in Virginia politics for 25 years. More people say Webb would "stand up for issues important to African Americans" than would Allen, and more say Webb is "tolerant of the points of view of all Virginians."

Still, Webb supporters speak more of what he stands for than the man himself. Jeanette Wiltse, 64, a retired consultant from Arlington County, said she thinks Allen has done "all right" and she doesn't know very much about Webb. But she's voting for him.

"First thing is, he's a Democrat," Wiltse said. "I'm absolutely fed up with this administration. I think the war is a large part of it. I think Bush has basically trashed our foreign relations."

But according to the poll, Webb has not been able to persuade enough women like Wiltse to join his cause, even though only 39 percent of women say the war in Iraq was worth fighting.

On the plus side for Webb, he's also splitting the male vote, which traditionally has gone for Republican candidates. Webb has hoped his status as a decorated veteran would help with the large portion of the Virginia population that has served in the military. About 25 percent say Webb's background would make them more likely to vote for him.The Northern Va. Factor

Webb would win handily if the election took place only in Northern Virginia, claiming 56 percent of the vote there to Allen's 42 percent, the poll shows. But Allen would win easily in the rest of the state, besting Webb by almost 10 points.

"I would prefer to tilt the balance to the Democrats in the Senate and get the war over," said Elizabeth Barclay, 55, a Fairfax County lawyer.

And the differences are particularly striking among men: Webb's 18-point lead among males in Northern Virginia turns into a 12-point deficit in the rest of the state.

The views of Northern Virginians are similar to those of the rest of the nation this political year, according to the poll.

When it comes to the war in Iraq, Northern Virginians say it was not worth fighting by almost a two to one margin -- just as strongly as the rest of the nation. Commonwealth residents outside Northern Virginia are evenly split on whether the war should have been fought.

Klobuchar Still Leads Big Over Kennedy (MINNST)

By Kevin Diaz, Rob Hotakainen

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 15, 2006

Patricia Lopez, Kevin Diaz and Rob Hotakainen DFL Senate candidate Amy Klobuchar continues to hold a substantial lead over her GOP rival Mark Kennedy, according to the latest Minnesota Poll, and there are signs that national Republican leaders are now turning their focus to other Senate campaigns.

The poll shows Klobuchar with 55 percent to Kennedy's 34 percent, a margin that is nearly the same as it was in September.

Kennedy's campaign challenged the poll results, as it has with every Minnesota Poll on the Senate race.

"No one believes these numbers," said Heidi Frederickson, a Kennedy campaign spokeswoman. "This is a single-digit race. We know it, the Democrats know it and Minnesotans know it."

Klobuchar campaign manager Ben Goldfarb said the race will "ultimately be very close, but it's clear that Minnesotans are tired of Congressman Kennedy's outrageous negative attacks and continue to respond to Amy Klobuchar's positive vision for change."

The two candidates will debate today on NBC's "Meet the Press."

The poll, conducted from Oct. 6 to Wednesday with 818 likely voters, has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3.4 percentage points. A Rasmussen poll conducted earlier this month also showed a double-digit lead for Klobuchar.

The latest Minnesota Poll suggests that voter choices in the Senate race are turning mostly on national issues such as the Iraq war and President Bush's 61 percent job disapproval rating in the state, the highest he has had.

Those results appear to be hurting Kennedy, a three-term congressman representing Minnesota's Sixth District who has been politically close to Bush and supports the war.

The poll shows that 50 percent of independents and 62 percent of moderates favor Klobuchar, compared with 29 percent and 24 percent respectively for Kennedy.

"We see this nationally," said Steven Smith, a political scientist and congressional expert at Washington University in St. Louis. "Independents and moderates in particular are looking for a change."

Divided over strategy

As part of its attempt to maintain control of the Senate, the Republican National Committee (RNC) and the National Republican Senatorial Campaign (NRSC) have begun focusing most of their television advertising on close contests for Republican-held seats in Ohio, Tennessee and Missouri, according to the latest federal campaign spending reports.

The strategy is angering some Minnesota Republicans, who say it's wrong for the party to abandon Kennedy, a candidate once regarded as the GOP's best bet to pick up a Senate seat.

"In reflects an incumbent- protection mentality," said Gary Miller, who runs a pro-Kennedy website called Kennedy vs. the Machine. "It's disappointing."

Others say they fear that a lack of interest in Minnesota by the national party could depress voter turnout and hurt Republican Gov. Tim Pawlenty and others involved in close races. But to many GOP leaders, it's a simply a matter of national strategy; resources are tied up in other states.

"What's going on is we've got a couple of pitched battles with incumbents that will decide whether the Senate changes hands," said Sen. Norm Coleman, R-Minn. "It's not a reflection of this race."

The NRSC has yet to make a TV ad buy for Kennedy.

By comparison, Coleman said, the national party pumped more than $5 million into his 2002 Senate bid, when he squared off first with the late Sen. Paul Wellstone, and then Democratic legend Walter Mondale.

DOJ_NMG_0081753

Kennedy campaign officials scoffed at any suggestion that the NRSC has abandoned their race.

"They're being very helpful," Frederickson said. "They're going to send in a bunch of people to do [last] 72-hour get-out-the vote efforts. We're in daily contact with them. ... The idea that they've abandoned us is utterly false."

State GOP leaders certainly have not given up on Kennedy. Coleman, for example, has given $100,000 from his own campaign fund to help get out the vote in Minnesota.

Party activists say that will be their focus in the remaining three weeks of the campaign. "My message to our folks is this is a winnable race, and to stay involved" Coleman said. "I'll continue to make that pitch to my colleagues in the NRSC."

On the attack

Kennedy's standing in polls has prompted him in recent weeks to go on the attack against Klobuchar with negative ads that, according to the Minnesota Poll, have hurt his standing with voters and made some of them more likely to vote for Klobuchar. Kennedy is now viewed negatively by 44 percent of voters, the poll shows, compared with Klobuchar's 25 percent negative rating.

Lifelong Republican Marvel Carstenbrock, 79, of Austin, Minn., said she plans to break ranks and vote for Klobuchar, although she also supports Pawlenty for governor. "I like that Amy Klobuchar," Carstenbrock said. "She's a good gal. She seems like she'll work hard." As for Kennedy, she said, "I am sick of that guy and his negative commercials. I wish he would just say what he wants to do."

The poll also shows that Klobuchar has a huge gender gap working in her favor -- 60 percent of women support here compared with 28 percent for Kennedy. She is running strongly in the metro area and outstate Minnesota. And on a list of a half-dozen indicators, Klobuchar is seen by more voters as a stronger leader and more independent thinker, with a well-defined agenda.

The poll numbers indicate that Kennedy is doing better than he had been in recent weeks locking up his conservative base, with strong support coming from voters such as Dwight Hicks, 53, a maintenance worker in Anoka County.

"I like the Republican Party's direction in general," Hicks said. "What's most important to me about Kennedy is that he's a Republican. I just agree with Republicans."

Still, that progress has been slow and Klobuchar is doing better among Democrats and liberals than Kennedy is doing with conservatives and Republicans. Klobuchar also is continuing to demonstrate significant crossover appeal, picking up a fifth of conservatives and nearly 1 in 10 Republicans.

Her support among high-wage earners also tops 50 percent even though she has pledged to roll back Bush tax cuts on those earning more than $300,000.

Tacit Silence On Stem Cell Research In Missouri Race (NYT)

By Susan Saulny

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

KIRKSVILLE, Mo. — Over cocktails one recent Monday night at a Democratic fund-raiser in New York, Claire McCaskill, the Democratic Senate candidate in Missouri, played up her support for stem cell research.

But at a campaign appearance here in rural and largely conservative Kirksville, Ms. McCaskill never mentioned the subject.

Similarly, her Republican opponent, Senator Jim Talent, came out against a statewide ballot measure on stem cell research at the strong urging of conservative Christians. But when Mr. Talent recently addressed an electricians' trade group at a resort on the Lake of the Ozarks, he did not speak of his opposition.

Just a few months ago, the Missouri stem cell research initiative on the November ballot was a defining issue of the campaign, as both candidates tried to firm up support among the party faithful in one of the tightest Senate races in the country. But now, as Mr. Talent and Ms. McCaskill reach beyond their traditional bases, the emotionally charged ballot measure — which would allow the research and possibly provide state financing for it — is almost too hot to touch.

In a race that appears to be a dead heat, the result has been an odd sort of mutual quietness, where the opposing camps seem to agree that the less said on the stump about stem cell research, the better.

"I've urged everyone to make those decisions on their own," Mr. Talent said after the speech to the electricians, in Osage Beach, Mo., when asked about the ballot measure. "I've tried not to make it political."

Ms. McCaskill denied shying from the issue but acknowledged it was not part of her standard campaign speech.

"It's not that I'm ignoring it, but the stem cell issue usually comes up in the context of question and answer," she said after a debate in Clayton, Mo. "People are confused and want to talk about it."

The truth of the matter, campaign analysts say, is that Mr. Talent and Ms. McCaskill are battling over a tiny percentage of undecided voters and dare not risk offending them by drawing attention to such a polarizing issue.

DOJ_NMG_0081754

The race here is one of six nationwide in which Democrats see the possibility of picking up a Republican seat to win control of the Senate; as such, there is little margin for error for either party. Even in a recent national television appearance on MSNBC, when the two candidates were asked about stem cell research, Mr. Talent and Ms. McCaskill were measured in their responses, and careful to use language that would not offend.

Robert Hunt Sprinkle, the editor in chief of Politics and the Life Sciences, a journal edited at the University of Maryland, has tracked how the stem cell research issue has figured in elections nationwide. Mr. Sprinkle said it was "quite sensible" that the two candidates in Missouri had backed away from "defending a view on a topic of arcane technological content" in a close campaign.

"This is a debate that is entered at one's peril in the campaign context, when a sound bite is removed for analysis," he said. "These are very treacherous waters."

The dynamic is markedly different in several other states, where Democratic candidates have made stem cell research a bigger part of their campaigns, in part because of evidence of broad public support for the research in those states and because of the wedge it sometimes drives between far-right and moderate Republicans.

In Wisconsin, the incumbent Democratic governor, James E. Doyle, has made his steady support of all permissible forms of stem cell research almost a daily mantra in his race against Representative Mark Green, a Republican who favors setting stricter limits.

In the Maryland race for the Senate, Lt. Gov. Michael Steele, a Republican, is running against Representative Benjamin L. Cardin, a Democrat who has tailored his message to two main themes: the war in Iraq and his support for stem cell research.

"Ben Cardin is doing what I expected Claire McCaskill to do, which is bring it up," said Trevor Parry-Giles, an associate professor of political communication at the University of Maryland. "It might be one of those issues that plays better on the coasts for Democrats, but Republicans face a tougher road on this one because they need moderate independent voters."

In Missouri, Mr. Talent has found himself tripping over the Republican divide.

Some more moderate Republicans, including Gov. Matt Blunt and John C. Danforth, the former United States senator, are backing the stem cell research referendum, while more conservative legislators, including Representative Todd Akin, are speaking out against it, particularly to Christian congregations.

At first, Mr. Talent chose to steer clear of the issue, hesitating to take a position on the ballot measure before relenting under pressure from Christian conservatives. The senator had already angered many conservatives by removing his name from a Senate bill opposed to cloning, so there was some bridge-building to be done.

"This is a difficult issue," Mr. Talent said in an interview. "It comes up a fair amount, but I've been talking about my priorities and what they're going to be. Generally, I've focused on what I've done."

And as of late, Ms. McCaskill has made that task easier for Mr. Talent by also sidestepping the stem cell debate. Like many Democrats facing off against incumbent Republicans, Ms. McCaskill, the Missouri state auditor, has highlighted Mr. Talent's close association with an unpopular White House and pressed national issues like security, the war in Iraq, taxes and health care.

"He agrees with President Bush more than I agree with my husband," Ms. McCaskill said of Mr. Talent in an interview. "I think it's very hard for Missourians to accept that he's an agent of change. In contrast, I have very independent branding."

The largest group in the state promoting stem cell research, the Missouri Coalition for Lifesaving Cures, which is responsible for putting the initiative on the ballot, has steered clear of questions about the Senate race because of its nonpartisan stance.

The group's chairman, Donn Rubin, said it was trying to pitch a large tent.

"Our initiative is supported by many denominations, Christian and other, who believe in this research as a means to alleviate suffering," Mr. Rubin said. "Any one of us could be a patient tomorrow and we all have a stake in seeing this amendment pass."

If the measure were to pass — and polls indicate that a majority of Missourians support it — Missouri would join California as the only states to include the right to perform stem cell research in its state constitution. But unlike the California measure, which designated billions of dollars for the research, the Missouri amendment does not include a commitment to financing. (It does not bar the possibility of it, however.)

The ballot measure would guarantee that any stem cell research that is legal under federal law could be performed in Missouri. Mr. Rubin said the coalition sought to get the issue on the ballot in direct response to efforts for years by conservative lawmakers to ban the cloning procedure involved in some forms of the research.

In the most controversial form of stem cell research, embryos are cloned and their stem cells are removed. This practice has ignited the political debate about whether life is being destroyed.

DOJ_NMG_0081755

"This is the big one, this is the biggest pro-life issue voters have ever been confronted with," said Pam Fichter, the president of Missouri Right to Life. "This is the people deciding whether they want to enshrine in the constitution the right to clone and kill human embryos."

Given the void in the discourse at the candidates' level, many voters have been left to sort through a barrage of advertisements financed by independent groups. On billboards, on the radio and on television, the proposed amendment has been dubbed the "kill bill" by anti-abortion groups and conservative Christians. Advocates for the measure equate its passing with the guarantee of lifesaving cures.

Meanwhile, the Senate candidates continue to look for swing voters. Ms. McCaskill is working long hours to shore up her standing in the state's rural counties, where weak support from conservative voters contributed to her narrow defeat in the governor's race in 2004 and where opposition to the stem cell initiative tends to be strong. At the same time, Mr. Talent is trying to win the support of more liberal voters in urban areas, where his conservative views on stem cell research generally are not well received.

"They're raiding the traditional backyard of the other," said Professor Lana Stein, who heads the political science department at the University of Missouri, St. Louis.

Low-Key Democrat Leads High-Stakes Senate Race (WP)

By David Finkel, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

Social Conservative Bob Casey Is an Unlikely Party Hero

READING, Pa. -- For Bob Casey Jr., it was one of the good days in his campaign to send Sen. Rick Santorum (R-Pa.) into political obscurity. Morning brought word of a new poll showing him with a 12-point lead over Santorum, who is the third most powerful Republican in the Senate, and evening brought an adoring audience to a fundraiser here in a private home, where Casey said with growing confidence, "I really believe this race is about America."

His voice, in contrast to the high-pitched, battle-ready aggressiveness that is in Santorum's, was polite as he criticized his opponent and President Bush, touched upon his Catholic upbringing and discussed his work as a Jesuit volunteer in inner-city Philadelphia. "In the life of a middle-class family, things are not going all that well," he said several weeks ago to the middle-class crowd, and as he went on, his quiet words blended with the cricket chirps coming through the open windows.

When Casey was done talking, the next sounds included scribbling pens and checks being torn out of checkbooks because of what Democrats say this race means: A Casey victory would not only topple one of America's best-known conservatives but would also enhance the Democrats' prospects of winning control of the Senate.

The Democrats need to pick up six seats to take control of the Senate, and Pennsylvania has become one of their best hopes. Emboldened by polls showing widespread discontent with the GOP-controlled Congress, Democrats vow a fundamental reordering of domestic and foreign policy if their party sweeps to victory in the Senate and House on Nov. 7.

In going after a high-ranking Senate Republican, Democrats picked someone well suited for the role: the state treasurer and a member of one of Pennsylvania's best-known political families, who has strong conservative views on social issues, a liberal economic philosophy and opposition to the war in Iraq. Casey is against abortion and gun control, and he agrees with the current federal policy that limits embryonic stem cell research -- all positions that have inoculated him against attacks from the right.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), the chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, was so eager to recruit Casey that he and Gov. Edward G. Rendell (D) forced former state treasurer Barbara Hafer out of the race. That move rankled many liberal Democrats because of Hafer's support of abortion rights, but Schumer viewed Casey as the only candidate who could beat Santorum.

Since formally announcing his candidacy in March 2005, Casey has held a steady lead over Santorum in the polls. Yet even as he appears on the verge of a victory with national implications, many in his state and throughout the country know little about his background. Casey, 46, gives new meaning to political humility, and he discourages attention to his personal life or comparisons to his father, the late Robert P. Casey, a former governor.

"When a good politician walks in the room, even if you don't see him, you know it. The oxygen is sucked out of the room," said David Paul, a financial adviser in the Philadelphia suburbs and a Casey supporter. "When Casey comes in, you really don't know he's there. Whatever people were talking about, they just keep talking."

G. Terry Madonna, a Pennsylvania pollster, said, "If you ask people 'Who is Bob Casey Jr.?' their answer would be 'Well, I think he's a public official whose father was governor.' " Madonna, director of the Center for Politics and Public Affairs at Franklin and Marshall College, added, "They will not have a real specific sense about who he is."

Casey, when asked to talk about himself during a recent interview, replied, "Yeah, gosh, let's talk about public policy for a while."

Casey's father was a dominant figure in Pennsylvania. As a youth, he was a gifted athlete who turned down a tryout with the Philadelphia Phillies to accept a college basketball scholarship. After college and law school, he won his first election, becoming the state's auditor general, and made three unsuccessful bids for governor before finally winning in 1986. His two terms were notable for advances in welfare reform and health care for women and children. He was also a staunch foe of abortion.

The governor was barred from speaking at the 1992 Democratic National Convention in part because of his un-Democrat-like opposition to abortion. He was also the defendant in a U.S. Supreme Court case that year called Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, which challenged Pennsylvania restrictions on abortion and, to the dismay of abortion proponents, led to a redefining of fetal viability.

Casey's eldest son, Bob, followed in his footsteps, graduating from the College of the Holy Cross and obtaining a law degree from Catholic University before entering politics and winning his first of two terms as state auditor general in 1996. Casey ran for governor in 2002 but lost to Rendell in the Democratic primary. In 2004, he ran against a little-known opponent and won the post of state treasurer with 3.3 million votes -- more votes than any other candidate for a statewide office in Pennsylvania history.

Being treasurer, Casey recalled recently, was the perfect reflection of why he got into politics -- not because of personal ambition, he said, but because of his notion of public service. Since his childhood in Scranton, he said, that's what his father and mother emphasized. "I don't remember my parents ever giving us a noblesse oblige speech," he said. Rather, he learned through everyday examples, especially from his father.

As a state official, Casey proved to be a traditional Democrat on most issues, but, like his father, he was an ardent foe of abortion.

So when the party that had kept his father from speaking in 1992 began courting him in late 2004 to run against Santorum, he had a conversation with one of his brothers.

"Isn't this interesting?" is the way that conversation went, Chris Casey said. "Isn't this ironic?"

Casey's sister Margi McGrath commented on why the national party sought out her brother: "It's not because they love him. He's not their tailor-made candidate."

Yet within days of his election as state treasurer, the Democrats were contacting him about running against Santorum.

Santorum, a former House member, first won election to the Senate in 1994 with 1.7 million votes, which was just under 50 percent of the popular vote. He was reelected in 2000 with 2.4 million votes, or 53 percent, and he became a prominent and polarizing conservative figure in the Senate.

Whatever the reason for the courtship, Casey didn't say yes immediately.

"He was agonizing about it," said McGrath.

Casey recounted a conversation with his wife: " 'You've got to think about this,' " he said she told him. "And I said, 'I'm going to think about it, very seriously.' And she said, 'But you've got to really think about this,' and these weren't her words, but basically she was saying, 'You can win this race, you can defeat him, and I'm not sure anyone else can.' And that weighed heavily on me because I knew, to be blunt about it, if I didn't run, he'd probably be reelected. And maybe easily."

For three months, Casey worked the angles, thinking about the implications of winning and of losing and his often-stated desire to become Pennsylvania's governor. He finally agreed, he said, because "you can make a tremendous contribution as a U.S. senator on issues I care about, like health care and like building an economy."

"But also I was influenced by the idea that sometimes you've got to stop what's going on, and you may be the only person that can do that," he said.

By midsummer of this year, Santorum had raised substantially more money than Casey -- $17.2 million to $10.8 million -- much of it going toward advertising that has portrayed Casey as a ladder climber, a candidate with only the vaguest positions, and, in an attempt to convey that he is not the same Casey as his father, "Bobby."

"What you heard from Mr. Casey is what you hear all the time. No specifics," Santorum said when the two debated on "Meet the Press" in early September. Casey, however, who was anything but docile in the debate -- sometimes interrupting Santorum, sometimes correcting him, sometimes mocking him -- was well ahead in the polls at that point.

He has been leading in the polls since spring. The only blip in a steady stream of successes came in a poll a few weeks ago, which showed that unfavorable reactions to him had risen from 13 percent in May to 22 percent in September as Santorum ramped up his attacks. "Santorum, at the moment, is defining Casey better than Casey is defining himself," said Madonna, the pollster.

DOJ_NMG_0081757

What the poll also showed, however, is that the race is far less about Casey than about Santorum. Nearly 30 percent of likely Casey voters said they support him mainly because he's not Santorum -- "a pretty high percentage," Madonna said. And as Santorum's unfavorable rating has climbed from 26 percent when Casey entered the race to 37 percent in September, the Casey campaign has seemed content to remain low key, letting Casey be defined less by who he is than by who he is not.

As McGrath said, when asked who her brother is: "He's not a polarizing figure."

Who is he, though?

At a second campaign stop in Reading, this one with union workers at a small hotel, Kathy Quimby watched Casey come in.

"Wasn't his father in politics?" she asked, trying to figure out where she had heard Casey's name.

Quimby, who works at the hotel, watched as the candidate went around the room, shaking hands and speaking in an even voice about what is wrong and right in the country.

Chalk up another vote against Santorum: "He seems like a nice guy," she said.

The New York Senate Race (NYT)

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

Hillary Clinton is running in a phantom race for the Senate, pitted against an unknown, unqualified opponent. In the unlikely event that New Yorkers ever learn what John Spencer's views are, most would find them far too conservative. It's a measure of the haplessness of Mr. Spencer's campaign that the Republican nominee has been dogged by rumors that his real aim is to prepare the ground for an attempt to regain his old job as mayor of Yonkers.

It would be easy to endorse Hillary Clinton for a second term even if she had a far more credible opponent. Mrs. Clinton has been an excellent senator — hard-working and in close touch with her state. We have been particularly impressed by her focus on the neglected "first suburbs" of aging housing and decaying infrastructure. As a Democrat, she has a limited ability to influence legislation, but she has taken a lead in forming the debate on a number of issues of substance. Her bill aimed at fixing the mechanics of voting set the standard for election reform legislation.

Watching Mrs. Clinton do her job, we have been impressed by her mastery of even the most obscure details of New York's problems. Her ability to work with Republicans has been a pleasant surprise. She has won the genuine respect of most of her colleagues in Washington, and she seems to have found a forum in which her lifelong wonkishness can be put to good use. It seems as if in the Senate, Mrs. Clinton has found her true calling.

The puzzle of this campaign is that she might not consider that a compliment.

Mrs. Clinton's intention to be a candidate for president in 2008, though unannounced, is hardly a secret. And the Republicans' failure to field a candidate of substance has allowed her to spend this fall running against George Bush. So far, the voters do not seem to mind. The idea that Hillary Clinton wants to desert New York two years into her next term has been the centerpiece of Mr. Spencer's campaign, to little avail.

We enthusiastically endorse Mrs. Clinton for re-election, while watching with interest to see if she can convince the country that she has as much aptitude for the presidency as she does for her current job. Her extraordinary discipline might help her to avoid mistakes during a presidential campaign, to run a race that will not center on some symbolic slip-up. But can she conjure up a vision of the future for a nation desperately in need of inspiration and real leadership? Can she speak to the great issues of the day directly, without carefully trimming every sentence to steer clear of controversy?

The real question is not whether she can turn in continued good performance in the Senate, or even whether she can run a smart campaign for president. It is whether she can put some great idea ahead of her own political upward mobility, whether there is a cause so important to her that she will risk her political security for it. We are waiting for a profile-in-courage moment, a sign that she is something more than a very competent politician. Meanwhile, we endorse Hillary Clinton for another six years in the Senate.

GOP All But Cedes The Race To Feinstein (LAT)

By Scott Martelle, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

The Republican candidate for one of California's two seats in the Senate — potentially one of the most powerful legislative positions in the country — walked alone into a banquet room at the Pomona Valley Mining Co. restaurant on a recent morning and looked around.

The regular meeting of the California Federation of Republican Women, Southern Division, was underway, and the candidate, Dick Mountjoy, portly beneath a shock of white hair, stood mostly unnoticed. As a woman at the head table talked of plans for an upcoming convention, Mountjoy slipped small stacks of pamphlets and bumper stickers from the pockets of his cream-colored jacket and placed them on the registration table.

There was no entourage. No scheduler clicking away on a Blackberry or campaign handler whispering into a cellphone. Just Mountjoy, a former state senator from nearby Monrovia and self-described "biblical constitutionalist," here to talk to the Republican faithful about his campaign to unseat incumbent Democrat Dianne Feinstein.

David had it easier against Goliath.

During a national election cycle marked by a bitter fight for control of the Senate and the House of Representatives, the campaign for California's senior Senate seat has the feel of a foregone conclusion as Feinstein, one of the state's most popular vote-getters, holds a commanding lead among likely voters in the race.

"Mountjoy doesn't have the reach in the Republican Party or the name identification or the appeal to moderates that Feinstein has with Democrats," said Terry Christensen, a political analyst at San Jose State. The Republican Party "knows it, and they're not spending money on it. So it's partly Feinstein's strength and partly the California Republican Party's weakness," Christensen said.

And few people seem to know who Mountjoy is, despite his role as one of the architects of 1994's Proposition 187, which would have made it illegal for undocumented immigrants to receive many government benefits. Mountjoy's 29% support among all registered voters in the most recent Los Angeles Times poll is less than the 34% of state voters enrolled as Republicans. And in a July Field poll — one of the last to ask the question — 62% of voters said they did not know enough about Mountjoy to have an opinion about him.

Little has changed since then. Feinstein entered the late-summer push with more than $8 million in the bank to Mountjoy's $21,000, making it likely that this will be the second California race in a row for the Senate in which the Republican challenger was unable to air crucial television ads in the final weeks of the campaign.

The next financial reports aren't due until today, but even Republicans seem to have given up. The National Republican Senatorial Campaign Committee — a key funding and organizing tool for Republican Senate incumbents and hopefuls — doesn't even list Mountjoy as a candidate on its website. To add insult to injury, where his face and biography should be posted, the website lists Barbara Boxer, a red flag for Republican bulls.

Which is fitting, since this lopsided matchup has its roots in Boxer's 58%-38% reelection two years ago over former California Secretary of State Bill Jones.

"The conventional wisdom is that Boxer is not as strong politically as Feinstein, and if Boxer could win in a walk, then the Feinstein race would be that much easier," said Jack Pitney, a political analyst at Claremont McKenna College and a former Republican official.

"Feinstein's advantage fed on itself. She went into the election a heavy favorite, and that deterred more credible candidates from getting in the race. From the Republican perspective, it's a vicious cycle. People don't think he can win, so they don't give him support, which makes it less likely he will win."

So why would a politician willingly enter such a race?

"The biggest upside is low expectations — nobody expects him to do anything," Pitney said. "If he can crack 40%, he can claim a moral victory. But it's more about him doing his duty for the party. Major parties ought to nominate somebody to run against an incumbent, even if the outcome looks like a foregone conclusion. He's performing a service for textbook democracy."

Mountjoy insists that he is running to win and hopes that a strong Republican turnout and weak Democratic showing on election day will trump the early polls and overwhelming disparity in campaign budgets.

"We don't have a lot of money, but we have enough to get our message out, and that's all we need to do," Mountjoy said. "We don't try to match her money, just outdo her with the issues."

Mountjoy's platform embraces such boilerplate conservative issues as increased border security with Mexico, no amnesty for illegal immigrants, support for the war in Iraq, elimination of unspecified government waste, a stronger military and enhanced property rights. He also opposes abortion, even in cases of incest or rape, and gay marriage.

"America is at a crossroads," said Mountjoy, who lists the Bible and the U.S. Constitution as his two guiding texts. "We've got to turn America around. We are quickly slipping into a moral decay that is unprecedented, and I for one say it has got to stop."

Feinstein's positions are just as reliably moderate-liberal as Mountjoy's are conservative.

She advocates a "humane" approach to stemming illegal immigration; a "structured downsizing" of the U.S. military presence in Iraq and Donald H. Rumsfeld's ouster as Defense secretary; a more collegial approach to foreign policy; and a heightened fight against global warming. She supports abortion rights and civil unions for gays.

DOJ_NMG_0081759

As for campaigning, don't expect to see much of Feinstein on the stump beyond a few town hall-style meetings and what campaign manager Kam Kuwata referred to as "Washington report lunches" — part of her regimen for keeping in touch with constituents.

"Sen. Feinstein has focused her time on doing what she's been doing all along — doing her job well," Kuwata said. "Why tinker with something people appreciate?"

Dianne Feinstein

Party: Democrat

Occupation: U.S. senator since 1992. Mayor of San Francisco from 1978 to 1988; member, San Francisco Board of Supervisors, 1970 to 1978.

Age: 73; born in San Francisco.

Residence: San Francisco

Personal: Married; one child, three stepchildren, five grandchildren.

Education: Bachelor's degree from Stanford University.

Career highlights: Former mayor of San Francisco, she first won election to the U.S. Senate in 1992 in the wake of the controversial appointment of Clarence Thomas to the U.S. Supreme Court, when she and Barbara Boxer made California the first state to have two women elected to the Senate at the same time. Feinstein has established a reputation as a liberal-moderate. Serves on the Judiciary, Appropriations, Energy and Natural Resources committees, and the Select Committee on Intelligence. Backed legislation protecting more than 7 million acres of California desert and dealing with other environmental issues; backed creation of a director of national intelligence; helped establish rights for victims of violent crime, and wrote the 1994 bill banning assault weapons.

Platform: Calls for a "change in direction in Iraq"; a more collegial relationship with allies on foreign policy; securing the border but also adopting a "humane approach" to undocumented immigrants already in the U.S.; aggressively working to reduce global warming; supports stem cell research; opposes further development of nuclear weapons by the U.S.; and calls for appointment of "mainstream judges" to the federal bench.

On the Issues

Iraq: Says Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld should be replaced. Supports development of a timeline and exit strategy that would significantly reduce the presence of U.S. troops by the end of 2007.

Immigration/border: Supports increasing the number of Border Patrol agents and Port of Entry inspectors. Says illegal immigrants should be put on a path to citizenship if they can prove they have been law-abiding, have worked and will continue to work, pay a fine and all back taxes and learn English.

Environment: Wants to raise average fuel economy on all vehicles by 10 miles per gallon by 2017, reduce greenhouse emissions by 10% or more by 2025.

Abortion: Supports abortion rights.

border and increased law enforcement. Opposes government benefits for illegal immigrants, except emergency medical care. Opposes all amnesty programs.

Environment: Says the continuing influx of immigrants must be addressed first.

Abortion: Opposes abortion.

Ohio GOP's Financial Support Wavering (AP-Y)

By Julie Carr Smyth, Assocated Press Writer

AP, October 15, 2006

As the GOP scrambles nationwide to retain its majority, scandal-ridden Ohio appears to be falling off the financial radar screen.

Television time is being forsaken for House candidates. And national promotions of the state's gubernatorial candidate by the Republican Governors Association popped up, then disappeared.

Ohio Republicans are trying to regroup amid a guilty plea Friday by U.S. Rep. Bob Ney in a Washington influence-peddling case and the trial of GOP fundraiser Tom Noe — accused of stealing from a state investment in rare coins — set to begin next week. Their national counterparts are following suit, focusing every last penny on races they believe they can win.

Those include U.S. Sen. Mike DeWine's seat, which is being hotly contested by U.S. Rep. Sherrod Brown; U.S. Rep. Deborah Pryce's seat, which Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy is seeking; and the seat Ney is vacating, which the party hopes state Rep. Joy Padgett can win over Democrat Zach Space.

"As races change, dynamics change," said Ed Patru, spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee. "We're not going to continue spending money in races where we're significantly ahead and, conversely, in some races if it looks to be out of reach, you're not going to dump a bunch of money into it."

In recent days, the committee pulled advertising it had planned in the race between Republican Craig Foltin and Democrat Betty Sutton for Brown's open House seat, which the GOP initially thought it could wrest from Democrats. The committee also viewed the seat being vacated by Democratic U.S. Rep. Ted Strickland, who is running for governor, as a potential gain, but has backed away from that hope.

Strickland has held a double-digit lead in the polls in that race, which is drawing national attention because the winner's party will carry an edge into the 2008 presidential election. A narrow win in Ohio gave President Bush the electoral votes he needed for re-election in 2004.

Without mentioning specifics, Patru said open seats have been judged less important than those held by incumbents. He said the committee is still optimistic about 10 to 12 seats that are open or held by Democrats nationwide, and believes Democrats have also adjusted their early expectations.

Meanwhile, after an aggressive early advertising push, Republican gubernatorial nominee Ken Blackwell, Ohio's secretary of state, has disappeared from the airwaves — a surprising turn of events for the leading candidate on the party's ticket.

A one-time strategy called for the RGA to air its own ads in support of Blackwell, but the governor's group appears to have written off the state.

In a letter to supporters earlier this month, the group's chairman, Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, listed Iowa, Maine, Oregon, Illinois, Arkansas and Michigan as the only states with targeted governor's races.

RGA executive director Phil Musser said the letter has been misinterpreted, and that specific states were listed where money was still able to be spent under campaign finance limits.

"If we could send volunteers under the law in Ohio, we sure would," Musser said. "And any assertion that this is about how we view the race is ludicrous."

The Ohio Republican Party does not appear to be coming forward to fill the advertising void, choosing instead to put its resources into the races for secretary of state and state auditor.

Blackwell said Friday he is not disappointed with the support he has received.

"The fact is the president came in and raised $1.6 million for me. They've had Cabinet officers in just this week," he said. "The RGA has made independent expenditures in the hundreds of thousands of dollars. I'm perfectly satisfied with the level of support."

DOJ_NMG_0081761

During a visit this week to stump for DeWine, Republican National Committee Chairman Ken Mehlman said the party is not letting up in Ohio despite the hurdles it faces.

"We have well over 50 people on the ground whose job it is to help Ken win, to help Mike DeWine win and to help the congressional candidates win," he said. "We sent out 1.5 million absentee mail pieces, that specifically feature Ken Blackwell and the others on the ticket. We believe Ken Blackwell is an asset to Ohio and the whole turnout effort we have in place benefits Ken Blackwell on Election Day."

GOP, Democrats Rally For Ohio Hopefuls (NYT/AP)

HAMILTON, Ohio (AP) -- House Majority Leader John Boehner rallied supporters in a key southwest Ohio county Saturday amid a series of scandals involving Republicans and polls indicating tight or uphill battles.

"I'm here to tell you that elections are not won or lost on what the polls say. Elections are won or lost based on who shows up to vote," Boehner told more than 100 people at Butler County Republican Party headquarters before volunteers fanned out with yard signs, rolls of stickers and campaign door hangers.

Boehner faces questioning in the House ethics committee investigation of the page scandal unfolding since Florida Republican Rep. Mark Foley resigned over suggestive instant messages sent to a former page in 2003.

Boehner told reporters he didn't know earlier of the messages that prompted Foley's departure and suspects their release was timed politically.

"I had no knowledge. I don't think the speaker or anybody else in the leadership had any knowledge of these sexually explicit messages," Boehner said. "The question is who did know? Why did they show up when they did?"

In Ohio, the page scandal has affected the race of Republican Deborah Pryce, he said. Democrat Mary Jo Kilroy ran a radio ad highlighting Pryce's friendship with Foley.

Also Saturday, Democratic Rep. John Murtha campaigned in Ohio for fellow Democrat Victoria Wulsin, who is challenging first-term Republican Rep. Jean Schmidt in the state's 2nd District. Schmidt criticized Murtha's call to pull troops out of Iraq on the floor of the House last year.

The 16-term Pennsylvania congressman said there needs to be "a return to civility" in Washington and said the Iraq war is a costly failure that's only going to get worse if U.S. troops remain.

"The Iraqis have to figure this out themselves," he said.

During a debate last November, Schmidt spoke of a phone call she received from a Marine colonel saying he "asked me to send Congressman Murtha a message -- that cowards cut and run, Marines never do."

The remark prompted boos from Democrats and brought the House to a standstill. Schmidt subsequently apologized to Murtha and said she hadn't realized he was a decorated Marine veteran of the Vietnam War.

Schmidt wouldn't comment on Murtha's visit, but said her constituents agree with her support of the president's Iraq policy, not Murtha's call for withdrawal. She received campaign help Saturday from Rob Portman, the White House budget chief and the district's representative for 12 years before Schmidt.

During his visit, Murtha also helped raise funds for Wulsin, a medical doctor and former public health officer. He said little about Schmidt, saying his main campaign mission is to get a Democratic majority in the House.

Confessions Of A 'Defeatocrat' (WP)

By John P. Murtha

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

The Republicans are running scared. In the White House, on Capitol Hill and on the campaign trail, they're worried about losing control of Congress. And so the administration and the GOP have launched a desperate assault on Democrats and our position on the war in Iraq. Defeatists, they call us, and appeasers and -- oh so cleverly -- "Defeatocrats."

DOJ_NMG_0081762

Vice President Cheney has accused Democrats of "self-defeating pessimism." Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld has faulted us for believing that "vicious extremists can be appeased." The White House calls Democrats the party of "cut and run."

It's all baseless name-calling, and it's all wrong. Unless, of course, being a Defeatocrat means taking a good hard look at the administration's Iraq policy and determining that it's a failure.

In that case, count me in. Because Democrats recognize that we're headed for a far greater disaster in Iraq if we don't change course -- and soon. This is not defeatism. This is realism.

Our troops who are putting their lives on the line deserve a plan that matches our military prowess with diplomatic and political skill. They deserve a clear and achievable mission and they deserve to know precisely what it will take to accomplish it. They deserve answers, not spin.

Our military has done all it can do in Iraq, and the Iraqis want their occupation to end. I support bringing our troops home at the earliest practicable date, at a rate that will keep those remaining there safe on the ground. It's time that the White House and the GOP start working with Democrats in Congress to come up with a reasonable timetable for withdrawal and for handing the Iraqi government over to the Iraqis.

The administration's use of Rovian catchphrases is nothing but propaganda designed to stifle the loyal opposition. We Democrats are determined to restore our nation's military strength, refocus on the real terrorist threat, bolster security safeguards at home and reestablish the credible standing we once had in the world. That is not defeatist. It is a call to formulate and execute a winning game plan for the War on Terror.

Most Democrats voted against the 2002 resolution authorizing the use of military force in Iraq. Regrettably, I was not one of them. Since entering Congress in 1974, I have always supported the president on issues of war. But in this case, I made a mistake -- and unlike certain members of the administration, I'm willing to say so. If I had known in October 2002 what I know now, I would never have voted for the resolution.

Some of my Democratic colleagues questioned whether Iraq posed an immediate threat to our national security; some were not convinced that Iraq was accelerating the development of nuclear weapons and had an active chemical and biological weapons program; and almost all believed that Iraq was not involved in the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. They turned out to be right on all three counts. Nevertheless, since our forces deployed to Iraq, Democratic support for the troops has never wavered.

In the past nine months alone, $962 billion has been appropriated for the Defense Department, $190 billion for the war effort. A vast majority of Democrats voted for the funding. Democrats also identified shortfalls in body armor, armored vehicles and electronic jammers to defeat roadside bombs. Democrats uncovered problems with the military readiness of our ground forces in the United States and fought for measures to restore it. That's hardly defeatist.

When U.S. forces first entered Baghdad, the Iraqi people cheered as the statue of Saddam Hussein was torn from its pedestal. Forty-two months and $400 billion later, we are caught in a civil war in which 61 percent of Iraqis think killing Americans is justified and the Iraqi people butcher one another at an alarming rate. We are considered occupiers. The longer we stay, the harder it becomes for the Iraqis to find their own destiny.

The administration's "stay-the-course" strategy is not a plan for victory. It's not even a plan. All we have is a new military blueprint to keep 140,000 troops in Iraq through 2010.

We are seeing an astonishing and unprecedented parade of retired U.S. generals calling for a new direction in Iraq. These are voices of bravery, experience, conscience and loyalty. These are men who have been taught to look coldly and objectively at the facts of bloodshed. Can they all be wrong? How about the 15 intelligence agencies that recently offered the opinion that this war has not made us safer? Are they all defeatists? Are they to be ignored?

Was Gen. Eric K. Shinseki, former Army chief of staff, a defeatist when he said that it would take several hundred thousand troops to prevail in Iraq? His recommendation was ignored. Or what about Gen. Jay M. Garner, our first administrator in Iraq, who recommended that the Iraqi army be kept intact and used to stabilize the country? His recommendations were ignored. The Iraqi army was disbanded and the former military took their munitions and went off to form the core of the insurgency. Was former secretary of state Colin L. Powell defeatist when he warned: "If you break it, you own it"? Was Republican Dwight D. Eisenhower a defeatist when he ran for president in 1952 to change the course of Democrat Harry S. Truman's administration in Korea?

Will the White House toss the same tired insults at Sen. John W. Warner (Va.), the Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, who has voiced concern over the situation in Iraq? Or at former secretary of state James A. Baker III when the commission he is co-chairing delivers its report on reassessing our options in Iraq?

This administration's insistence on a "go-it-alone, stay-the-course" policy in the face of objections from a majority of Americans and Iraqis and most world public opinion, and in the face of a deteriorating situation, defies logic.

The United States is about to begin its fifth year of occupation and fighting in Iraq. That makes this war longer than U.S. participation in World Wars I and II, and longer than the Korean War and our own Civil War. With every year of occupation, our efforts to fight global terrorism and our military's readiness to fight future wars have further deteriorated, along with our standing in the world. Meanwhile, the radical Islamic cause wins more and more recruits.

Despite the presence of more than 140,000 U.S. troops in Iraq, 23,000 Americans injured or killed, tens of thousands of Iraqi deaths and the expenditure of nearly a half a trillion dollars, here are the dismal results:

Â· In September, 776 U.S troops were wounded in Iraq, the highest monthly toll in more than two years.

Â· Over the past year, the number of attacks against U.S. personnel has doubled, rising from 400 to more than 800 per week.

Â· Zalmay Khalilzad, the U.S. ambassador to Iraq, recently acknowledged that sectarian violence has replaced the insurgency as the single biggest threat to Iraq.

Â· In the past two months, 6,000 Iraqis died, more than in the first year of the war.

Â· Last week, electricity output averaged 2.4 hours per day in Baghdad and 10.4 hours nationwide -- 7 percent less than in the same period in 2005.

Â· A Sept. 27 World Public Opinion poll indicated that 91 percent of Iraqi Sunnis and 74 percent of Iraqi Shiites want the Iraqi government to ask U.S.-led forces to withdraw within a year. Ninety-seven percent of Sunnis and 82 percent of Shiites said that the U.S. military presence is "provoking more conflict than it is preventing." And Iraqi support for attacks against U.S.-led forces has increased sharply over the past few months, from 47 percent to 61 percent.

Now, Karl Rove may call me a defeatist, but can anyone living in the real world deny that these statistics are heading in the wrong direction? Yet despite this bleak record of performance, the president continues to stand by his team of failed architects, preferring to prop them up instead of demanding accountability.

Democrats are fighting a war on two fronts: One is combating the spin and intimidation that defines this administration. The other is fighting to change course, to do things better, to substitute smart, disciplined strategy for dogma and denial in Iraq.

That's not defeatism. That's our duty.

He served 37 years in the Marine Corps.

Rep. Murtha Blasts GOP For Name - Calling (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Rep. John Murtha, a decorated Marine veteran who favors withdrawing U.S. troops from Iraq, wrote an essay for Sunday's Washington Post blasting Republicans for referring to him and other Iraq war opponents as "Defeatocrats."

In his opinion piece, first published on the Post's Web site Saturday night, Murtha, D-Pa., said Vice President Dick Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and others in the White House have called Iraq war opponents appeasers and pessimists and labeled Democrats the "cut and run" party.

"It's all baseless name-calling, and it's all wrong," Murtha wrote. "Unless, of course, being a Defeatocrat means taking a good hard look at the administration's Iraq policy and determining that it's a failure.

"In that case, count me in. Because Democrats recognize that we're headed for a far greater disaster in Iraq if we don't change course -- and soon. This is not defeatism. This is realism."

Murtha, a military hawk and close confidant of top military officials, surprised Washington last year when he called for pulling all troops out of Iraq within months.

At a GOP fundraiser in Milwaukee last month, Cheney accused Murtha of advocating a policy of retreat in the war against terrorism.

In the Post essay, Murtha wrote: "Democrats are fighting a war on two fronts: One is combating the spin and intimidation that defines this administration. The other is fighting to change course, to do things better, to substitute smart, disciplined strategy for dogma and denial in Iraq.

"That's not defeatism. That's our duty," Murtha wrote.

Murtha's Opposition To Iraq War Makes Him A Big Target (PPG)

By Bill Toland, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, October 15, 2006

Rarely in the annals of American politics has the much-used David-Goliath analogy been so apropos. U.S. Rep. John Murtha is literally and figuratively daunting -- literally because he's 6 feet, 3 inches tall and broad-shouldered with a booming voice; figuratively because he's a giant in Congress, a 32-year veteran of the House of Representatives. And his challenger, Republican Diana Irey, is the opposite -- soft-spoken, slight, barely clearing 5 feet, a neophyte on the national stage.

We know how the Bible story ended. But can Mrs. Irey slay this towering Johnstown warrior?

Since earning a surprising victory in her first run for political office, when she defeated an incumbent to secure a seat on the Washington County Board of Commissioners in 1995, Mrs. Irey has been a favorite among Pennsylvania's GOP notables such as former Allegheny County Chief Executive Jim Roddey, and Sens. Arlen Specter and Rick Santorum. A West Virginia native, she married into a family with some clout. Her late father-in-law, Frank Irey, was GOP chairman in Washington County. For years, there had been speculation that she'd be recruited to run for higher office, but, until now, she's balked, citing her young family and her comfort with her role in Washington, Pa.

What changed? Last autumn, she said, Mr. Murtha's call for American withdrawal from Iraq lit a fire. At the same time, she had been marginalized on the commissioners board, the only Republican there, serving with two Democrats. Add a dash of ambition and the timing was right.

"Jack Murtha's been in office for 32 years, and that's too long," said Mrs. Irey, 44, the mother of three teens. "I believe he's lost touch with the beliefs of the people in the 12th District. ... He no longer is voting the conservative values of the 12th District. He's voting more like he's the congressman from liberal San Francisco than conservative southwestern Pennsylvania."

National exposure

With more than $2.5 million raised and $1.8 million on hand, Mr. Murtha is financially better off than his foe. Mrs. Irey had raised $305,000 and had $159,000 in cash on hand as of June 30, the most recent Federal Election Commission reporting deadline. And, despite her hopes of using Mr. Murtha's well-publicized Iraq comments to nationalize the race and her fund-raising base -- "We have contributions from all 50 states," she said -- $36,000, or 23 percent, of her campaign funds have come from out of state. And a recently published poll showed her trailing 57 percent to 30.

Still, those numbers tell just part of the story. Mrs. Irey has outpaced several of Pennsylvania's congressional challengers and has raised more money than at least one incumbent. Her invitations to "Fox News Live" and "Hannity & Colmes," and her stint on "Hardball with Chris Matthews" are as good as free advertising and are luxuries that aren't afforded to all congressional challengers. She's also been supported by a vociferous Internet-based anti-Murtha campaign, organized by a group known as Vets for the Truth, which has rallied opposition to certain Democratic candidates who have served in the U.S. military. Presidential candidate Sen. John F. Kerry was the group's most notable victim.

Mrs. Irey hopes that outside support will be joined by a regional electorate that registers Democratic but often votes conservatively. Over the course of a half-hour interview, Mrs. Irey tossed up a dozen conservative boilerplate issues: gay marriage, the Pledge of Allegiance, immigration and border security, lower taxes, drilling in Alaska's Arctic National Wildlife Refuge, and, of course, her support and Mr. Murtha's disapproval of the Iraq war.

The war looms as the largest issue in many congressional races across the country, but especially so in this race. Mr. Murtha, 74, a retired Marine reservist and the top-ranking Democrat on the House committee that disburses defense appropriations, crashed into the national consciousness in November, when he called for a military withdrawal from Iraq, to be carried out at the earliest practical date. He became a darling of the anti-war left and, just as quickly, a target for the right, which has branded him a traitor.

Both candidates say they speak for veterans. Mr. Murtha has done so historically, noting that he visits military hospitals once a week, and he suggests that he, and not Mrs. Irey, is in better position to gauge the military's mood. His opposition to the war "is a policy thing. This has nothing to do with supporting the military," he said.

But Mrs. Irey predicts she'll win close to half of the veteran voting bloc Nov. 7. The disaffection with Mr. Murtha is greater than his campaign realizes, she said. "Every time we withdraw before a mission is completed," Mrs. Irey said, "we send a message of surrender."

Mrs. Irey has seized on not only Mr. Murtha's November comments, but also his response to the deaths of two dozen unarmed Haditha, Iraq, residents who were killed by U.S. Marines reportedly outraged over the death of a comrade. Mr. Murtha said the Marine group killed in "cold blood," and suggested that the group's superiors tried to cover up the deaths. "Our troops overreacted because of the pressure on them, and they killed innocent civilians in cold blood," he said.

The remarks "were completely inappropriate," said Mrs. Irey. "That was a rush to judgment. What he did was wrong."

His sudden outspokenness is surprising to those who have known him over his three decades in Congress. Until last year, Mr. Murtha was generally viewed as a behind-the-scenes deal-maker who was able to navigate the congressional power structure while rarely airing dirty laundry. His Haditha comments seemed out of character, and politically ill-advised. So, too, did his remarks at a Sept. 30 political rally, during which he said that he knew of military wives who were abused by their soldier husbands.

"This war is [tearing] the families apart," he said. "I see women who have been abused when their husbands come home."

DOJ_NMG_0081765

If the Haditha comments don't hurt him, Mrs. Irey hopes that Mr. Murtha's ancillary role in the Abscam congressional bribery scandal will. Like some of Mr. Murtha's previous opponents, she hopes to make hay by pointing out that Mr. Murtha was an "unindicted co-conspirator" in the 1980s scandal. The FBI sting netted several congressmen, including two from Pennsylvania, by offering bribes in exchange for favors and asylum for a fictitious Arab sheik.

When an agent offered $50,000, Mr. Murtha memorably responded: "I'm not interested, at this point." In resurrecting Abscam, Mrs. Irey has been aided by talk radio, as well as by The American Spectator magazine, which unearthed the hour-long video of the attempted sting and released it last month. In the video, Mr. Murtha invites the agents to invest in his district, possibly in the coal mining industry, or in area banks, hoping to bring jobs to his district.

He also seems aware that he is toeing the legal line, and says he doesn't plan to throw away his legislative career for a few bucks.

"I'm going to be there 20 years in that Congress, and I don't want to screw it up by some little thing along the way. If I wanted to make a lot of money, I'd have been outside," in the private sector, he says. Mr. Murtha, then as now, reminds voters that "I was the one who didn't take the money."

How serious a threat?

How seriously does Mr. Murtha take the Irey campaign?

It's tough to say. Publicly, he says his campaign's internal polls show a generous lead, and he says he doesn't count Mrs. Irey among his toughest challengers. "Mascara was a threat. Bailey was a threat. They were sitting congressmen," he said, speaking of former Reps. Frank Mascara, a Democrat who lost his district to Mr. Murtha in a primary forced by reapportionment, and Don Bailey, who lost the same way.

But he's also hired a private detective to look into Mrs. Irey's past. The firm, Gentile-Meinert and Associates, didn't discover anything of note, Mr. Murtha said, although it reported that Mrs. Irey has a poor attendance record. She's been appointed to a lot of boards, but doesn't always attend the meetings, he said.

He said the hiring an investigator was not an indication that he views Mrs. Irey as a contender. His campaign hires a detective to investigate all of his political opponents, Mr. Murtha said.

Mrs. Irey sees it another way.

"People across the nation care about this race," she said. "Of course, it has very little to do with me, and everything to do with my opponent." For example, donations to her campaign spike each time she appears on cable TV to criticize Mr. Murtha.

Still, the spikes don't add up to much, relative to Mr. Murtha's campaign funds. Trailing in money, she'll have to hope that her many TV appearances will help build name recognition in the eastern part of the district, then rely on her popularity in parts west, where she's been in office longer than Mr. Murtha has. Though he's been in Congress for 16 terms, and is now seeking his 17th, much of Mr. Murtha's district -- including the Washington County side -- is new to him, a result of redistricting after the 2000 Census.

He said his district has a Democratic voting registration majority of 150,000. But in recent elections, some of those registered Democrats have been voting Republican. In the 2004 presidential election, Westmoreland and Cambria counties tilted to President Bush. Mr. Murtha's 12th District contains pieces of both counties, all of Greene County, jagged bits of Armstrong, Fayette, Indiana, Somerset and Washington counties, and a sliver of Allegheny.

Recent history, as far as Mr. Murtha is concerned, is ancient history. "Our polling says they're not going to vote Republican this time," he said. "The Democrats are going to be in the majority. There's going to be a hurricane throughout the country."

But Mrs. Irey hopes the country's anti-Republican mood will be trumped by more generic anti-incumbent sentiments. "I'm afraid that our nation is headed in the wrong direction," she said. "This is going to be the Diana and Goliath story."

In Pennsylvania, Questions About War Erode A Traditional Republican Advantage (NYT)

By Kate Zernike

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

EDGMONT, Pa., Oct. 12 — When Joe Sestak announced he was running for Congress, national Democrats and media consultants told him not to talk about pulling troops out of Iraq, arguing it would only encourage the image of Democrats as weak on national security.

Nine months later, having ignored their advice, Mr. Sestak has put a 20-year Republican incumbent on the run for the first time, turning a bid by a political novice into a real race. Polls show that Mr. Sestak is running even or better with his opponent, Representative Curt Weldon, and that the war more than any other issue is propelling voters toward him.

Facing pressure from Mr. Sestak and a stream of bad news from Iraq, Mr. Weldon, who prides himself on his foreign policy credentials, has adopted an unconventional proposal to allow the generals on the ground, rather than President Bush as commander in chief, to decide the pace of a phased withdrawal.

"That's what I've asked the president to articulate," Mr. Weldon said in an interview, "but so far he's been unwilling to do so."

Mr. Sestak's persistence on the issue, and Mr. Weldon's efforts to recalibrate his position, highlight some of the ways Iraq may be altering the politics of national security after decades in which the advantage has gone to the Republicans.

Democrats are increasingly confident that they can win on national security by arguing, as Mr. Sestak does, that going to war with Iraq ignored the more potent threats of North Korea and Iran, and that staying has left the nation unprepared to deal with crises elsewhere.

Mr. Sestak's résumé provides the Democrats an especially good opportunity to be seen as strong when it comes to protecting the country: a former three-star admiral, he worked as a national security adviser in the Clinton White House.

In an election where every seat matters — Democrats need 15 to win a majority in the House — Mr. Sestak's credentials could prove crucial. The Seventh Congressional District race here in the wealthy Philadelphia suburbs has emerged as the most competitive in one of the most competitive states for House races.

"We wouldn't be talking about this race if it weren't for the Iraq war," said G. Terry Madonna, the director of the Keystone Poll at Franklin & Marshall College in Lancaster. "It's been a long time since I've seen a foreign policy issue like the war dominate a suburban Congressional race. No one can honestly believe that Sestak would be a serious challenger to Weldon if it weren't for the war. His experience has given him added credibility."

Mr. Weldon is not shy about foreign policy: he has made several trips to North Korea and pushed for a missile defense system. Bucking ridicule and the conclusions of the Bush administration, he has argued that the jury is still out on whether there were unconventional weapons when the United States went into Iraq, and that the 9/11 commission ignored evidence that a secret Pentagon program had identified several hijackers before the attacks.

But Mr. Weldon faces other issues on the foreign policy front. Law enforcement officials said Saturday, for instance, that they were investigating his role in securing lobbying contracts for his daughter's international public relations firm.

In this race, however, Mr. Weldon has tried to run on his local bona fides — his roots in a blue-collar town here, the money he has brought home — dismissing Mr. Sestak, who grew up in the district but lived elsewhere for 31 years in the military. But the war has been hard to avoid.

At an event for Republican women at the Edgmont Country Club, he talked about his successes in land preservation and economic development, and named local hospital and social service agency executives as close friends. "I'm running on what we've done," he told the audience.

A woman raised her hand: "You need to instruct us: what about bringing home the troops, which seems to be the most important issue, and the blame and so forth on all our Republican candidates?" she asked. "What should campaign workers say about Republicans bringing home the troops?"

Mr. Weldon replied, "It's a good question, it's a tough issue," then outlined again his plan to let the generals decide when the Iraqi army is ready, and to dismiss an American brigade as each Iraqi one is ready.

"I don't want Dick Cheney or Don Rumsfeld doing it," he said. "We don't need some armchair politician back in Washington, because they want to run for office, to pick a date out of the air. The generals on the ground decide it's time to bring our troops home in a phased withdrawal, which they are doing, then that's the system we have in place."

"Look, all of us want out of that war," he added. Then he changed the subject to North Korea, saying he was the first congressman to go there, and had just spent the weekend on the phone with the United Nations to try to resolve the nuclear crisis.

The most recent Keystone Poll showed about a quarter of registered Republicans saying they would cross lines to vote for Mr. Sestak. He has attracted a broad coalition; in one evening, he went from a fund-raiser with Howard Dean to a meeting of suburban Republican women.

"People don't see a clear strategy, they don't see why we went in, they don't see how we're going to get out," said Anne St. Clair, a Republican who has voted for Mr. Weldon but is now leading Republicans for Sestak and had invited the women to meet him at her home in Thornton, Pa.

Ms. St. Clair said she and her husband grew disenchanted with their party when they lived abroad in the last several years and watched the nation's reputation deteriorate. "The current administration feels they know what's best for this country and for the rest of the world," she said. "I came home and felt like I didn't recognize my party."

A drab conference room in East Goshen Township exploded into applause as Mr. Sestak said that he was a few points ahead in a recent poll. For an hour, the audience asked questions on North Korea, Saudi Arabia, Pakistan, and how to provide a powerful defense but avoid war.

"I'm not antiwar," he told them. "I am for a strong defense that helps to shape a global environment that moves towards peace and prosperity by having all elements of our power out there — from diplomacy to our economy to the power of our ideals, and our military backing them up. That does not mean going on reckless misadventures like Iraq, to impose ourselves, or to go against where there really wasn't a clear and present danger."

His answers pleased Lowell Young, a retiree who voted for John Kerry in 2004 but said he did not like to think of himself as a Democrat.

"The Democrats are too wishy-washy," Mr. Young said, giving as an example the debate over legislation governing treatment of terrorism suspects, where the Democrats sat back while Republicans negotiated with the White House. "They're afraid to take a stand, they're afraid they're going to be seen as weak on national security. They need a backbone. Joe seems to have it."

Still, national Republicans have reserved about $8 million in television time in Pennsylvania for the last month of the campaign, the bulk of it in this district. And Mr. Madonna, the pollster, said the result would probably be influenced by international events in the next several weeks.

"Democrats have begun to turn their image around, but it just takes something like the London bombings to gin up fears," he said. "There's just enough in the Republican arsenal — to argue that what Clinton did on North Korea was wrong, for instance — to keep voters not entirely comfortable with Democrats on the national security issue."

Endorsement In Louisiana (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

BATON ROUGE, La., Oct. 14 (AP) — The Louisiana Democratic Party on Saturday turned down Representative William J. Jefferson, an eight-term congressman, and endorsed State Representative Karen R. Carter, one of a dozen challengers who emerged after Mr. Jefferson became a target of a federal bribery investigation.

The State Central Committee voted 69 to 53 at a special meeting to decide whom to endorse in Louisiana's open primaries on Nov. 7. This is the first time in recent memory that an incumbent has failed to win the state party's endorsement. All seven of the state's Congressional seats are open.

Mr. Jefferson denies the bribery accusations and has not been charged.

A Kentucky businessman, Vernon L. Jackson, pleaded guilty to charges that he made payments to a consulting firm run by Mr. Jefferson's wife in return for the congressman's help on business deals in Africa.

Hefley Risks GOP Hold On Colorado Seat (WT)

By Valerie Richardson, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 15, 2006

COLORADO SPRINGS -- Republican state Sen. Doug Lamborn's fiercest opponent in the 5th District race isn't his Democratic foe. It's the Republican he's trying to succeed -- 10-term Rep. Joel Hefley.

Mr. Lamborn is running neck and neck with Democrat Jay Fawcett, a veteran and small-business owner, in the ultraconservative district, according to a Denver Post poll released last week.

One of the reasons: Mr. Hefley.

Shortly after Mr. Lamborn won a six-candidate primary on Aug. 8, Mr. Hefley, who is retiring, said he would refuse to endorse the Republican candidate, pointing to what he described as his "sleazy, dishonest campaign."

That stinging rebuke, coming from the highly regarded Mr. Hefley, delivered a devastating blow to Mr. Lamborn's candidacy. Several other prominent Republicans soon joined Mr. Hefley in refusing to endorse Mr. Lamborn, pointing to ads and mailings they say unfairly demonized his Republican foes.

One flier, sent out by the local Christian Coalition, accused fellow Republican Jeff Crank of supporting "the radical homosexual agenda." Radio and television ads produced by the Club for Growth accused Mr. Crank, who was Mr. Lamborn's chief rival for the nomination, of supporting tax increases.

Mr. Lamborn has insisted he had no control over the content of the disputed materials because they were put out by independent political committees, not his campaign.

"Unfortunately, Mr. Hefley is not revealing that the ads he disagreed with were run by third-party groups that I had nothing to do with," Mr. Lamborn said Friday.

Meanwhile, Mr. Fawcett has taken full advantage of the internecine squabble, running newspaper ads last week listing state Republican leaders under the headline, "None of These Republicans Will Endorse Doug Lamborn for Congress."

Mr. Hefley responded Friday with a statement stressing that he would not support Mr. Fawcett, either, but repeating his earlier remarks about Mr. Lamborn.

DOJ_NMG_0081768

"I do not endorse liberal Democrats, and I regard Jay Fawcett as a liberal Democrat," he said. "I also do not endorse people who I feel run sleazy, dishonest campaigns, regardless of their political affiliation."

During a debate here yesterday, a smiling Mr. Fawcett held up the front page of the Colorado Springs Gazette with the headline, "Hefley Supports 'None of the Above' in 5th."

Mr. Lamborn, meanwhile, said nothing about the Hefley comments, instead describing himself repeatedly as a "Ronald Reagan Republican" and stressing the theme, "I am a conservative Republican, and he is a liberal Democrat."

Still, Mr. Hefley's remarks have stuck.

"That one comment, 'sleazy campaign,' is what has defined the Lamborn campaign," Colorado College political science professor Robert Loevy said. "The issue is Lamborn, not the Democrat. If Lamborn is defeated, it will be because of Joel Hefley."

National Democrats have taken notice. Last week, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee raised the race's profile to an "emerging race." At the same time, other Republicans are speaking out in Mr. Lamborn's defense.

"I've known Doug Lamborn for years in the legislature, and I have not found anyone with higher integrity than Doug," said Republican state Sen. Dave Schultheis of Colorado Springs.

Working in Mr. Lamborn's favor is the district's overwhelmingly Republican makeup. The Republicans hold a 2-1 registration edge, and no Democrat has been elected to the seat since its creation in 1972.

But the district is also heavily populated by active and retired military, and Mr. Fawcett has the advantage of being a retired Air Force officer.

Dems Have Clear Shot At DeLay's Seat (AP-Y)

By Joe Stinebaker, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 14, 2006

Voting Republican in this conservative district was never difficult when Tom DeLay's name was on the ballot. With DeLay out of the race and the GOP unable by law to substitute a name on the ballot, voters must write in the Republican candidate, Houston City Councilwoman Shelley Sekula-Gibbs. That could prove to be such a chore that Democrats might walk away with a seat that has long been in the GOP's hands.

Cynthia Hart, a straight-ticket Republican and mother of three in suburban Houston, said she was unaware she would have to write in the Republican candidate.

"I guess I have to be more careful," Hart said. "But I'm not so sure I would take the time to go through all that."

That's welcome news to Democrats who see a real chance for capturing the former House majority leader's seat, a gain that could help them wrest control of the House from the GOP. Democrats need to gain 15 seats to seize the majority.

Beyond the math, winning in DeLay's district would be sweet revenge for an opposition party that has suffered the powerful Republican's wrath for nearly a decade. Democrats have a legitimate candidate in Nick Lampson, a former congressman who has outraised, outspent and campaigned longer than the Republicans.

Less than a month to the election, Lampson isn't gloating.

"Certainly, there's the satisfaction of being able to win, and to prove your point, but it was always about the issues," Lampson said. "I obviously felt he (DeLay) was vulnerable or I wouldn't have gotten into it. Some thought that I was nuts, but I guess when you believe strongly enough that something needs to change, you're willing to do extraordinary things to do it."

DeLay resigned from Congress in June amid a series of investigations of his fundraising activities. The courts refused to allow Republicans to replace him on the ballot, leading him to withdraw from the race and forcing Republicans to turn to Sekula-Gibbs as a write-in candidate.

National Republicans were supposed to invest $3 million to $4 million to help Sekula-Gibbs, according to state Republican chairwoman Tina Benkiser. So far, however, she's received just $134,000 from the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Lampson had $2.2 million to spend as of June 30.

Sekula-Gibbs, 53, insists the national attention surrounding the race and intense media coverage locally have helped her overcome any disadvantages. The dermatologist entered politics after her husband, local television anchorman Sylvan Rodriguez, died of cancer.

"It was essential to me that we maintain a conservative voice in Washington," she said in explaining her decision. "The people of this district are very conservative. They want a conservative voice. And the individual who the Democrats have offered is far from conservative."

Although Lampson gets low marks from conservative groups, he secured the endorsement of the National Rifle Association, a prize among Texas candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0081769

Sekula-Gibbs strongly supports the war in Iraq, opposes abortion and favors building a fence and stationing the National Guard at the Mexican border to stop illegal immigration.

Lampson, 61, describes the war in Iraq as "a mess," but he says he opposes withdrawing until the Iraqi army is capable of controlling the country. He favors sending more border agents south but not the military. He also advocates more rigorous prosecution of businesses that knowingly hire illegal immigrants.

Lampson plays down party affiliation in the Republican-leaning district, which President Bush won with 64 percent of the vote in 2004.

"I believe that people want something different from the partisanship that they have been experiencing," he said, noting that he received 60 percent of the vote in his old district, which was 53 percent Republican.

Much of Sekula-Gibbs' time and money has gone toward telling voters who she is and how to vote for her. Vice President Dick Cheney headlined a fundraiser for her earlier this month. The campaign also had been working to bring in House Speaker Dennis Hastert, but it quickly abandoned those plans in the wake of the congressional page scandal.

Advertising may help voters gain familiarity with Sekula-Gibbs' write-in campaign, but some experts predict it won't help enough.

The district uses electronic voting and voters will have to highlight and enter the "write-in" entry. They then turn a small wheel on the voting machine and spell out Sekula-Gibbs' name. Misspellings or other errors will be accepted as votes as long as the voter's intent is clear to members of "resolution committees" made up of Republicans and Democrats in each county.

Helen Square, an independent voter from Houston, said she would write in Sekula-Gibbs because she was familiar with her work on Houston City Council.

"I like to vote for the person," Square said, "and not for the party."

Alvin and Ruth Ziehr, a Pearland couple, said they try to keep up with local politics but acknowledged it's been difficult to stay atop changes in this race. The two knew that "Shelley someone" was mounting a GOP write-in effort and that no Republican would appear on the ballot.

"But that's all right with me," laughed Alvin Ziehr. "I've never voted Republican in my life."

Salazar True To His District (DENP)

Denver Post, October 14, 2006

John Salazar served in the U.S. Army during the Vietnam era, and is the only veteran in Colorado's congressional delegation. He's a farmer who isn't away from the land long enough to forget its many challenges. When he was elected to Congress two years ago, we wondered whether Salazar would bring this experience to bear.

In his first term representing the sprawling 3rd Congressional District, Salazar gained a seat on the House Veterans Affairs Committee and used the position to push for expanded veterans health care, fairer treatment of military widows and for cracking down on fraudulent claims for military medals.

Salazar also has been active on two other panels well-suited to serve a district that counts farming, ranching and tourism as key industries: Transportation and Infrastructure, and Agriculture. In those roles, he has fought for overdue highway improvements and sought to promote cleaner fossil fuel technologies, along with such renewable energy sources as ethanol.

Salazar's freshman performance and keen interest in 3rd District issues has earned him re-election.

By Democratic standards, Salazar is cut from conservative cloth, as evidenced by his vote to repeat the estate tax and the fact that he has the support of the National Rifle Association. That may account for the fact that the GOP has invested little in the 3rd though registered Republicans outnumber Democrats by about 20,000 voters.

Republican candidate Scott Tipton, owner of the Mesa Verde Trading Co., is an engaging rival and longtime GOP activist. Tipton's been crisscrossing the district in a high-mileage pickup, and we like his spunk and his willingness to provide an alternative.

Tipton sounds the standard-issue Republican calls to rein in a federal bureaucracy and free-spending Congress, but he has no answer to the fact that Congress has been entirely controlled by his own party for the past six years as the fiscal climate has turned ugly.

Third district voters are more likely to achieve real change by returning the free-thinking incumbent, Salazar, than by sending Tipton to Congress to reinforce the status quo.

Of 53 Races, Only 3 Offer Ray Of Hope To Non-Incumbent Party's Candidates (LAT)

By Tony Perry, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

SAN DIEGO — The congressional election isn't until Nov. 7, but the real decisions may have been made in 2001, the last time district lines were redrawn in California.

Of 53 districts in the state, only three have drawn much interest, two of those because of the ethical problems of the Republican incumbents.

And to call all three competitive could be a stretch.

"In California, we have 20 safe Republican seats and 33 safe Democratic seats" and not much in between, said Gary Jacobson, congressional scholar at UC San Diego.

Still, Democrats are hoping for electoral lighting to strike in the districts that are represented by longtime GOP incumbents John T. Doolittle and Richard W. Pombo and by recycled incumbent Brian Bilbray.

Doolittle (R-Roseville) was associated with disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Pombo (R-Tracy) is the bete noire of the environmental movement and took money from Abramoff. Bilbray (R-Carlsbad) took over, after a June special election, the seat once held by Randall "Duke" Cunningham, who is now imprisoned for bribery. He previously served three terms in Congress from another district.

But if lightning is to strike, it will have to defy some daunting numbers from the past.

In four decades, Jacobson said, no Democrat has beaten a Republican in a congressional district in which Republicans held a registration edge of four percentage points or greater.

In Doolittle's district, the pro-GOP margin is 18 percentage points, in Pombo's 6 and in Bilbray's 14.

With those numbers, and their belief that neither the Iraq war nor the Mark Foley page scandal will make Republicans dump their party's candidates, Republican strategists are talking with confidence.

"California is the quietest state in the nation when it comes to congressional races," said Jonathan Collegio, a spokesman for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Democrats, however, think that Pombo is vulnerable because of his position against the Endangered Species Act, among other things.

Busloads of environmental activists from the Bay Area are providing energy to dump the seven-time incumbent in favor of wind-turbine manufacturer Jerry McNerney, the Democrat.

"We see fertile opportunity in the ethical problems of Pombo and Doolittle, the national climate, and the proclivity of the House Republican leadership to look the other way" in the Foley-page scandal, said Kate Bedingfield, a spokeswoman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

In the district in northern San Diego County once represented by Cunningham, the Democratic Party has listed Francine Busby's as an "emerging race" as she tries to oust Bilbray, who defeated her in a June special election.

Busby, a school board member and women's-studies lecturer, has called on House Speaker Dennis Hastert (R-Illinois) to resign because of a failure to investigate early signs of impropriety involving ex-Rep. Foley and the pages. She has challenged Bilbray to do the same, but he has refused.

Issues aside, politics is a game of numbers — registration and money — and in both regards incumbents enjoy the advantage.

"Gerrymandering has all but abolished competitiveness in November," said Allan Hoffenblum, a Republican consultant and editor of the nonpartisan Target Book.

So lopsided is the registration that, for example, Democratic incumbents Xavier Becerra, Diane Watson and Maxine Waters of Los Angeles, Lucille Roybal-Allard of East Los Angeles, Juanita Millender-McDonald of Carson and Hilda Solis of El Monte face opposition that is either nonexistent or considered token.

California voters like incumbents, even when they break promises not to become career politicians. Grace F. Napolitano (D-Norwalk) and Ken Calvert (R-Corona) were reelected in 2004 despite breaking term-limit pledges and are running again this year.

Roll Call, the Washingtoninsider newspaper, archly notes that the only chance Republican Peter Hankwitz, a television producer, has of beating Brad Sherman (D-Sherman Oaks) and serving in Congress is if "he stars in a sitcom that takes place on Capitol Hill."

In only one district has the incumbent opted for retirement. Bill Thomas (R-Bakersfield) is retiring; Assembly Minority leader Kevin McCarthy, a former Thomas aide, is favored to replace him. An intra-party fight was avoided in the primary when state Sen. Roy Ashburn of Bakersfield decided not to run.

DOJ_NMG_0081771

In many districts, the only real fight was in the primary.

In the 50th District, Bilbray barely nosed out a millionaire investor, Eric Roach, to win the GOP nomination in the April primary to succeed Cunningham.

Roach considered continuing his candidacy but decided against it after a meeting with party leaders. Bilbray beat Busby in the June runoff to win the remaining months of Cunningham's term.

In the 51st District, which covers part of the San Diego border with Mexico and most of the Imperial Valley, Rep. Bob Filner, a Democrat, won a bitter contest with Assemblyman Juan Vargas of San Diego. Filner is now a prohibitive favorite to beat teacher Mike Blake, a Republican, for his eighth term.

"You have to go with form," Jacobson said. "The world can change, of course, but not very often."

The Contrarian State (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

Reliably Democratic California looks more GOP-friendly this year than much of the U.S. In a climate that favors the moderate, Schwarzenegger sets the tone.

By political tradition, California forges its own way. It has affirmed its place in the forefront of reliably Democratic states even as the nation has kept Republicans firmly in control of Congress and the White House.

So now that the national mood has shifted amid the troubles in Iraq, giving Democrats a shot at seizing Congress, it is oddly fitting that 2006 is shaping up as a strong year for Republicans in California.

The Republican governor, Arnold Schwarzenegger, is heavily favored for reelection Nov. 7 over his Democratic challenger, state Treasurer Phil Angelides. Several other Republicans seeking statewide office are mounting surprisingly competitive races against Democratic rivals, though the outcomes are far from sure. And billions of dollars in bonds and taxes on the ballot face tough prospects, thanks largely to Republican voters' aversion to government growth.

With its nearly 16 million voters spread across more than 163,000 square miles, California is so vast that it creates an election climate of its own. This year, its dominating force is Schwarzenegger, whose comeback from his political collapse last year is driving a potential Republican resurgence in California — or at least what would pass for one in a state so effectively Democratic.

Further isolating California from the national swing toward Democrats is the absence of serious competition in the state's 53 congressional races, but for two U.S. House districts where the reelection of Republicans is somewhat uncertain.

By drawing the state's congressional map to protect incumbents of both major parties, the Legislature has made California immune from "the great churning dissatisfaction with the Republicans on a national level," said Tony Quinn, co-editor of California Target Book, a nonpartisan election guide. "We might as well be out in the Pacific Ocean someplace."

Also marginalizing California's role in the nation's midterm vote is the all-but-guaranteed reelection of Democratic U.S. Sen. Dianne Feinstein. Her Republican opponent, former state Sen. Richard Mountjoy of Monrovia, has raised too little money — and is too conservative — to pose a credible threat.

As for Schwarzenegger, he has refashioned his political image in a way that separates him more than ever from the social conservatives who lead the national Republican Party. A supporter of gay rights, gun control and legal abortion, he has doggedly chased after support from Democrats and independents this year, as must any California Republican running statewide. (Republicans make up 34% of California voters, Democrats 43%. Another 23% have shunned the major parties but still tend to favor Democrats.)

For the most part, Schwarzenegger has done so by striking deals with Democrats who control the Legislature, signing bills he had long resisted. One of them cuts prescription drug costs. Another caps greenhouse gas emissions to put California in the vanguard of the fight to stop global warming.

Schwarzenegger has also neutralized some of the fervent opposition he faced last year from organized labor by signing a bill to raise the minimum wage and by restoring school money that he had diverted to balance the state budget. In a nod to labor's success in defeating his initiatives last November, Schwarzenegger has also dropped his bellicose rhetoric against "union bosses."

"I wouldn't say that California's going Republican so much as the Republican gubernatorial candidate has put on Democratic colors for the sake of the election," said Jeff Lustig, a political science professor at Cal State Sacramento.

DOJ_NMG_0081772

In his reelection ads, Schwarzenegger stresses such typically Democratic issues as schools, healthcare and the environment, along with the touchstone Republican topics of crime and taxes. At the same time, he has joined Democrats in pushing for $37 billion in bonds for vast public construction projects.

The overall mix has enabled Schwarzenegger to cast himself as a centrist in his battle against Angelides, who positioned himself as a liberal in the Democratic primary with a showcase proposal to raise taxes on corporations and the wealthy.

For Angelides, a former developer and state Democratic chairman, the campaign has been disjointed. In the spring primary, he emphasized character, portraying himself as the rare Democrat who had the guts to stand up to Schwarzenegger budget cuts at the peak of the governor's popularity.

Over the summer, he shifted to populist economics: He vowed to fight for middle-class Californians struggling with rising costs of gasoline, healthcare and higher education. To blunt Schwarzenegger's attacks on his history of supporting tax hikes, Angelides also pledged to cut taxes for Californians who make less than $100,000 a year.

Most recently, Angelides has turned to Iraq, saying he would demand the return of California's National Guard troops from the war. The move was part of his effort to depict Schwarzenegger, who has supported the war, as a partisan crony of President Bush, a highly unpopular Republican in California.

The jumble of Angelides approaches reflects his trouble in drawing sharp distinctions with a governor who spent the year racking up bipartisan deals with the Legislature. California may be a Democratic state, but recent history suggests its voters strongly favor moderates regardless of party label.

"Anybody who can dominate the center in this state is going to win," said Gary Jacobson, a UC San Diego political science professor.

Beyond ideology, Schwarzenegger's wide lead in voter surveys also illustrates the potency of a household name, which Angelides lacks. The three Democrats with the strongest statewide poll ratings are also three of the best known: Feinstein, Oakland Mayor and former Gov. Jerry Brown, running for attorney general, and Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer, a candidate for treasurer.

For other races, some Democrats fear Angelides will fail to entice a strong turnout of his own party's voters, helping Republicans. Among the Republicans running close to their rivals were Thousand Oaks state Sen. Tom McClintock for lieutenant governor, Secretary of State Bruce McPherson, who is seeking reelection, Silicon Valley tycoon Steve Poizner for insurance commissioner and former Moorpark Assemblyman Tony Strickland for controller.

Normally, Democrats would hold the edge in all those races, but each Republican has unique advantages. McClintock, facing Insurance Commissioner John Garamendi, is well known from his previous runs for governor and controller. McPherson, named to his job by Schwarzenegger to replace a Democrat who resigned, has the perks of incumbency for his race against state Sen. Debra Bowen of Marina del Rey. And Poizner is dipping into his personal fortune for his contest against Lt. Gov. Cruz Bustamante, whose fundraising practices turned off many voters in his run for governor in the 2003 recall.

Also on the ballot are 13 propositions. Their common theme is money: They call for $46 billion in spending on highways, schools, levees and much more. The state would raise taxes, mainly on oil and tobacco, by more than $3 billion a year. The full package of ballot measures would add $84 billion in debt, including interest, to state budgets over the next 30 years.

Together, the proposals will test whether California's voters stick to the fiscal restraint they established when the state was more amenable to Republicans or embrace an expansive government agenda that buttresses its more recent standing as a Democratic stronghold.

"We could have a complete repudiation of taxes or the most massive public works spending projects we've ever seen in California," said Thad Kousser, an assistant professor of political science at UC San Diego.

"So the stakes are really quite high."

How California Helps Protect GOP Power (LAT)

By Tony Quinn, Tony Quinn Is A Former Consultant To Legislative Republicans On Redistricting And Was An Expert Witn

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

Gerrymandered districts almost ensure no state Republicans will lose their seats even in the worst of times.

WITH THE Mark Foley sex scandal dropping on congressional Republicans like a brick on a teacup, bipartisan decisions made five years ago to gerrymander congressional district lines in California and other states may be all that's left to save the GOP from losing control of Congress.

When the California Legislature redrew the state's political lines in 2001, the priority of both Democrats and Republicans was to put a lock on their respective districts.

DOJ_NMG_0081773

Four GOP incumbent congressmen had lost in the 2000 election, and the party, fearful of losing even more in increasingly blue California, was desperate to hold on to its 20 seats in the House. Republicans offered Democrats a deal: Give us 20 safe seats in the redistricting plan, and you can do anything you want with the remaining 33.

Districts must be equally populated. But in a bipartisan gerrymander, other factors — protecting racial minorities, ensuring compact districts — can be easily ignored, as they were in the 2001 redistricting. Job security was uppermost in the minds of the Democratic and Republican mapmakers.

Rep. Howard L. Berman, for example, wanted to dilute the number of Latinos in his San Fernando Valley district to avoid a Latino primary challenger, and he got what he wanted. The whole deal was cemented in a meeting between Democrats and White House political guru Karl Rove.

Among the big losers was Rep. Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco, the House minority leader.

The gerrymandered lines in California amount to a Republican firewall against losses even in the worst of times, and for the GOP, these are the worst of times. The national political environment could hardly be more favorable for Democrats. Pelosi's party needs to win only 15 GOP-held districts and she would become the first Californian and first woman to be speaker of the House.

But the gerrymandering of congressional districts in California and other states is so extreme that Democrats are having trouble finding enough targets to win control of the chamber. Some analysts think that Democratic chances of winning the Senate are better because candidates run statewide.

The bible for House races is the Rothenberg Political Report, published by Stuart Rothenberg, which tracks the 435 House districts. The report lists only 41 "highly competitive" districts this fall throughout the country, 37 of which are held by Republicans. None of them are in California.

In general, the number of competitive House seats in the sixth year of an incumbent administration is much higher. President Bush is far less popular than in 2004, so one would expect him to be a drag on Republican incumbents. In 1994, the unpopular Clinton administration was the main reason that Democrats lost 52 House seats, including three in California.

But the 20-seat deal crafted by state Republicans in 2001 was part of a broader gerrymandering effort to ensure that their party would be the majority in the House even in a terrible political year. The icing on the cake was the 2003 Texas redistricting engineered by former House Majority Leader Tom DeLay. He turned a previous Democratic gerrymander into one that produced six additional GOP congressmen from Texas in 2004. That followed earlier GOP-directed gerrymandering in such states as Michigan and Pennsylvania.

Republicans, thinking strategically, combined these and other safe seats with the 20 in California to produce their majority. Congressional Democrats, by contrast, seemed more interested in protecting individual incumbents, which undercut their chances of winning nationally.

One of only two mildly competitive congressional districts in California is the 11th in the Stockton area, held by Rep. Richard W. Pombo, the controversial Republican chairman of the House Resources Committee, whom Democrats and environmentalists accuse of trying to dismantle the Endangered Species Act.

Before the 2001 redistricting, Pombo's district included heavily Democratic downtown Stockton. These voters were given to a neighboring Democrat, and Pombo's new district meandered all over the map in pursuit of Republican-voting suburbanites.

In 2003, Stockton residents sued, claiming that Pombo's district violated a California constitutional provision requiring that districts should respect city and county boundaries and be geographically compact. California's congressional Democrats and both parties in the Legislature spent a nice hunk of taxpayer dollars defending their handiwork, and Pombo's district survived.

In 2005, Democrats successfully fought to defeat Proposition 77, which would have provided for an immediate redrawing of legislative and congressional districts, despite the fact that their efforts were propping up a number of otherwise vulnerable GOP incumbents, among them Pombo.

Pelosi and other Democrats think they can defeat Pombo in November, and perhaps they will if a huge Democratic wave builds. But they certainly have made his reelection easier by giving him a highly gerrymandered district.

Without the gerrymandered districts, Democrats would certainly make some gains in the state.

So, if Pelosi comes up short of the 15 seats needed to make her the next House speaker, she'll know where to place the blame. She can just look in the mirror.

It's Back To Politics As Usual, More Or Less (LAT)

By Robert Salladay, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

Compared to the recall and last year's special election, this choice is more traditional, except for Schwarzenegger's enduring celebrity.

DOJ_NMG_0081774

SACRAMENTO — If the historic recall election three years ago upended California politics, the race between Democrat Phil Angelides and Republican Arnold Schwarzenegger in 2006 has returned the political system to its regularly scheduled programming.

Between state Treasurer Angelides and the incumbent Gov. Schwarzenegger, there is little talk about sweeping away special interests or transforming the political system as we know it.

Instead, potential voters have been given a choice between established politicians from the two major parties, each with traditional corporate or union backers, each with slightly different but relatively mainstream views on public policy.

Still, an unusual and important factor hangs over the campaign, and brings a benefit to the incumbent: Schwarzenegger's status as a worldwide celebrity.

"That celebrity has consistently brought out more media coverage, more cameras, than anything I have seen at an Angelides event," said Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a USC professor and expert on California politics. "It must be terribly frustrating for Angelides."

Few jobs in the United States are as powerful as California governor. Only the president and the Chicago mayor make more political appointments. The Legislature sends more than 1,000 bills to the governor every year. The vast state bureaucracy regulates nearly every aspect of California life. It provides healthcare and educates millions.

When voters choose the next person for that powerful job, their choice will look much like offerings from the past: a liberal Democrat against a centrist Republican. When Angelides and Schwarzenegger differ, there are few surprises.

That's the case on many issues — for example, on immigration, one of the most important to voters, according to recent polls.

Angelides and Schwarzenegger agree that illegal immigrants should be "put on a path to citizenship," but only after paying a fine and back taxes, learning English and getting in line behind people who are attempting to become citizens legally. Both have called for a more civil debate on the explosive issue.

The two men's biggest difference concerns the California National Guard. Angelides says he would not use federalized state troops to police the U.S.-Mexico border. Schwarzenegger sent more than 1,000 troops to the border on a limited deployment at the request of President Bush to back up federal border agents, but rejected a later Bush administration call for more.

Even the supposedly sharp contrast between Angelides and Schwarzenegger on the subject of raising taxes is fuzzier than both sides admit.

Yes, Angelides wants to raise taxes — on California's wealthiest couples, while offering tax cuts to the middle class. Schwarzenegger would have voters believe that Angelides is salivating over $18 billion in planned tax increases in the event that he gets into office, a figure that is clearly wrong.

Yes, Schwarzenegger is holding firm against tax increases, a politically popular position. But he's hardly a fiscal conservative. He has presided over a 26% increase in state government spending, and approved higher fees and tuition at California's public colleges — which some call a tax by another name.

He also proposed $68 billion in borrowing to shore up the state's faltering infrastructure system. The Legislature sliced that approximately in half, putting $37 billion in bonds on next month's ballot for voters to approve.

Angelides, with the help of his union supporters and a traditional Democratic message, survived the June primary by defeating state Controller Steve Westly.

But the bitter race left his campaign nearly broke, and battered by the impression that he had polluted Lake Tahoe or was beholden to developers.

Schwarzenegger, who had no Republican primary opponent, immediately fired up his campaign. The day after the primary, he launched ads against Angelides alleging that the treasurer would take California backward. And he hammered the tax issue so much that the treasurer had a hard time recovering. Since early summer, Angelides has lagged well behind Schwarzenegger in the polls.

"I can tell by the joy I see in your eyes that you love to raise taxes," the governor said to Angelides during their recent debate in Sacramento, the only one scheduled between the two. "Why don't you just say right now, 'I love increasing your taxes.' "

Incumbent governors come with considerable political advantages, not the least of which is the veto pen. Schwarzenegger has used his office, and the power of the veto threat, to negotiate big legislative deals with the Democrats who control the Legislature. One example was a bill to curb California's contribution to global warming, putting the state at the forefront of a global issue.

The bipartisan efforts have gone a long way for Schwarzenegger, according to the polls, to assure voters that he has abandoned the confrontational tone of his disastrous 2005 special election.

Many of Angelides' strongest supporters have appeared on stages with the governor — political symbolism he dearly needed after the bruising special election.

But Schwarzenegger's political transformation also has provided a contrast for Angelides to exploit. He has been hammering the governor for supporting Bush during a critical time in the president's 2004 reelection campaign, suggesting that the Republican governor is far more conservative than he lets on.

"The fact is, when you speak like this you sound just like Newt Gingrich," Angelides told Schwarzenegger at the debate.

"You sound like Speaker Hastert. You sound like George Bush attacking me on taxes."

Angelides says voters will turn on the governor over the issue of trust, a word he used multiple times when the two candidates debated in Sacramento.

On the campaign trail, he notes repeatedly that the governor has had multiple political personas since being elected in 2003.

The challenger's central question has been: Which governor can we expect? The reformer of 2004, the conservative of 2005 or the centrist of 2006?

Whichever candidate you believe, the race has put California a long way from the turbulent recall days, and handed voters something familiar: politics as usual.

Schwarzenegger For Governor (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

The governor has learned how to work with the Legislature and chart a moderate course for California.

AFTER HIS HISTORIC ELECTION in the 2003 recall, followed by some early promise and a disappointing sophomore year, Arnold Schwarzenegger has been a solid, pragmatic governor who has steered a moderate course for California. He deserves a sequel.

In the last year, the Republican has formed relationships with legislative leaders that focused the usually fractious and often obstructive Democrats on a productive agenda. Together, they have given Californians a historic law to combat global warming, a prescription drug plan and a reasonable increase in the minimum wage. If he is reelected, the governor says, "we're going to continue in a bipartisan way."

That's encouraging — and there's reason to believe it's not simply a sound bite. The governor says he now realizes he made a mistake last year in trying to strong-arm the Legislature and browbeat the voters with his ill-advised and ill-fated special election. And a look at his track record suggests that Schwarzenegger is more comfortable the closer he is to California's center of political gravity.

In fact, he may embody it. On the environment, on stem cell research and on reproductive choice, he has distinguished himself from the Bush administration and other conservatives on the national scene. He respects the still-thriving spirit of the state's taxpayer revolt yet also understands California's heritage of building for the future.

His priorities for the next term, Schwarzenegger says, include reforming the state's dysfunctional prisons and another try at fixing California's jury-rigged redistricting system. His previous attempts to address both problems failed miserably. Paradoxically, however, he may be in a better position to address these issues — and others, such as the state's structural budget deficit — because he is a Republican. A little partisanship can be healthy in Sacramento, if it serves as a check on the excesses of the legislative or executive branch. And Schwarzenegger and the Democrats in the Legislature now better understand how they give each other political cover.

No such dynamic would exist if Schwarzenegger's opponent, Democratic state Treasurer Phil Angelides, were elected. Some of his criticisms of the governor are valid; Angelides is correct to note that Schwarzenegger is too hazy about how he plans to close the state's perpetual budget shortfall. To the extent that the challenger is more candid, however, his prescription of raising some personal income and corporate taxes is the wrong one.

Schwarzenegger correctly senses that a leader with good instincts and confidence is more effective — and more inspiring — than one with a good plan and a lot of details. Angelides may be more specific about many of California's problems. But Schwarzenegger is more likely to solve them. The Times endorses Arnold Schwarzenegger for governor.

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

LOS ANGELES

I FEEL utterly confident that Michael R. Bloomberg would never be caught dead in the alligator-skin loafers attached to the feet of Arnold Schwarzenegger, which the governor of California had just plopped atop a table in the presidential suite of a four-star hotel in Newport Beach.

Even so, over the next 20 minutes of that recent interview, I could not help feeling that I was covering the mayor of New York all over again, albeit a taller, tanner, somewhat less comprehensible rendering.

I was the City Hall bureau chief for this newspaper for most of Mr. Bloomberg's first term, and now, here in Los Angeles, I find myself with a sense of déjà vu covering Mr. Schwarzenegger, the other popular, blue-state Republican.

Sometimes, I feel amused. Other times, slightly cursed. (Do I really have to listen to another speech by the man who proclaims to embody the American dream?) But I often find myself amazed that the middle-aged Jewish guy with the Boston twang I covered two years ago is so similar to the Austrian-born muscle man 3,000 miles west.

Both men are moderate centrists, estranged from their party's mainstream, who first ran for office on what seemed like a lark. After making a slew of goofy comments and odd policy pronouncements, they both found themselves, shockingly, in their first political jobs.

Both watched their popularity sink mid-term to embarrassing levels. Mr. Bloomberg came back to beat handily — and greatly outspend — a Democratic machine politician whose attempts to claw away at the mayor and paint him as the president's buddy flopped.

Mr. Schwarzenegger's re-election bid does not end until next month, but his campaign has uncannily mirrored Mr. Bloomberg's 2005 race. Like the mayor, he distanced himself from his party, cut deals with lawmakers, and outspent his opponent while also more or less ignoring him. The outcome, polls show, is likely to be the same.

Each had two careers that made him buckets of money before settling into a $1-a-year job as a high-profile public servant, their old lives informing how they govern.

Mr. Bloomberg — former Wall Street trader and entrepreneur — literally tore down the walls at City Hall and replaced them with glass, to emulate the financial information company he founded. Mr. Schwarzenegger — one-time body builder and movie star — explained his tax policy by walking me through the budget of "Terminator 3."

Each man is tolerant, though far from politically correct. The world has watched each squirm when off-the-record comments became public. Each can be snappish with his staff (random tip: don't ever serve the governor cold eggs, or come unprepared to meet with the mayor) but endlessly cheerful and optimistic in public.

Both remain fond of creature comforts.

The same week I met with the governor, I walked into the Beverly Wilshire Hotel, where Mr. Bloomberg was staying, and what seemed like half his senior staff had taken a breakfast table there. Preferred mode of transport for both? Private plane.

And they like each other. Mr. Bloomberg is hosting a fund-raiser for the governor in his home on Monday; the mayor's recent visit here to promote environmental legislation was like one big buddy movie. During one news conference, Mr. Schwarzenegger announced that the mayor was, "My soul mate. He's the man."

It is not terribly surprising that the re-election campaigns of Mr. Bloomberg and Mr. Schwarzenegger are so similar. The week after Mr. Bloomberg won reelection last year, Maria Shriver, Mr. Schwarzenegger's wife, called Kevin Sheekey, Mr. Bloomberg's campaign manager, and said that she wanted her husband's re-election campaign to be just like the mayor's.

Further, Mr. Bloomberg and Mr. Schwarzenegger are both products of the areas they represent. New York and California voters tolerate Republicans as long as they give them some tax relief and seem to keep jobs in the area, yet keep their social politics firmly rooted to the left and legislate effectively across party lines.

Mr. Bloomberg, who is sometimes mentioned as a 2008 presidential candidate, and Mr. Schwarzenegger, who by law cannot be, both see themselves as the answer to gridlock. "Perhaps fame and money sets them free to set their own course," said Bruce E. Cain, director of the Institute of Governmental Studies at the University of California, Berkeley. "Maybe plutocracy is the answer to our partisan problems."

Together, they promote causes (like environmental programs), raise cash (for the governor) and offer moral support in a political arena with few natural allies. "The Republican Party does not really meet either of their needs," said Louis DeSipio, a professor of political science at the University of California, Irvine. "They learn from each other's mistakes."

And while Mr. Schwarzenegger's vice is cigars (something I shall never partake in with him) and Mr. Bloomberg's is popcorn (something I appreciated when visiting his office, though it often needed more salt), they seem to simply like hanging out. "I can tell you," Mr. Sheekey said, "in California they had a riotous time together."

Ehrlich, O'Malley Swap Scorn In TV Debates (WP)

Baltimore Crime and Schools Dominate in Back-to-Back Exchanges

Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley traded scathing assessments of each other's records yesterday during a pair of debates in which they did little to hide their mutual disdain.

Ehrlich (R) accused his Democratic rival of neglecting Baltimore's low-performing schools, of wrongfully arresting thousands of its citizens and of practicing a "leadership style of whining and blaming others for your failures."

O'Malley argued that there are "two Bob Ehrlichs," one who, during an election year, touts tax cuts, investments in education and a commitment to the environment, and another whose record of governing is starkly different.

"We can do better, but we need a governor who is on the side of working families," O'Malley said during the first of two debates, which was taped yesterday afternoon for broadcast tomorrow night on Maryland Public Television and WJZ (channel 13) in Baltimore.

In an unusual arrangement, the gubernatorial candidates engaged in a second debate that aired live last night on statewide public television and on WBAL (channel 11) -- the candidates described the two as though they were two halves of a sporting contest.

The set of televised debates came amid a bruising contest between two of Maryland's best-known politicians that until yesterday had played out largely through television advertising, much of it negative and in the expansive Baltimore media market. For months now, the governor has succeeded in keeping the campaign focused largely on Baltimore crime and education, two topics he had identified as weaknesses for an opponent who has overseen one of the nation's largest cities for seven years. But it is unclear whether his message is working with statewide voters -- O'Malley has consistently led in independent polls.

Yesterday, those two themes resurfaced for long stretches as the two men sparred. But O'Malley managed to weave a third theme through both debates -- the notion of "two Bob Ehrlichs." That allowed him to address a range of claims Ehrlich has made during the campaign, such as his assertion that he supported state-funded stem cell research or backed large increases for higher education, moves he only made in the final year of his term.

After the debates had concluded, Ehrlich tried to head off the new line of attack, saying that there are two Bob Ehrlichs -- "the 60th governor of Maryland and the 61st."

Both men sought to spotlight their accomplishments, with Ehrlich, Maryland's first GOP governor in a generation, saying that his administration had "taken Annapolis by storm" after having been sent there to stop the "worst instincts" of the Democrat-led legislature.

"I believe by any measure, Maryland is better today than it was four years ago," Ehrlich said, citing higher statewide school test scores, new transportation projects and a thriving economy.

O'Malley cited improvements in test scores in Baltimore, particularly among younger students, as well as reductions in violent crime and homicides -- progress that, he said, Ehrlich has sought to belittle for political gain.

In both debates, the two men sat behind desks stacked with their notes and papers, and exchanged comments in loosely structured hour-long encounters.

As often occurs with his more casual style, the governor's answers were peppered with acronyms and references to programs, such as his "wraparound" social services approach that would probably have befuddled all but the most devoted state government junkies.

O'Malley tried for a loftier tone, at one point calling for a "new line" in Maryland, a reference to Maryland's nickname as the "Old Line State." Ehrlich presented a more common-man persona, twice telling the mayor after he finished an answer, "I don't know what all that means."

The most pointed exchange came in the afternoon debate over the way the two candidates view Baltimore and the significant aid that the state provides for social programs there.

"I pay for you," Ehrlich said, looking straight at O'Malley. "Without us, you are done."

Reading from a document, Ehrlich then ticked off annual state investments in Baltimore schools, transportation, social services and community colleges. "You get the drift here," Ehrlich said.

O'Malley shot back that Ehrlich was practicing "the politics of division and fear."

"I just wanted to remind you that the citizens of the City of Baltimore are also citizens of our state and that we're all in this together," O'Malley said. "Frankly, governor, the biggest philosophical difference between you and me is that I do believe that we're all in this together, and you believe this is a world of us and them."

The evening debate was calmer than the afternoon one and more focused on the issues, with the first 21 minutes devoted to education.

Ehrlich focused on the worst-performing of Baltimore's schools, saying the mayor "wants to claim success, wants to pretend that these schools are in good shape." O'Malley responded by putting emphasis on the city's highest-performing schools and accusing the governor of "promoting stereotypes" by concentrating on the failures in a small segment of inner-city classrooms.

The two also explored the issues of crime, the recent utility rate increases and the state's budget outlook, and, in the end, leadership styles. The governor repeated his assertion that O'Malley's style is to "blame everyone." The mayor said of Ehrlich: "Good at potshots; bad at taking responsibility."

At the outset of the first debate, O'Malley sought to inoculate himself against attacks on schools and crime that have dominated Ehrlich's television ads, warning the audience that they were coming.

O'Malley later tried to shift the focus of the debate by noting that about 40 percent of those arrested for murder in Baltimore this year were under the supervision of a state-run parole system overseen by the Ehrlich administration. He also spoke of problems in the state's juvenile justice system, which Ehrlich had pledged to fix during his 2002 campaign.

O'Malley's greatest wound on the issue of the city's homicide count, however, may have been self-inflicted. In a discussion about crime, he said mistakenly that the murder count in Baltimore had dropped below 200 for several years running. Last year, the count stood at 269.

DOJ_NMG_0081779

Aides said that O'Malley clearly meant to say the count had dropped below 300, a figure that was exceeded every year in the decade before O'Malley was elected in 1999.

An Ehrlich news release issued after the debate, however, said O'Malley had "deliberately misled the citizens of Maryland."

O'Malley adviser Steve Kearney said the mayor "misspoke," and Kearney pointed out that during the WJZ debate Ehrlich mistakenly claimed not to have raised taxes during his term. "If they want to play that game, we can."

While sales and income taxes have not increased during Ehrlich's term -- a distinction the governor often makes -- he did agree to raise property taxes, as well as raising fees on vehicle registration and sewer service -- increases O'Malley hammered him on during the debates.

More broadly, O'Malley sought to portray Ehrlich as more interested in promoting corporate interests than protecting working families. O'Malley said that Ehrlich-appointed utility regulators had "rubber-stamped" a major rate increase this year by the state's largest electricity provider. And he chided Ehrlich for allowing college tuition to rise by 40 percent at some campuses.

Ehrlich countered that O'Malley was engaging in "classic class warfare."

Ehrlich also was critical of the Baltimore police policy of stepped-up enforcement for offenses such as loitering. Police say the strategy helps deter violent crime, but critics have decried the large number of people who are arrested for such offenses but who are never charged with a crime.

Ehrlich said O'Malley's "mass arrests" have alienated citizens and demoralized the police force.

O'Malley seemed to grow increasingly impatient with Ehrlich's focus on Baltimore issues, reminding him at one point: "This is a race for governor, governor. This is not a race for Baltimore City Council."

Schools, Crime Are Debatable (WT)

By S.a. Miller, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 15, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. and Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley clashed yesterday in two debates that frequently dwelled on the city's crime problems and poorly performing schools, despite the mayor's attempts to shift the focus to the governor.

"We have made tremendous progress in our city in recent years," said Mr. O'Malley, the Democratic nominee for governor. "But we can all make more progress if we had a governor that practiced the politics of bringing people together instead of the politics of division."

He promised to practice "the politics of hope and the politics of dreams and the politics that say we are all in this together."

Mr. Ehrlich, a Republican seeking re-election, responded: "I don't know what all that means."

"That's the leadership style of whining and blaming others for your failures," continued Mr. Ehrlich, pointing to the mayor's past criticism of Baltimore State's Attorney Patricia C. Jessamy, the City Council and President Bush for impeding the city.

Mr. O'Malley has also blamed the city's crime problems on a "revolving door" at the state's prisons. "The problem that every jurisdiction in our state faces is not a lack of courage by our local police," he said. "Governor, if you want to do something about the dangerous position that our officers are put in, why don't you do something about your broken parole and probation system?"

The moderator at the debate, which was videotaped at WJZ-TV (Channel 13) in Baltimore, did not allow Mr. Ehrlich to respond. The debate will be aired Monday at 7 p.m. by the station and statewide by Maryland Public Television.

Mr. Ehrlich did get to respond during the next debate, which was aired live last night by Maryland Public Television and WBAL-TV (Channel 11) in Baltimore and in many ways duplicated the first encounter.

"Talk about revolving doors," Mr. Ehrlich said. The mayor has had "seven police commissioners in seven years. ... Not a whole lot of people are lining up to take criminal justice advice from you, Mr. Mayor."

The candidates' disdain for each other was evident at both debates, which likely were their last face-to-face confrontations before the Nov. 7 election.

Mr. Ehrlich has said he does not want to debate after mid-October so that he can concentrate on campaigning. Their two previous debates were not televised.

Within hours of the first debate's conclusion, both candidates claimed victory.

The Ehrlich campaign said the governor "convincingly demonstrated that Maryland is better off today than it was four years ago."

The O'Malley campaign said the mayor won by "showcasing new ideas for progress for Maryland's hardworking families."

In both debates, Mr. O'Malley frequently accused the governor of "selling out" working-class families to the profit of "powerful and wealthy special interests."

Mr. Ehrlich called the charges "classic class warfare" and repeatedly dismissed the mayor as a political opportunist who distorts the facts, shifts the blame and makes politically expedient decisions.

DOJ_NMG_0081780

"Get the facts right," he told Mr. O'Malley. "Nobody is buying your drive-by attacks."

Mr. Ehrlich touted his record in the debates, noting reforms to the state's troubled juvenile-justice and prison systems.

He also reminded voters that he inherited a $2 billion budget deficit and turned it into a $2 billion budget surplus, all the while spending more on public schools and blocking Democratic lawmakers' attempts to increase state income taxes or sales taxes.

"We were agents of change," Mr. Ehrlich said. "We were given a mandate by the people of Maryland to effectuate change in Annapolis. Maryland is in far better shape today than it was four years ago."

Baltimore's education and crime problems have put Mr. O'Malley's campaign on the defensive, but the mayor continues to lead Mr. Ehrlich in most polls.

Mr. O'Malley says there has been a 40 percent reduction in violent crime in Baltimore since he took office in 1999, but the crime statistics are questionable and the city's homicide rate remains among the highest in the country.

He also points to rising test scores in the public elementary schools. Mr. Ehrlich cites the high dropout rate and 11 middle and high schools that have recorded failing test scores for nine consecutive years.

The candidates also sparred over taxes, the environment, transportation and energy policies.

On nearly every issue, Mr. O'Malley said the governor sided with special interests, including insurance companies on health care and power companies on energy prices.

Mr. O'Malley faulted the governor for increasing taxes, including state property taxes, higher tuition at state universities and a "flush tax" for environmental improvements to wastewater treatment plants.

Mr. Ehrlich defended his tax record, saying he pulled the state out of a deficit without increasing taxes and targeted fees to pay for major road projects and to clean up the Chesapeake Bay.

He pointed out that Mr. O'Malley raised the city's income, property and energy taxes. "Your record is clear," he told the mayor.

"There is no reason for a general tax increase at any time in the immediate or intermediate future," Mr. Ehrlich said, repeating his pledge from four years ago.

Mr. O'Malley said he agreed that a tax increase was not needed, but also said the state's structural deficit persists while the city budget is truly balanced.

"The difference in our budgets is, I pay for you," Mr. Ehrlich said. "Without us, you are done."

He pointed out the state pays for the majority of the city's transportation, social services and education budgets.

Still, attention remains focused on Baltimore's troubles with schools and crime.

The public schools issue re-emerged last week with four days of violent incidents, including a 14-year-old boy being shot in the back Friday at a football game at Frederick Douglass High School.

The violence started Monday when about 100 students from Digital Harbor High School gathered near the school to watch a fistfight between two 15-year-old girls and some of the spectators smashed car windshields.

At Pimlico Middle School, a 14-year-old girl was hospitalized Wednesday after a 13-year-old student stabbed her in the arm with a kitchen knife. That same day, students were locked down at Holabird Elementary School for more than four hours after a shooting nearby.

An 8-year-old boy brought a .22-caliber handgun Thursday to Grove Park Elementary School, and police say another 8-year-old boy accidentally fired the weapon. No one was injured.

Party Games (WP)

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

HOW COME, when Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) expresses no confidence in state election officials and urges voters to use absentee ballots, Democrats squawk about a conspiracy to suppress the vote, but when Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan (D) says the same thing, there is silence? Given the importance of voting, playing politics in this way isn't forgivable.

Voting problems that Maryland experienced on primary day in September remain a real cause for concern. In Montgomery local election officials inexplicably forgot to deliver the computer cards needed to power the voting machines. Poorly trained workers and no-show judges caused problems in Baltimore City and Prince George's County. Glitches with the electronic poll books used to sign in voters cropped up across the state. Unfortunately, these legitimate issues have become blurred by assertions -- so far unfounded -- that there are problems with the reliability of the electronic voting machines. While we think that a paper trail for electronic voting is a prudent idea, the primary day voting breakdowns did not involve the voting machines, which worked without incident.

It is important that the state's political leaders not add to the confusion with suggestions that paper is the only safe way to vote. Instead of sowing unease that could well give pause to prospective voters, Mr. Ehrlich and Mr. Duncan should be focusing on the constructive steps that they are taking to try to ensure a smooth election. Mr. Ehrlich, for instance, deserves praise for his efforts to recruit state employees to work the polls by offering them administrative leave. Similarly, Mr. Duncan has made it possible for county technical experts to help election officials. There have been other encouraging signs such as the Maryland State Bar Association leading a drive to get its members to volunteer.

No doubt, the attention paid to the voting problems has put state and local election officials on notice as to exactly what is at stake on Nov. 7. And their jobs are the least of it.

With Eye On 2008, Kerry Goes After Bush (WP)

By Dan Balz, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

MANCHESTER, N.H. -- Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.) barely said hello to the New Hampshire Democrats who filled a banquet room here Friday night before unloading on President Bush.

"This war in Iraq is a disgrace," he said in the second sentence of his speech at a party fundraising dinner.

Thirty-two minutes and 14 standing ovations later, the man who lost the 2004 presidential campaign left little doubt that if he runs again in 2008, he intends to be the chief prosecutor of the record of the Bush presidency.

"A lie, a lie, a lie and a lie," he said after recounting Republican claims that Iraq is not in a civil war, that North Korea's nuclear advancement is former president Bill Clinton's fault and that Democrats were behind the release of salacious e-mails that Mark Foley sent to former House pages.

It was as if the Kerry of 2006 was channeling the Howard Dean of 2003. "What we have in Washington is a house of lies, and in November, we need to clean house," he said.

Kerry spoke to an audience that included many of the activists who helped propel him to the nomination two years ago. But after Bush's victory, many of them are decidedly cooler to a Kerry presidential campaign in 2008.

The University of New Hampshire released a survey Thursday of presidential preferences in the Granite State. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) led the field of Democrats with 30 percent, followed by former senator John Edwards (N.C.) at 16 percent and former vice president Al Gore at 10 percent. Kerry ranked fourth with 9 percent.

None of this seems to discourage the Massachusetts senator. He said he has been getting a far different sense from conversations with Democrats during his travels this fall. "I'm very encouraged," he said in an interview a few hours before his speech. "I know what the conventional wisdom is, and it's had a good record of being wrong."

Kerry believes he was defeated in 2004 in large part because of what he calls two lies from his opponents: one about the way America went to war in 2003, the other far more personal -- the Swift Boat veterans' attacks that challenged his Vietnam War record, crippling his campaign in August 2004.

Democrats still fault Kerry for failing to fight back against those charges, and he says he regrets that he was not more aggressive. "We thought the truth was understood," he said. "We should have done more." But, Kerry added: "I don't think that should disqualify you from being president of the United States, necessarily."

What is disqualifying, he believes, is the Bush administration's Iraq strategy. "This war is utterly disastrous," he said. "It's without parallel in modern American foreign policy history in the incompetence and in the lack of effort to bring elders of both parties together and create an atmosphere of solving it. And I am incensed that young Americans are losing their lives because these guys are arrogant and incompetent."

Those kinds of comments have drawn instant rebukes from critics in the Republican Party, and even Democrats have been reluctant to follow Kerry's recommendations for changing policy by setting a timetable for withdrawing U.S. forces. He predicts that more of his colleagues in the Senate will move his way after the midterm elections.

Kerry said those who have encouraged him to run again believe he can be a viable candidate. "Are there enough people who believe that?" he asked. "Can we put that together? Have I learned the lessons of getting kicked on my butt and dusted up, and can I bring a better experience to the table? I think I've learned a lot of lessons. The question is, can you convey that to people? I don't know. Those are the imponderables."

Bill Clinton Rallies Activists In Iowa (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0081782

DES MOINES, Iowa (AP) -- Former President Bill Clinton said Saturday that voters "know something is wrong" in Washington and urged Democrats to create change in the November elections.

"I have never seen the American people so serious," said Clinton. "I think I know why. People know things are out of whack. The rhythm of our public life and our common life in America has been disturbed."

The former president was the keynote speaker at the Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner, the Iowa Democratic Party's biggest annual fundraising event. He drew more than 3,500 activists.

There is speculation that Clinton's wife, New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, may seek the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008. She has not been in Iowa during this election cycle, even though other candidates have already begun campaigning in the state that will open the presidential nominating season.

Bill Clinton joked about the speculation. "I am under no illusions as to why I'm here," he said. "You were so desperate for a Democrat with any name recognition at all who isn't running for president that you resorted to the chief caseworker to the junior senator from New York."

Clinton urged activists to focus on the midterm election.

"People are sick of partisanship, they are sick of gridlock and they are coming to us in droves," said Clinton. "People know something is wrong and they want to change."

Clinton called the Bush administration and the Republican-led Congress "unprecedentedly unaccountable" and said tax cuts for the rich have led to huge deficits.

"This is not class warfare," said Clinton. "I've been poor and I've been rich and I like rich better. I want to pay my share. I don't need another vacation home."

Both the White House and Congress are resistant to scrutiny from the outside, he said.

"In Iraq, which is famous for no-bid contracts, $9 billion has gone missing and there has been no serious congressional investigation," said Clinton. "There's never been a more secretive, unaccountable administration."

SOLON, Iowa (AP) -- Former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards on Saturday bashed the Bush administration for "proactive stupidity" by sticking with a failed policy in Iraq and being unable to admit its mistakes.

He predicted the Iraq war and a wave of scandals in the Republican-run Congress will prompt voters to demand change in November.

"There is an underlying current that Democrats are in a strong position, for a lot of reasons," Edwards told The Associated Press. "Some of it is the scandals and corruption that people all across the country are seeing in Washington."

Edwards was spending the weekend in eastern Iowa raising money for Democratic legislative candidates.

He finished a surprising second in Iowa's leadoff precinct caucuses in the 2004 presidential election, and that propelled him to a spot on the ticket with eventual nominee John Kerry. Edwards has left little doubt he's interested in again seeking the party's nomination, and he's been among the most active of the potential candidates campaigning in Iowa.

Danny Diaz, a spokesman with the Republican National Committee, said Saturday that Edwards is a "failed presidential candidate and a rejected vice presidential candidate whose political attacks will be no more successful today than they were two years ago."

Edwards diverted from his campaign schedule to speak at a University of Iowa conference on poverty issues. "We should be for the eradication of poverty in America," he said. "In our party, we need to seize the moral high ground."

Bid For President Called A Long Shot (MJS)

By Katherine M. Skiba

Milwaukee Journal Sentinel, October 15, 2006

Thompson launches PAC, considers run for White House

Washington - Political analysts say Tommy G. Thompson faces long odds if he tries for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008.

Aides to Thompson, 64, announced last week that he was launching a political action committee, Forward America, and mulling a run for the White House. That comes after discussions with key advisers and a pair of visits to Iowa, whose caucuses kick off the presidential nominating season.

Ahead, aides said, Thompson plans a trip to New Hampshire, which hosts the first primary of 2008.

Thompson was governor of Wisconsin from 1987 to 2001, longer than anyone in history. He was U.S. Health and Human Services chief from 2001 to 2005 during President Bush's first term.

Today he works for a Washington law firm and a major consulting practice and has a hand in a number of business ventures, many in health care.

DOJ_NMG_0081783

Why steep odds if he runs for the highest office in the land?

Although the race is wide open - with no vice president waiting in the wings - Thompson is not well-known nationally or among the top-tier of GOP candidates, generally thought to include Sen. John McCain, Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

He's also weighing a run rather late in the game. With the Iowa GOP caucuses planned at the start of 2008, Thompson would have to amass tens of millions of dollars in short order to compete there and in subsequent nominating contests in other states.

He flirted this year with a run against either Wisconsin Gov. Jim Doyle or U.S. Sen. Herb Kohl - then sat out both contests - just as he reiterated his presidential ambitions. He had weighed a campaign for president in 1996 and again in 2000 but didn't pull the trigger.

Aides said the leadership PAC would let him travel the country to back GOP candidates, spread his ideas and shape the party's agenda.

At the same time, the people on "Team Tommy" - as one adviser called key supporters - tout his work on the state, national and international levels and boast that he's got a track record on public policy issues, fire in the belly, a knack for campaigning and a solid reputation in Iowa, where the nominating season kicks off. Plus his family is now behind the effort, they said.

"The presidency would be the one thing that would interest him at this juncture," former Thompson aide Kevin Keane said. "He is as energized as I've seen him about this." Appealing to the public is key

Political scientist Charles O. Jones, emeritus professor at the University of Wisconsin-Madison and senior fellow at The Brookings Institution, said Thompson's fledgling steps make a potential candidacy difficult to assess.

"And since it's a hard thing to evaluate, you have to say it's among the longer of the long shots," Jones said. "There's a whole process to get people to think about you as a presidential candidate, and that's not really gone on."

David T. Canon, a UW political science professor, said Thompson's reputation as a centrist and his record on social policy and education were strengths. Thompson was a pioneer in welfare reform and private school vouchers.

Talking about McCain, Giuliani and Romney, Canon said: "On policy grounds, Thompson can go toe to toe with any of those guys. The question is, can he get his name out there and appeal to the national party people and other people who contribute to Republican Party campaigns?"

"The next couple of months," Canon said, "are critical."

Keane said Thompson is not daunted by the competition.

"He's a (former) Midwestern governor and cabinet secretary with a track record that, frankly, is going to be tough for any leader to match," he said. "What separates Governor Thompson from the field is turning ideas into workable solutions."

Keane now is senior vice president for communications for the American Beverage Association.

Thompson could not be reached for comment.

At the University of Virginia, political scientist Larry Sabato expects Thompson would have to raise $20 million to $30 million to be taken seriously as a candidate.

"He's a god in Wisconsin, but outside Wisconsin he's not that well-known," Sabato said. "It's tough to take a presidential bid seriously, but he may prove us all wrong."

A recent survey of likely Wisconsin voters by GOP pollster Strategic Vision found 55% of the respondents want Thompson to try for the presidency; others were split between not wanting him to run or being undecided.

When state Republicans in the poll were asked their choice for president in '08, Giuliani was named by 33%, Thompson by 24%, McCain by 17%; others were in single digits. Campaigning in Iowa

According to Tony Jewell, another former Thompson aide, Thompson has traveled twice to Iowa in recent weeks to stump for state legislative candidates. He'll return Oct. 24 for a fund-raiser for House Republican Jim Nussle, who is running for governor.

Iowans have seen no fewer than 11 GOP presidential hopefuls in recent months, said Cullen Sheehan, executive director of the Republican Party of Iowa. He's met Thompson several times - Sheehan was campaign manager for unsuccessful GOP Senate candidate Tim Michels of Wisconsin in 2004 - and thinks Thompson could have a "big impact in a state like Iowa, being a Midwesterner himself."

Talking about the PAC, Jewell said Thompson is using it as a vehicle to support candidates and "stay involved in the national debate on issues that are very important to the future of the country." He named health care, accountability in education, energy independence and foreign policy as top concerns.

Thompson made about 100 speeches in the year after he left the cabinet, often detailing his plan to cover the 45 million Americans without health insurance.

DOJ_NMG_0081784

So-called leadership PACs are not unusual. Half of the 10 federal lawmakers from Wisconsin have them, notably Democratic Sen. Russ Feingold, who has been traveling widely and considering a presidential run of his own. The others: House Democrats Tammy Baldwin and Ron Kind and Republicans Paul Ryan and Tom Petri.

Thompson's PAC, whose name borrows from the state's motto, "Forward," has not yet registered with the Federal Election Commission.

At the Washington-based Center for Responsive Politics, which tracks money in politics, Communications Director Massie Ritsch said that although the chief purpose of such a PAC is to support candidates, outlays often benefit the person who controls the PAC.

"They spend a lot of money on what you might call overhead: staff, fund-raising costs, travel, sometimes you see polling, that sort of thing. They can be a pre-presidential committee of sorts," he said.

Fund-Raising Obstacles Imperil N.Y. Bid For '08 Democratic Convention (NYT)

By Diane Cardwell

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

New York City's bid to land the 2008 Democratic National Convention is in jeopardy because Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg is spread so thin with fund-raising commitments that he may not be able to raise the money from private donors needed to pay for it, an official said on Thursday.

The fund-raising worries come as Democrats have been seriously considering bringing the convention to New York rather than to the other competing city, Denver, which offers a politically attractive location, but has logistical problems because of a scarcity of hotel rooms.

A Democratic convention in New York would be likely to give Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton a starring role, even if she is not chosen as the party's presidential nominee.

But now, administration officials are raising "grave concerns" about Mr. Bloomberg's ability to cover the expenses. For 2004, when the city was working to show how it had recovered from the Sept. 11 attack, city officials promised Republicans $73 million for their convention and raised $85 million in a fund-raising drive headed by Mayor Bloomberg. This time around, the budget goal is for nearly $85 million, a figure administration officials say could grow to $100 million.

Given the roughly $250 million Mr. Bloomberg has promised to raise for the World Trade Center Memorial Foundation and for programs recommended by his poverty commission, an administration official who would speak only anonymously said there were "serious concerns" about his ability to hit that target. If Mr. Bloomberg and other host committee officials could not bring in the promised amount, the city would have to make up the difference.

It was not immediately clear whether officials would pull back from the bid or devise a new fund-raising strategy, but the financial issue is dampening what had appeared to be encouraging developments as New York pushed aggressively to serve as host to the Democrats in 2008.

From the beginning, few political analysts greeted New York's attempt to snare the convention with much optimism, arguing that Democrats would be wiser to go to an area of the country where they stood to sway a few fence-sitting states to their side, instead of choosing a state that has long been in the Democratic camp.

But aides to Mr. Bloomberg put together an all-out pitch, promising to decorate the entire city, provide delegates with concierge services and offer the news media free spa treatments and haircuts at Barneys to help them "get excited about their environment," according to a host committee presentation. Mayor Bloomberg even traveled to Chicago to court Democrats, taking along the "Sopranos" star Lorraine Bracco as aides doled out Big Apple martinis and manhattans to party leaders.

Then, New York's effort got a surprise shot in the arm from an unlikely source: the Republicans, who snapped up Minneapolis and St. Paul, which, like New York, had bid for both conventions. That put the Twin Cities out of the running for the Democratic convention, since both events are scheduled just days apart.

Further strengthening New York's chances was the sense among Democrats that while New York, with its large police force, transit system and other logistical advantages, can pull off a successful convention, Denver may not have enough space even to house the delegates. Denver itself has just 19,000 hotel rooms, according the New York pitch, compared with New York's 63,200 hotel rooms.

But Denver offers political advantages that could trump New York, Bloomberg aides concede. The convention offers an opportunity for Democrats to court a region considered increasingly receptive to the party's message, said Seth Masket, an assistant professor of political science at the University of Denver.

"To that extent, geography does matter," he said. "The mountain states are becoming more purple, as they say, and in Colorado in particular the Democratic Party has been doing increasingly well in recent years, and it's looking good for this fall."

DOJ_NMG_0081785

That stems, he said, from the migration of voters from more liberal areas along the West Coast, but also from the tenor of the national Republican Party, whose cultural conservatism does not play well with the more individualistic, libertarian strains of the mountain region.

Indeed, senators from Nevada, Montana, New Mexico and Colorado recently sent a letter to Howard Dean, the Democratic Party chairman, urging him to select Denver as a way of increasing the party's chances of winning several Western states that have been increasingly up for grabs.

Conversely, this line of reasoning goes, holding the convention in the politically safe terrain of New York would represent a missed opportunity, especially if the party is nominating a New Yorker like Mrs. Clinton. Although the city is the country's media capital and a national megaphone, said Doug Muzzio, a professor at the Baruch School of Public Affairs, "It's like the Subway Series: it's great for New Yorkers but lousy for everybody else because they're not interested."

New York has a storied history of holding conventions, serving as host when Democrats nominated Jimmy Carter in 1976 and also when Democrats held the longest convention in American political history, when the party took more than 100 ballots to nominate John W. Davis, who went on to lose to Calvin Coolidge in 1924. After the 2004 Republican convention, George Bush went on to victory, and city officials said the event drew $245 million in business during a slow time of the year.

For the city, there is the question of whether New Yorkers would even be interested in a 2008 convention, given the disruptions and the potential for street protests. In 2004, those protests led to mass arrests and detentions, followed by lawsuits against the city that are still winding through the courts. And if the Iraq war remains unsettled and divisive, it could again prove a catalyst for thousands to take to the streets.

"We hope that the city will acknowledge and learn from the mistakes it made handling protests during the Republican National Convention," said Donna Lieberman, executive director of the New York Civil Liberties Union. "Political conventions are lightning rods for protest. That doesn't mean that we will see the breadth and intensity of activity that New York saw during the Republican convention, but the city has to be prepared to respect the right to protest, whatever the point of view."

Call Of The West: Rein In The Judges (LAT)

By Stephanie Simon, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

Conservative ballot measures in many states would check judicial power. South Dakotans seek a right to sue jurists, Montanans to recall.

DENVER — Judges across several Western states could soon face new limits on their authority and threats to their independence, as conservatives campaign for ballot measures that aim to rein in what they describe as "runaway courts."

Frustration among the right has been building for years, especially since the high court in Massachusetts legalized same-sex marriage in 2003. Politicians and pastors have accused judges of ignoring the public will and legislating from the bench.

On Nov. 7, voters will be asked to do something about it.

South Dakota's ballot contains the most radical provision: It would empower citizens to sue judges over their rulings.

Other proposals would make Colorado the first state to impose term limits on top judges and give Montana residents the right to recall judges over any "dissatisfaction." In Oregon, an amendment would require Supreme and Appeals court judges to be elected by geographic district, so they reflect the values of conservative rural communities as well as the liberal legal establishment in Portland.

In three other states, ballot measures would also limit judicial authority, though that is not their primary intent. Proposition 90 in California aims to restrict government's right to condemn private property; it also takes elements of such cases out of judges' hands and entrusts them to juries instead. Nevada has a similar initiative. And a proposal in North Dakota would severely curtail the discretion judges have in settling custody disputes.

Supporters cast their efforts as populist and democratic, a way to make judges answer more directly to the citizens they serve. "This is a very measured and mild response to the perception that our courts are out of control," said John Andrews, a former legislator promoting the amendment to impose term limits in Colorado.

Opponents, however, warn that the initiatives would begin to dismantle the system of checks and balances set up under the U.S. Constitution.

"Judges are there to protect the minority from the tyranny of the majority. They are not there to do the popular will," said Doreen Dodson, a St. Louis attorney who chairs the American Bar Assn.'s committee on judicial independence. "They are accountable to the law and the Constitution."

States have always struggled to balance judicial independence and accountability, said Rorie Spill Solberg, a political scientist at Oregon State University. Lately, she said, that scale has tipped ever more toward accountability — and toward a notion that judges should respect, even represent, the will of the majority.

DOJ_NMG_0081786

All but eight states ban partisan elections for judges in an effort to keep politics — and corruption — off the bench. But Solberg and others worry that the latest wave of changes would make judges more vulnerable to pressure from interest groups and even individuals.

"What I see, pretty much across the country, are judges under siege," said former Colorado Supreme Court Justice Rebecca Love Kourlis.

South Dakota's Amendment E would have the most sweeping effect; it has drawn opposition from conservatives and liberals — including, in a rare show of unanimity, every member of the state Legislature.

Under the amendment judges in the state could lose their jobs or assets if citizens disliked how they sentenced a criminal, resolved a business dispute or settled a divorce. "We want to give power back to the people," said Jake Hanes, a spokesman for the measure.

A special grand jury would evaluate citizen complaints against judges — and judges would not be presumed innocent. Amendment E explicitly instructs jurors to "liberally" tilt in favor of any citizen with a grievance, and "not to be swayed by artful presentation by the judge."

This deep suspicion of judges is reflected not only on the fall ballot, but also in the rallying cries of the right, especially Christian conservatives. A summit for "values voters" last spring included a session called "The Judiciary: Overruling God." Mock ballots, circulated online, urge Christians to vote for the judge they'd most like to impeach.

The American Bar Assn. is so concerned about the trend that it recently produced a DVD called "Countering the Critics," to be screened at churches, Rotary Clubs and Chambers of Commerce nationwide. To encourage lawyers to speak up in defense of the judiciary, the ABA has drafted sample speeches, op-ed articles and letters to the editor comparing judges to referees, sworn to uphold the rules, however unpopular.

That analogy does not sit well with Andrews, the former state senator backing term limits in Colorado.

In his view, judges too often let their political views color their decisions. Or they arrogantly "ignore or overrule decisions of the people," he said.

Andrews' campaign has spent more than $300,000 reminding voters in Colorado of rulings that he considers outrageous, such as when judges struck down a school voucher program, canceled a ballot initiative to limit services for illegal immigrants, and voided the death penalty for a convicted murderer because jurors used the Bible to guide their deliberations.

One of his radio ads begins: "Remember that line, 'Here comes the judge?' Amendment 40 has a better idea: There goes the judge."

Andrews, a Republican, acknowledges that term limits won't guarantee rulings he approves. But he says it's better then letting justices sit on the bench for decades, "curdling like old milk."

Under current law, the governor appoints justices in consultation with a bipartisan commission; they can serve until age 72, facing retention elections just once a decade. Amendment 40 would limit the justices to 10 years, with more frequent retention elections.

Five of seven state Supreme Court justices would be forced off within two years if the measure passes. Andrews relishes that symbolism.

"Simply sending this message of profound discontent with a judiciary that used to be respected is very valuable," he said.

The amendment has drawn high-powered — and well-funded — opposition, with public statements coming from many district attorneys, three former governors and Republican Gov. Bill Owens.

"Reasonable people, present company included, will disagree with rulings from time to time, but that does not mean we dismantle an entire branch of government," said former Gov. Richard D. Lamm, a Democrat.

Still, analysts say the measure in Colorado — like those in other states — has a shot at passing because it taps into such widespread anger at the courts.

"How successful they'll be is really hard to know," said Elizabeth Theiss Smith, a political scientist at the University of South Dakota.

"Conservatives in particular have been so upset about judicial rulings, and this is an activist way to deal with activist judges."

Gerry Studds Dies At 69; First Openly Gay Congressman (NYT)

By Damien Cave

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

Gerry E. Studds, the first openly gay member of Congress and a demanding advocate for New England fishermen and for gay rights, died early Saturday at Boston University Medical Center, his husband said.

DOJ_NMG_0081787

The cause was a vascular illness that led Mr. Studds to collapse while walking his dog on Oct. 3 in Boston. He was 69.

From 1973 to 1997, Mr. Studds (whose first name was pronounced GAIR-ee) represented the Massachusetts district where he grew up, covering Cape Cod and the barnacled old fishing towns near the coast. He was the first Democrat to win the district in 50 years, and over the course of 12 terms, he sponsored several laws that helped protect local fisheries and create national parks along the Massachusetts shore.

A former Foreign Service officer with degrees from Yale, he was also a leading critic of President Ronald Reagan's clandestine support of the Contra rebels in Nicaragua. He staunchly opposed "Star Wars," or the Strategic Defense Initiative, which Mr. Studds once described as "the Edsel of the 1980's" — overpriced and oversold.

His homosexuality was revealed through scandal. In 1983, he was censured by the House for having had an affair 10 years earlier with a 17-year-old Congressional page. For Mr. Studds, formal and dignified, a model of old New England reserve, the discovery sparked intense anguish, friends said.

He had long been unsure of the role his sexuality should play. At the nation's first major gay march on Washington in 1979, he told friends he could neither attend nor stay away.

"His act of courage was to jog within a block of it," said Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts, the congressman from Mr. Studds's adjoining district, who announced his own homosexuality four years later. "He felt that conflicted."

Once outed, however, Mr. Studds refused to buckle to conservative pressure to resign.

"All members of Congress are in need of humbling experiences from time to time," Mr. Studds said at the time. But he never apologized. He defended the relationship as consensual and condemned the investigation, saying it had invaded his privacy.

He went on to win re-election in 1984, surprising both supporters and opponents.

For some, it echoed an earlier, unexpected accomplishment: In 1968, as a 30-year-old teacher at St. Paul's School in Concord, N.H., Mr. Studds was one of two crucial figures who persuaded Senator Eugene McCarthy to bring his antiwar presidential campaign to the state's primary. Members of the campaign partly attributed Mr. McCarthy's surprisingly strong showing there — which helped force President Lyndon B. Johnson out of the race — to the 12-day tour Mr. Studds had scheduled.

"He was a major factor for us in the New Hampshire primary," said Seymour M. Hersh, who was the press secretary for Mr. McCarthy. "Gerry was just there; he was there with ideas, he was there to organize."

Mr. Studds's re-election in 1984 had reverberations of its own.

"In a sense, he became a role model," said Charles Kaiser, author of "1968 in America" and "The Gay Metropolis." "His experience convinced other people that it would now be possible to run as an openly gay person."

Mr. Studds also seemed emboldened by his re-election. He began to demand more money for AIDS research and treatment. He pressed for the right of gay people to serve openly in the military, releasing a previously suppressed Pentagon report in 1989, which concluded that sexuality "is unrelated to job performance in the same way as is being left- or right-handed."

In addition to speaking on the House floor on behalf of gay marriage, he set an example. In 2004, he and his longtime partner, Dean T. Hara, became one of the first couples to marry under a Massachusetts law allowing gay marriage.

"Gerry often said that it was the fight for gay and lesbian equality that was the last great civil rights chapter in modern American history," Mr. Hara said in a statement.

"He did not live to see its final sentences written," Mr. Hara added, "but all of us will forever be indebted to him for leading the way with compassion and wisdom."

Mr. Studds's past had recently resurfaced. In the final two weeks of his life, the two-decade-old controversy surrounding Mr. Studds became an issue in the 2006 midterm election campaign as a new Congressional page scandal unfolded.

Though his name had barely been mentioned in Washington since he retired, the resignation late last month of Representative Mark Foley, a Florida Republican, revived interest in Mr. Studds's own dalliance with a teenage page in 1983.

Across the country, several Republican candidates sought to deflect criticism aimed at their own party by reminding voters about Mr. Studds. The National Republican Congressional Committee chastised Democrats in this year's race for taking contributions from party leaders who had served with Mr. Studds.

In the Oct. 16 issue of The Weekly Standard, printed before Mr. Studds's death, the conservative commentator Charles Krauthammer also invoked the retired Massachusetts congressman as he drew a contrast between Republicans and Democrats. Mr. Krauthammer argued that Mr. Foley had resigned immediately and that Mr. Studds had left Congress only after Democrats had lost their majority, which he called "the political equivalent of dying in your sleep."

Mr. Hara, Mr. Studds's husband, declined to comment on the newest criticism.

DOJ_NMG_0081788

A memorial service will be held in November. In addition to Mr. Hara, Mr. Studds is survived by his brother, Colin Studds; his sister-in-law, Mary Lou Studds; his sister, Gaynor Stewart; four nephews; and his English springer spaniel, Bonnie.

Gerry Studds; Gay Pioneer In Congress (WP)

By Yvonne Shinhoster Lamb, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

Gerry E. Studds, the first openly gay person elected to Congress and a longtime proponent of environmental protection, New England fishermen and human rights, died Oct. 14 at Boston Medical Center, several days after he collapsed while walking his dog. He was 69.

Mr. Studds lost consciousness because of a blood clot in his lung Oct. 3. He later regained consciousness and seemed to be improving, but his condition worsened Friday because of a second clot, according to Dean Hara, who married Mr. Studds in 2004 shortly after same-sex marriage was legalized in Massachusetts.

A 12-term congressman from Massachusetts, Mr. Studds was a ranking member of the House Democratic leadership and popular in his 10th Congressional District in 1983 when he was censured for sexual misconduct with a 17-year-old male page that had occurred 10 years earlier.

Mr. Studds told the House that his affair with the page was "a very serious error in judgment" but that it was "a mutually voluntary, private relationship between adults."

He chose not to fight the charges, saying his right to privacy was more important.

"It is not a simple task for any of us to meet adequately the obligations of either public office or private life, let alone both," Mr. Studds said on the House floor. "But these challenges are made substantially more complex when one is, as I am, both an elected public official and gay."

The scandal, which also involved Rep. Daniel B. Crane (R-Ill.), who was involved with a female page, highlighted problems in supervision of congressional pages.

Mr. Studds's revelation did not prevent his reelection in 1984, a race he won by a solid majority.

Long a champion of environmental and maritime concerns, Mr. Studds was advocate for the fishing industry and worked to establish a barrier to foreign fishing vessels 200 miles from the U.S. coast. He was chairman of the powerful Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries from 1990 to 1994, the Subcommittee on the Coast Guard and Navigation, and the Subcommittee on Fisheries, Oceans and Wildlife, and was a member of the Subcommittee on Health and the Environment. He was a leader in passing legislation that now protects the Atlantic striped bass, whales, dolphins and porpoises.

"His work on behalf of our fishing industry and the protection of our waters has guided the fishing industry into the future and ensured that generations to come will have the opportunity to love and learn from the sea," Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) said. "He was a steward of the oceans."

Mr. Studds, who was known for his acidic wit and his mastery of legislative details, also pushed for health-care reform and for increased funding for people with AIDS and for AIDS research. In 1987, he sent a copy of Surgeon General C. Everett Koop's 36-page "Report on AIDS" to every household in his district. He also opposed military intervention in Central America.

He was among the first members of Congress to endorse lifting the ban on gays and lesbians in the military, and in 1994 with Kennedy, he introduced legislation to end discrimination in the workplace based on sexual orientation.

Gerry Eastman Studds was born May 12, 1937, in Mineola, N.Y., the son of a Long Island architect. He grew up in Cohasset, Mass., in the district he would later represent. He graduated from Yale University and received his master's degree in teaching there in 1961.

Shortly after, he came to Washington and joined the State Department as a Foreign Service officer. By 1962, he was working as a congressional liaison for President John F. Kennedy's domestic Peace Corps task force, and two years later he was a legislative assistant to Sen. Harrison A. Williams Jr. (D-N.J.).

Leaving Washington in the mid-1960s, he became a history teacher at St. Paul's School in Concord, N.H., until his opposition to the Vietnam War propelled him back into politics. In 1968, the young teacher and peace activist joined the presidential primary campaign of Sen. Eugene McCarthy (D-Minn.) as a coordinator in New Hampshire, where his political acumen developed.

In the book "1968 in America" (1988), author Charles Kaiser recounted how Mr. Studds and David Hoeh, a political strategist, helped to orchestrate McCarthy's victory in New Hampshire.

"Studds had spent the Thanksgiving recess at home doing some basic statistical research on New Hampshire presidential primaries, and he came to Chicago armed with an analysis of the vote, its percentage in each town and each congressional district," Kaiser wrote. "He presented McCarthy with a twelve-day schedule of campaigning with which the candidate could hit 75 percent of the voters."

DOJ_NMG_0081789

The analysis, combined with Hoeh's experience, proved successful. "This would be the hallmark of the New Hampshire campaign: so-called amateurs who turned out to be much better informed about the local electorate than their most entrenched opponents," Kaiser wrote.

Fully engaged in the politics of the day, Mr. Studds went on to serve as a delegate to the tumultuous 1968 Democratic National Convention in Chicago. Two years later, at age 33 and while a student at the Harvard School of Education, he first ran for Congress but lost to the Republican incumbent in a close election.

He spent the next two years studying issues related to the fishing industry and Portuguese, the language of a community in his district of considerable size. In 1972, he won his second bid and became the first Democrat in 50 years to win what was considered a safe Republican seat.

Mr. Studds, who lived in Provincetown, Mass., retired from Congress in 1997 and became a lobbyist for the fishing industry and environmental causes.

In 1996, Congress named the 842-square-mile Stellwagen Bank National Marine Sanctuary for him.

In addition to Hara, his partner since 1991, survivors include a brother and a sister.

Studds, 1st Openly Gay Congressman, Dies (AP-Y)

By Jay Lindsay, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 15, 2006

Former Rep. Gerry Studds, who became the first openly gay member of Congress when his homosexuality was exposed during a teenage page sex scandal, died early Saturday. He was 69.

Studds died at Boston Medical Center several days after he collapsed while walking his dog, his husband said. Doctors determined his loss of consciousness was due to a blood clot in his lung, Dean Hara said.

Studds regained consciousness and seemed to be improving, but his condition deteriorated Friday because of a second blood clot. The origin of the second clot was not immediately determined, said Hara, who married Studds shortly after same-sex marriage was legalized in Massachusetts in 2004.

Hara said Studds gave courage to gay people by winning re-election after publicly acknowledging his homosexuality.

"He gave people of his generation, of my generation, of future generations, the courage to do whatever they wanted to do," said Hara, 49.

Studds was first elected in 1972 and represented Cape Cod and the Islands, New Bedford, and the South Shore for 12 Congressional terms. He retired from Congress in 1997.

In his early career, Studds was known for opposing the Vietnam War and military intervention in Central America. Studds later became an advocate for a stronger federal response to the AIDS crisis and was among the first members of Congress to endorse lifting the ban on gays serving in the military.

In 1983, Studds acknowledged his homosexuality after a 27-year-old man disclosed that he and Studds had had a sexual relationship a decade earlier when the man was a teenage congressional page.

The House of Representatives censured Studds, who then went home to face his constituents in a series of public meetings.

At the time, Studds called the relationship with the teenage page, which included a trip to Europe, "a very serious error in judgment." But he did not apologize and defended the relationship as a consensual relationship with a young adult. The former page later appeared publicly with Studds in support of him.

The scandal recently resurfaced when Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla., resigned after exchanging sexually explicit instant messages with a page. Republicans accused Democrats of hypocrisy for savaging Foley while saying little about Studds at that time.

Hara said Studds was never ashamed of the relationship with the page.

"This young man knew what he was doing," Hara said. "He was at (Studds') side."

Studds told his colleagues in a speech on the floor of the House that everyone faces a daily challenge of balancing public and private lives.

"These challenges are made substantially more complex when one is, as am I, both an elected public official and gay," Studds said at the time.

In Congress, Studds was an outspoken advocate for the fishing industry and was hailed by his constituents for his work establishing a limit for foreign fishing vessels 200 miles from the coast. After leaving Congress, he became a lobbyist for the fishing industry and environmental causes.

"His work on behalf of our fishing industry and the protection of our waters has guided the fishing industry into the future and ensured that generations to come will have the opportunity to love and learn from the sea," Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said in a statement. "He was a steward of the oceans."

In 1996, Congress named the 842-square-mile Gerry E. Studds Stellwagen Bank National Marine Sanctuary after him in recognition of his work protecting the marine environment.

In addition to Hara, Studds is survived by a brother, a sister and four nephews.

A Moral Philosophy For Middle-Class America (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

Some people are religious conservatives, who believe that policies should align with the transcendent moral order of the universe. Other people are social libertarians, who believe government should be neutral on values issues, and individuals should be guaranteed their own private space to work out their own solutions to moral questions.

But others of us are social traditionalists. We differ from the religious conservatives in that we're not sure about a transcendent moral order. Furthermore, we think it's both too sectarian and too lofty to try to pattern government policies on God's law.

We also disagree with the social libertarians. We don't think government can be neutral on values issues. Nations are held together by shared beliefs. People flourish because they have been encouraged by society to adopt certain habits and behaviors. It's a chimera to believe individuals come up with solutions to moral questions alone; human beings are social creatures whose actions and views are profoundly shaped by the social fabric that binds them.

We traditionalists observe that when policies fail, it's usually because they are based on inaccurate assumptions about human nature. So we don't base our thinking on the abstract arguments of theology. Nor do we base it on economics, with its image of profit-maximizing individuals. We begin our thinking with a study of what human beings in particular places are actually like.

We know, for example, that human beings are wired to form attachments with each other. As Daniel Goleman writes in his new book, "Social Intelligence," the subconscious mind is able to detect nonverbal emotional messages that the conscious mind is not even aware of. Babies cry in sympathy with other infants. Young children use "mirror neurons" to imitate and learn. As adults, our brain and cardiovascular functions are influenced by the people around us, as we instinctively mimic their emotions.

We are engaged, Goleman writes, in endless "protoconversations," and you get these social contagions. A mood or change can sweep through a group or a nation as people subconsciously mold one another's behavior.

All of this was anticipated by Adam Smith nearly 250 years ago. In "The Theory of Moral Sentiments," Smith based his theory of morals on the intense sociability of human beings (rather than on divine law or the idea of maximum individual autonomy). His approach is a starting point for social traditionalists today.

Smith argued that more than just about everything else, people hunger for approval. We feel intense pleasure when we experience the sympathy of others. In a well-structured society, he continues, our desire for sympathy leads us to restrain our selfish or egotistical behaviors.

Furthermore, Smith continues, we not only want to feel praise, we want to feel praiseworthy. We want to act in ways that would deserve praise, if a wise, impartial spectator happened to be watching us. In our best moments, we want to live up to the ideals our society has gradually engraved upon us.

So for Smith, the crucial policy question was: How do you embed people in relationships that will discourage selfish behavior and emotionally reward virtue and self-control?

Today, while the religious conservatives and the social libertarians have their culture war flashpoints — how many crèches can you fit on the head of a publicly funded pin? — the traditionalists are interested in how to strengthen institutions that breed responsible people. How do you encourage marriage at a time when 70 percent of African-American babies are born out of wedlock? How can you embed young men in American cities, or in Iraq, in the constructive world of work, so they won't drift into the world of violence? How can you build preschool programs so children from chaotic homes will have at least one stable place to develop self-control? How can you assimilate immigrants so they will internalize the social norms of the United States? How can parents keep cultural garbage out of their homes?

In the 1980's, Smith was known as the apostle of free-market capitalism. But these days attention has shifted over to his social philosophy. The culture war has become self-parodic, so people are hungry for a morality that is neither absolutist nor nihilistic. As the economy has opened up opportunities, it's become clear many people lack the cultural capital to take advantage of them.

A Republican Party in danger of dividing between religious conservatives on the one side and libertarians on the other might return to these traditionalist values after the coming deluge.

It's Official: To Be Married Means To Be Outnumbered (NYT)

By Sam Roberts

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

Married couples, whose numbers have been declining for decades as a proportion of American households, have finally slipped into a minority, according to an analysis of new census figures by The New York Times.

The American Community Survey, released this month by the Census Bureau, found that 49.7 percent, or 55.2 million, of the nation's 111.1 million households in 2005 were made up of married couples — with and without children — just shy of a majority and down from more than 52 percent five years earlier.

The numbers by no means suggests marriage is dead or necessarily that a tipping point has been reached. The total number of married couples is higher than ever, and most Americans eventually marry. But marriage has been facing more competition. A growing number of adults are spending more of their lives single or living unmarried with partners, and the potential social and economic implications are profound.

"It just changes the social weight of marriage in the economy, in the work force, in sales of homes and rentals, and who manufacturers advertise to," said Stephanie Coontz, director of public education for the Council on Contemporary Families, a nonprofit research group. "It certainly challenges the way we set up our work policies."

While the number of single young adults and elderly widows are both growing, Professor Coontz said, "we have an anachronistic view as to what extent you can use marriage to organize the distribution and redistribution of benefits."

Couples decide to live together for many reasons, but real estate can be as compelling as romance.

"Owning three toothbrushes and finding that they are always at the wrong house when you are getting ready to go to bed wears on you," said Amanda Hawn, a 28-year-old writer who set up housekeeping near San Francisco with her boyfriend, Nate Larsen, a real estate analyst, after shuttling between his apartment and one she shared with a friend. "Moving in together has simplified life," Ms. Hawn said.

The census survey estimated that 5.2 million couples, a little more than 5 percent of households, were unmarried opposite-sex partners. An additional 413,000 households were male couples, and 363,000 were female couples. In all, nearly one in 10 couples were unmarried. (One in 20 households consisted of people living alone).

And the numbers of unmarried couples are growing. Since 2000, those identifying themselves as unmarried opposite-sex couples rose by about 14 percent, male couples by 24 percent and female couples by 12 percent.

Matt Foreman, executive director of the National Gay and Lesbian Task Force, said gay couples were undercounted because many gay people were reluctant to disclose their sexual orientation. But he said that inhibition seemed to be fading.

"I would say the increase is due to people feeling more comfortable disclosing that they are gay or lesbian and living with a partner," he said.

The survey did not ask about sexual orientation, but its questionnaire was designed to distinguish partners from roommates. A partner was defined as "an adult who is unrelated to the householder, but shares living quarters and has a close personal relationship with the householder."

Some of the biggest gains in unmarried couples were recorded in unexpected places. In the rural Midwest, the number of households made up of male partners rose 77 percent since 2000.

The survey revealed wide disparities in household composition by place. The proportion of married couples ranged from more than 69 percent in Utah County, Utah, which includes Provo, to 26 percent in Manhattan, which has a smaller share of married couples than almost anyplace in the country. But Manhattan registered a 1.2 percent increase in married couples since 2000, in contrast to the rest of New York City and many other places.

Among counties, the highest proportion of unmarried opposite-sex partners was in Mendocino, Calif., where they made up nearly 11 percent of all households.

The highest share of male couples was in San Francisco, where, according to the census, they accounted for nearly 2 percent of all households. In Manhattan, they made up 1 percent of households. Hampshire County, Mass., home to Northampton, had the highest proportion of female couples, at 1.7 percent. Some of the highest numbers of unmarried couples were recorded in the South, which as defined by the census, has the largest population of any region.

David Blankenhorn, president of the marriage advocacy group the Institute for American Values, said married couples had become a minority largely because of the growing number of households made up of people who planned to marry or who used to be married.

Steve Watters, the director of young adults for Focus on the Family, a conservative Christian group, said that the trend of fewer married couples was more a reflection of delaying marriage than rejection of it.

"It does show that a lot of people are experimenting with alternatives before they get there," Mr. Watters said. "The biggest concern is that those who still aspire to marriage are going to find fewer models. They're also finding they've gotten so good at being single it's hard to be at one with another person."

But Pamela J. Smock, a researcher at the University of Michigan Population Studies Center, said her research — unaffiliated with the Census Bureau — found that the desire for strong family bonds, and especially marriage, was constant.

"Even cohabiting young adults tell us that they are doing so because it would be unwise to marry without first living together in a society marked by high levels of divorce," Ms. Smock said.

A number of couples interviewed agreed that cohabiting was akin to taking a test drive and, given the scarcity of affordable apartments and homes, also a matter of convenience. Some said that pregnancy was the only thing that would prompt them to make a legal commitment soon. Others said they never intended to marry. A few of those couples said they were inspired by solidarity with gay and lesbian couples who cannot legally marry in most states.

Jennifer Lynch, a 28-year-old stage manager in New York, said she had lived on the Lower East Side with her boyfriend, who is 37 and divorced, for most of the five years they have been a couple.

"Cohabitating is our choice, and we have no intention to be married," Ms. Lynch said. "There is little difference between what we do and what married people do. We love each other, exist together, all of our decisions are based upon each other. Everyone we care about knows this."

If anything, she added, "not having the false security of wedding rings makes us work even a little harder."

With more competition from other ways of living, the proportion of married couples has been shrinking for decades. In 1930, they accounted for about 84 percent of households. By 1990 the proportion of married couples had declined to about 56 percent.

Married couples have not been a majority of households headed by adults younger than 25 since the 1970's, but among those aged 25 to 34 the proportion slipped below 50 percent for the first time within the past five years. (Among Americans aged 35 to 64, married couples still make up a majority of all households.)

"It's partially fueled by women in the work force; they don't necessarily have to marry to be economically secure," said Andrew A. Beveridge, a demographer at Queens College of the City University of New York, who conducted the census analysis for The New York Times. "You used to get married to have sex. Now one of the major reasons to get married is to have children, and the attractiveness of having children has declined for many people because of the cost."

William H. Frey, a demographer at the Brookings Institution, attributed the accelerated trend to the lifestyles of baby boomers.

"It's the legacy of the boomers that have finally caused this tipping point," Dr. Frey said. "Certainly later generations have followed in boomer footsteps, with high levels of living together before marriage, and more flexible lifestyles. But the boomers were the trailblazers, once again, rebelling against a norm their parents epitomized.

"This would seem to close the book on the Ozzie and Harriet era that characterized much of the last century," he said.

Security Council Backs Sanctions On North Korea (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 14 — The Security Council voted unanimously on Saturday to impose strict sanctions on North Korea for its reported nuclear test, overcoming objections from Russia and China by explicitly excluding the threat of military force.

The resolution, drafted by the United States, clears the way for the toughest international action against North Korea since the end of the Korean War. Primarily, it bars the sale or transfer of material that could be used to make nuclear, biological and chemical weapons or ballistic missiles, and it bans international travel and freezes the overseas assets of people associated with the North's weapons programs.

In its most debated clause, the resolution authorizes all countries to inspect cargo going in and out of North Korea to detect illicit weapons.

That power was the sticking point in days of what the Russian ambassador called "tense negotiations" with China and Russia that continued up until just minutes before the final vote early Saturday afternoon. And less than an hour after joining in the Council vote to approve the resolution, the Chinese ambassador, Wang Guangya, said China would not participate in the inspection regime because it would create "conflict that could have serious implications for the region."

Mr. Wang said China supported the resolution as a necessary way to respond to Pyongyang's "flagrant" behavior.

DOJ_NMG_0081793

The 15-0 vote came days after North Korea's claim it had tested a nuclear device, reflecting the immediate global alarm that such a weapon could wind up in the hands of terrorists or other rogue states. Indeed, the wording of the resolution hit most of the tough points that the United States and Japan, in particular, had been seeking.

But China's refusal to take part in searches, and Russia's seeming annoyance at the end of the process, immediately raised questions about how effective the resolution's execution could be. And it raised the prospect, too, that similar action sought by the United States against Iran could face a much tougher battle.

After the vote, John R. Bolton, the American ambassador, insisted that China was bound by the resolution's terms and would have to find a way to comply with the inspection provision. "I can't believe that China won't adhere to obligations that the Security Council has imposed," he said.

Ambassador Pak Gil-yon of North Korea told the Council that his government "totally rejected" the resolution, and he accused the panel's members of "gangster-like" action and a "double standards" attitude that neglected the nuclear threat posed by the United States.

He said that if the United States continued to "increase pressure" on North Korea, his government would consider it a declaration of war and take "critical countermeasures."

Mr. Pak then rose from his guest seat at the end of the horseshoe-shaped table and left the chamber.

Mr. Bolton asked to be heard and pointed to the empty chair, saying Mr. Pak's impulsive departure was the equivalent of Khrushchev's pounding his desk in protest in the General Assembly. The Russian ambassador, Vitaly I. Churkin, complained that the reference, even at a moment that he described as Mr. Bolton's "emotional state," was "an inappropriate analogy."

Current and former Bush administration officials, and experts on North Korea, said Saturday that while the sanctions did not go as far as Washington wished, they probably provided the legal justification for the United States and Japan to squeeze the country. It will provide the basis for inspecting ships in ports around the world — though not necessarily on the high seas — and gives Washington a way to expand a program to force banks to halt dealings with the country.

Earlier this year, Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, said that the huge pressure put on one small bank in Macao, Banco Delta Asia, "was the first thing we ever did that got their attention." Today one of his aides said, "Our plan is that Banco Delta is just a beginning."

What the administration did not get was authority to use military force to stop ships in international waters. In order to obtain Chinese agreement, it agreed this week to drop explicit reference to a chapter of the United Nations Charter that authorizes the possible use of military power to enforce sanctions.

"This isn't going to be like the Cuban missile crisis, where we put up a full blockade," said Michael Green, who headed Asia operations on the National Security Council staff until late last year, and is now at the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

The big loophole in the resolution concerns policing the North's border with China. The two countries had about $1.7 billion in trade last year. The Chinese declaration Saturday cast doubt on the likelihood that China would inspect, much less stop, much of the trade moving across that border.

Speaking outside the White House on Saturday, President Bush praised the resolution, saying it sent "a clear message to the leader of North Korea regarding his weapons programs. This action by the United Nations, which was swift and tough, says that we are united in our determination to see to it that the Korea Peninsula is nuclear-weapons-free."

In addition to the sanctions and search regime, the resolution demands that North Korea abandon its illicit weapons programs and rejoin the nonproliferation treaty, and it calls on the government to return to the so-called six-nation talks involving South Korea, Japan, China, Russia and the United States.

A ban on the shipment of luxury goods in the resolution was particularly championed by Mr. Bolton and J. D. Crouch, the deputy national security adviser, as a way to harm the North's leader, Kim Jong-il, administration officials said. Mr. Kim does not command the kind of loyalty that his father, Kim Il-sung, the country's father and "Great Leader," did until his death in 1994. So instead, according to North Korean defectors, he buys allegiance with Mercedes-Benz cars, bottles of cognac and plenty of walking-around money.

Mr. Bolton alluded to that this week when he said that one intent of the resolution was to put Mr. Kim, who presides over a starving country but travels on luxurious train cars, on a diet. He said that the resolution left Pyongyang "utterly and totally isolated" and that the government should see its only way back to international acceptance was "abandoning weapons of mass destruction and not continuing to go after them."

Mr. Bolton said the measure was aimed at illicit activities of Pyongyang like "money laundering, counterfeiting and selling of narcotics." Those words, however, were removed this week to gain Chinese and Russian approval.

The final draft also dropped a broad arms embargo in favor of one just on heavy equipment like battle tanks, artillery systems, missiles and warships.

DOJ_NMG_0081794

Despite the changes, Mr. Bolton said, “We think this represents essentially what the United States was asking for when it circulated its draft resolution on Monday.”

Asked about the effect of Saturday’s decision on the debate expected next week over sanctions on Iran for its refusal to suspend its nuclear program, he said, “I think this shows quite strongly that the Council is not going to tolerate proliferation of weapons of mass destruction and Iran should learn from this lesson.”

But Mr. Churkin, the Russian ambassador, signaled that an obstacle in the negotiations over North Korea would also arise in the Iran debate, where Russia and China have also been reluctant to approve direct punishments.

Noting that in the cases of both North Korea and Iran, the United States had imposed its own sanctions, he said, “It is unhealthy that when discussing collective measures and trying to be cooperative and forming a unified approach, one country comes out and adopts unilateral measures which also apply to other countries that are participating in the discussion.”

He said, “We very much hope that our American colleagues understand, in terms of the problems we have to solve and tackle in the next stage of our work in the Security Council.”

U.N. Votes To Impose Sanctions On N. Korea (WP)

By Colum Lynch And Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

Council Demands End To Nuclear Program

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 14 -- The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously Saturday to condemn North Korea and impose stiff sanctions on the communist government in response to its suspected nuclear test.

North Korea's ambassador immediately rejected the council's demand to dismantle its nuclear weapons program and threatened to respond to the escalating pressure on the reclusive government with unspecified "physical countermeasures."

The 15-nation council's action highlighted the outrage that followed North Korea's claim of having tested a nuclear bomb Oct. 9. It also marked a rare willingness by North's Korea council allies, China and Russia, to impose sanctions on Pyongyang.

But to secure their support, the United States was compelled to water down key measures designed to ensure that the sanctions could be enforced. And China -- which shares an 880-mile border with North Korea -- said after the vote that it would ignore a critical provision, which calls on governments to inspect goods entering or leaving North Korea.

Still, President Bush issued a statement welcoming the decision, saying that the United Nations has sent a clear message to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il that the world is "united in our opposition to his nuclear weapons plans."

"There's a better way forward for the people of North Korea," Bush said. "If the leader of North Korea were to verifiably end his weapons programs, the United States and other nations would be willing to help the nation recover economically."

John R. Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, meanwhile, warned that the United States would pursue additional penalties against North Korea if it fails to abide by the council's demand that it agree to destroy its weapons of mass destruction.

Resolution 1718 bans North Korean trade in materials linked to its weapons of mass destruction program, ballistic missiles, high-end conventional weapons -- including war planes and battle tanks -- and luxury goods.

It will create a U.N. committee to monitor the sanctions' effectiveness and to draw up a list of individuals and institutions linked to North Korea's weapons programs. They will be prohibited from traveling abroad, and most of their financial assets will be frozen.

But the resolution stops far short of imposing the kind of sweeping trade embargo initially proposed by Japan. It no longer contains a U.S.-proposed provision to give North Korea 30 days to suspend its nuclear program or face "further action."

The text also provides no additional authority to allow inspections of North Korean vessels suspected of transporting illicit weapons. The United States claims that it already possesses that power, but China maintains that such actions violate international law.

Addressing the council chamber in English, North Korean U.N. ambassador Pak Gil Yon told the council that his government "totally rejects" the council's "unjustifiable" resolution. He said it was "gangster like" for the council to impose such "coercive" measures. He walked out of the U.N. chamber before the session ended.

After Pak's speech, Bolton directed the council's attention to the North Korean diplomat's empty chair and suggested that his right to address the council be suspended.

"That is the second time in three months that the representative of the DPRK [The Democratic Republic of Korea], having asked to participate in our meetings, has rejected a unanimous resolution of the Security Council and walked out of this chamber," Bolton said. "It's the contemporary equivalent of Nikita Khrushchev's pounding his shoe on the desk of the General Assembly."

DOJ_NMG_0081795

Russia's U.N. ambassador, Vitaly Churkin, took offense at the reference to the former Soviet leader. He appealed to council president Kenzo Oshima of Japan "to use your influence" to discourage the use of such an "inappropriate analogy."

U.S. officials believe the resolution will give them the international tools to put the squeeze on North Korea. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to Japan, South Korea and China later this week to discuss the implementation of the resolution as well as possible actions that could be taken by countries to punish Pyongyang, U.S. officials said.

The Japanese government, the closest ally of the United States on the North Korean issue, has already imposed sweeping economic sanctions on North Korea in response to the nuclear test. Rice will try to persuade South Korea and China -- which have deep economic ties with North Korea and have supported the country even during the nuclear impasse -- to also tighten the vise, officials said.

"There is such a political backlash against North Korea that people are more willing to consider unilateral actions," said a senior State Department official. "The net effect is that the North Koreans find themselves in a substantially different place," even with China.

China is critical to the success of Security Council provisions calling for restrictions on North Korea's trade in illicit items, because most of Pyongyang's trade crosses the Chinese border. China, however, may be resistant to suggestions that it cut off or reduce North Korea's economic lifeline because it has long valued the stability of having North Korea as a buffer state between China's border and South Korea, which has 25,000 U.S. troops.

For the moment, U.S. officials are focused on implementing this resolution and are not contemplating more resolutions, officials said. When President Bush travels to Hanoi next month for an Asian economic summit, there is the possibility that Bush and the leaders from China, South Korea, Japan, Russia and possibly other countries will meet on North Korea and "take stock" of the resolution's effectiveness.

U.S. officials are also exploring whether the six-nation negotiating group that has focused on North Korea can form the basis for a new security organization akin to NATO or other regional forums. Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, the administration's point man on North Korea, noted that unlike Europe, Asia has no such institutions.

The administration believes "we can move beyond just the peace in the Korean peninsula," Hill said in a speech Friday, "but also toward creating some multilateral structures that will allow Northeast Asia not only to be the economic juggernaut that Southeast Asia is . . . but also Northeast Asia that can also be exporting peace and a sense of how to get along."

Kessler reported from Washington.

Security Council Vote Is Unanimous On Sanctions (LAT)

By Maggie Farley, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

The resolution aimed at depriving North Korea of access to nuclear materials leaves room for diplomacy. China opts out of cargo checks.

UNITED NATIONS — The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously Saturday to impose sanctions on North Korea that are meant to cut off the materials and funding for its nuclear program, although China ruled out participating in inspections of North Korean cargo.

As a result of what Russia's ambassador called "tense negotiations," the resolution does not allow military enforcement of the sanctions and makes it clear that the restrictions will be lifted once North Korea abandons its nuclear program and returns to talks. It also contains exemptions to the sanctions to minimize the effect on civilians.

The decision by all 15 members to punish North Korea while leaving the diplomatic door open was a hard-fought act of unity in the wake of the reclusive regime's defiant Oct. 9 announcement that it had conducted a nuclear test, days after the Security Council warned of "serious consequences."

"The Security Council has adopted one of the most important decisions in recent times on an issue of great concern to the international community, that of nonproliferation," Japanese Ambassador Kenzo Oshima said after the vote.

To prevent North Korea from acquiring or exporting nuclear materials, the resolution calls for a ban on goods related to the nation's weapons programs and a freeze on financial activities that support them, as well as a travel ban for senior North Korean officials. It also would put an embargo on heavy conventional weapons and luxury goods.

But China said Saturday that it would not participate in a key measure that would allow the inspection and seizure of suspected nuclear and missile materials going in and out of North Korea. At China's insistence, the final text was diluted to merely request, rather than require, that countries aggressively inspect North Korean cargo.

"China will implement this resolution, but it will not participate in those inspections," Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya said. "We strongly urge those who think it is necessary to do it with caution, because it could easily lead by one side or the other to a provocation of conflict. That would have serious implications for the region."

DOJ_NMG_0081796

China's reluctance to take part in inspections of North Korean cargo throws into doubt how effective the sanctions will be. China is North Korea's neighbor and provides about 70% of its oil and 40% of its food. Beijing doesn't want the sanctions to cause the unstable regime in Pyongyang to collapse, sending refugees flooding across the border into China.

U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is heading to Beijing, Seoul and Tokyo this week to talk about how to enforce the resolution, and additional measures that the countries can take to contain North Korea.

The inspection measure is based on the 2003 U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative, or PSI, involving a group of 16 core countries that have agreed to take steps to stop the flow of weapons of mass destruction, including boarding ships for inspections.

U.S. officials portrayed the unanimous vote as a political victory for the United States in bringing together countries that had been reluctant to take a hard line on North Korea — in particular, China and Russia.

U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton had pushed hard for a swift and tough resolution after North Korea's missile tests in July and after the declared nuclear test last week, and even managed to get the PSI measure in the resolution.

President Bush described the Security Council resolution as a "clear message" to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il that "the world is united in our opposition to his nuclear weapons plans."

In brief remarks on the South Lawn of the White House, Bush also pledged to help North Korea with its economic recovery if it gave up its nuclear weapons program. "This action by the United Nations, which was swift and tough, says that we are united in our determination to see to it that the Korea Peninsula is nuclear-weapons-free," he said.

The North Korean ambassador, Pak Gil Yon, told the council that his country "totally rejects the unjustifiable resolution" and denounced the "gangster-like" behavior of the Security Council for sanctioning North Korea without addressing the threat that it felt the U.S. posed to his country.

North Korea would not "possess even a single nuke when it is no longer exposed to the U.S. threat," Pak said, but if sanctions are imposed it will "continue to take physical countermeasures, considering it as a declaration of war."

Pak then walked out of the chamber, leading Bolton to suggest to the council that North Korea should be expelled from the United Nations.

Bush: U.N. Action Sends Clear Message (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, October 15, 2006

President Bush said Saturday that the U.N. Security Council had sent a "swift and tough" message to North Korea that its claimed detonation of a nuclear bomb was unacceptable to the world.

Bush spoke shortly after the council unanimously approved a resolution penalizing the reclusive communist nation for its announcement of the test on Oct. 9.

"This action by the United Nations, which was swift and tough, says that we are united in our determination to see to it that the Korean Peninsula is nuclear-weapons free," the president told reporters in brief remarks from the White House's South Lawn. He then left for the presidential retreat at Camp David in Maryland.

Bush said North Korea still had a chance for "a better way forward" and promised economic assistance to the impoverished country from the United States and others if it would verifiably end its nuclear weapons program.

"The message today, however, says to the leader of North Korea that the world is united in our opposition to his nuclear weapons plans," Bush said.

The president took no questions. He never referred by name to Kim Jong Il, whose country Bush had branded a member of an "axis of evil."

The resolution demands that North Korea eliminate all its nuclear weapons and come back to six-party talks, which include the U.S., that are aimed at ending its program.

"This is the strongest resolution, the strongest set of sanctions ever passed on North Korea," said Kristen Silverberg, assistant secretary of state for international organizations.

The U.S. and Japan made several concessions to win support from skeptical council members, particularly China and Russia.

The resolution expressly rules out military action against North Korea. Also, language was dropped from the U.S. proposal that would have imposed a complete ban on the sale of conventional weapons. Instead, the embargo is limited to major hardware such as tanks, warships, combat aircraft and missiles.

DOJ_NMG_0081797

The resolution calls on all countries to inspect cargo leaving and arriving in North Korea to prevent any illegal trafficking in weapons of mass destruction or ballistic missiles. The final draft was softened from language saying the council "decides" — which is a stronger authorization.

The measure also bans the import or export of material and equipment that could be used to make nuclear weapons or ballistic missiles. It orders all countries to freeze the assets and ban travel for anyone engaged in supporting North Korea's weapons programs.

Freezing financial assets of North Korean leaders and banning the import of luxury items are considered key pieces of the plan because they would squeeze the nation's elite but spare the ordinary citizen, Silverberg said.

"We hope to change the calculus for individual officials in North Korea," she said.

Despite the softer provisions and no threat of military action to enforce them, Bush pronounced the measure "a clear message" to North Korea.

North Korea immediately rejected the resolution, and its U.N. ambassador walked out of the council chamber. Ambassador Pak Gil Yon said North Korea wants talks but warned that it will consider increased U.S. pressure a declaration of war.

The U.S. has refused to talk one on one with North Korea except on the margins of six-nation disarmament talks that also include China, South Korea, Japan and Russia.

Bush is sending Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice to China, South Korea and Japan this coming week to try to ensure there are no fissures between North Korea's neighbors and the United States. Rice and the U.S. ambassador to the U.N., John Bolton, also were appearing on the Sunday morning television talk shows to bolster the U.S. case.

The North Korea crisis was the subject of the president's weekly radio address on Saturday. Democrats responded by saying that the apparent test is evidence Bush's approach to North Korea has failed.

"Under President Bush and this Republican Congress' watch, our country has become less safe — both domestically and abroad," said congressional candidate Patrick Murphy of Pennsylvania. "We have seen the number of terrorist attacks increase around the world. We have seen North Korea and Iran — two members of the president's axis of evil — enhance their nuclear weapons capabilities."

Bush Says UN Needs To Send North Korea Clear Message (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Brendan Murray And Bill Varner

Bloomberg, October 15, 2006

Oct. 14 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush said a United Nations resolution that punishes North Korea for its nuclear activities will help prevent Kim Jong Il's isolated country from building and exporting atomic weapons.

``We will send a clear message to the North Korean regime that its actions will not be tolerated," Bush said in his weekly radio broadcast. The U.S. and other countries ``agree on the need for a strong United Nations Security Council resolution that will require North Korea to dismantle its nuclear programs," he said.

The Security Council today voted 15 to 0 to adopt the resolution, which Bush this afternoon told reporters was ``swift and tough." Agreement came after the U.S. introduced amendments that addressed objections by China and Russia.

China sought greater assurances that the resolution couldn't be used to justify armed seizure of North Korean ships traveling in international waters, while Russia was concerned about the scope of weapons-related items included in the embargo.

Cargo Inspection

The resolution bars the sale or transfer of missile, warships, tanks, attack helicopters and combat aircraft, as well as missile- and nuclear-related goods to the North Korean government, and also calls for UN member nations to conduct inspection of cargo going to of from North Korea.

Bush said in his radio address that the resolution should ``specify measures to prevent North Korea from importing or exporting nuclear or missile technologies" and ``should prevent financial transactions or asset transfers that would help North Korea develop its nuclear or missile capabilities."

North Korea announced Oct. 9 that it had carried out its first nuclear test, drawing condemnation from around the world.

In a concession to China, the U.S. earlier dropped explicit reference to a part of the UN Charter that would make sanctions militarily enforceable, changing it to Article 41 of Chapter 7, which only authorizes diplomatic and economic sanctions. The Washington Post reported this morning that China wants greater assurances that the resolution couldn't be used to justify armed seizure of North Korean ships traveling in international waters.

Carrot and Stick

``We will give the nations with the closest ties to North Korea -- China and South Korea -- a framework to use their leverage to pressure Pyongyang and persuade its regime to change course," Bush said in his radio address. The president told reporters this afternoon that if North Korea verifiably ends its weapons program, the U.S. and other nations will provide economic help.

DOJ_NMG_0081798

Bush said the U.S. will keep consulting with allies in the region.

``In response to North Korea's provocation, we will seek to increase our defense cooperation with our allies, including cooperation on ballistic missile defense to protect against North Korean aggression, and cooperation to prevent North Korea from importing or exporting nuclear or missile technologies," Bush said in the address.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to Beijing, Seoul and Tokyo Oct. 17-22 to talk about the resolution and ``how to go about actually implementing that resolution," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters yesterday in Washington.

Radioactivity Detected

The U.S. notified South Korea today that it had detected evidence of radioactivity near the site where North Korea claims it conducted the nuclear test.

``The U.S. informed us of its findings," said Chun Ki Seok an official at the public affairs division of the Defense Ministry in Seoul. ``The detection of radioactivity means the North conducted a nuclear test. But we are still unaware of whether the test succeeded."

``With its actions this week, the North Korean regime has once again broken its word, provoked an international crisis, and denied its people the opportunity for a better life," Bush said.

U.N. Imposes Trade Embargo On N. Korea (WT/AP)

By Edith M. Lederer, Associated Press

The Washington Times, October 15, 2006

NEW YORK -- The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously yesterday to impose punishing sanctions on North Korea for reportedly carrying out a nuclear test, declaring that the test posed "a clear threat to international peace and security."

North Korea immediately rejected the resolution, and its U.N. ambassador walked out of the council chamber after accusing its members of a "gangsterlike" action that neglects the nuclear threat posed by the United States.

"The Democratic People's Republic of Korea is ready for talks, dialogue and confrontation," Ambassador Pak Gil-yon said, using the conventional long form of his country's name.

"If the United States increases pressure upon the Democratic People's Republic of Korea persistently, the DPRK will continue to take physical countermeasures, considering it as a declaration of war."

The vote came after the United States, Britain and France overcame last-minute differences with Russia and China during what the Russian ambassador called "tense negotiations."

The resolution demands North Korea eliminate all its nuclear weapons, but expressly rules out military action against the country -- a point demanded by the Russians and Chinese.

U.S. Ambassador John R. Bolton warned Pyongyang, however, that if it continues pursuing nuclear weapons, the United States would seek further measures.

The Security Council condemned the nuclear test that North Korea said it conducted Monday. It demanded that North Korea immediately return to six-party talks aimed at persuading Pyongyang to dismantle its weapons program without precondition.

It imposed sanctions for the North's "flagrant disregard" of the council's appeal not to detonate a nuclear device and demanded that North Korea "not conduct any further nuclear test or launch of a ballistic missile."

The resolution bans the import or export of material and equipment that could be used to make nuclear weapons or ballistic missiles. It orders all countries to freeze the assets and ban travel for anyone engaged in supporting North Korea's weapons programs.

"This action by the United Nations, which was swift and tough, says that we are united in our determination to see to it that the Korean Peninsula is nuclear-weapons free," President Bush said.

In a measure aimed at North Korean leader Kim Jong-il and the country's tiny elite, the resolution bans the sale of luxury goods to the country.

To meet Russian and Chinese concerns, the U.S. eliminated a complete ban on the sale of conventional weapons. Instead, the resolution limits the embargo to major hardware such as tanks, warships, combat aircraft and missiles.

The resolution calls on all countries to inspect cargo leaving for and arriving from North Korea to prevent any illegal trafficking in unconventional weapons or ballistic missiles.

China's U.N. ambassador, Wang Guangya, said after the vote that this provision allowing the boarding of ships to inspect cargo was still unacceptable to Beijing, and it would not carry out inspections.

Nonetheless, Mr. Wang hailed what he called a "watered-down" resolution.

DOJ_NMG_0081799

He told reporters that he did not consider the North Korean ambassador's response the official reply from Pyongyang, which he awaits.

"The important thing is not what they say here," Mr. Wang said. The overriding issue, he said, is "how we work together for peace and security in the region."

Russia's U.N. ambassador, Vitaly Churkin, said Moscow got what it wanted -- a strong resolution but one that is also aimed at "prevention of a further escalation of tension."

North Korea's Mr. Pak told the Security Council that the reported nuclear test was not inconsistent with the country's goal of a denuclearized Korean Peninsula.

"The DPRK clarified more than once that it would feel no need to possess even a single nuke when it is no longer exposed to the United States' threat, after it has dropped its hostile policy to the DPRK and confidence has been built between the two countries," he said.

Mr. Bolton said North Korea's reported test "unquestionably poses one of the gravest threats to international peace and security that this council has ever had to confront."

Following Mr. Pak's speech, Mr. Bolton took the floor again saying: "I'm not going to waste any of our time responding."

But he noted that North Korea had done yesterday exactly what it did in July after the council adopted limited sanctions for its ballistic-missile tests -- immediately reject the resolution and walk out.

"It is the contemporary equivalent of Nikita Khrushchev pounding his shoe on the desk," Mr. Bolton said, referring to the Soviet leader's legendary act of protest at the U.N. General Assembly in 1960.

Mr. Bolton told reporters afterward that the next step is to start work on implementing the resolution.

On Friday, U.S. officials said an air sampling after North Korea's claimed nuclear test detected radioactive debris consistent with an atomic explosion. However, the Bush administration and congressional officials said no final determination had been made about the nature of Monday's mystery-shrouded blast.

N. Korean Nuclear Conflict Has Deep Roots (WP)

50 Years of Threats and Broken Pacts Culminate in Apparent Atomic Test

Democrats and Republicans have been quick to use North Korea's apparent nuclear test to benefit their own party in these final weeks of the congressional campaign, but a review of history shows that both sides have contributed to the current situation.

There is more than 50 years of history to Pyongyang's attempt to gain a nuclear weapon, triggered in part by threats from Presidents Harry S. Truman and Dwight D. Eisenhower to end the Korean War.

In 1950, when a reporter asked Truman whether he would use atomic bombs at a time when the war was going badly, the president said, "That includes every weapon we have."

Three years later, Eisenhower made a veiled threat, saying he would "remove all restraints in our use of weapons" if the North Korean government did not negotiate in good faith an ending to that bloody war.

In 1957, the United States placed nuclear-tipped Matador missiles in South Korea, to be followed in later years, under both Republican and Democratic administrations, by nuclear artillery, most of which was placed within miles of the demilitarized zone.

It was not until President Jimmy Carter's administration, in the late 1970s, that the first steps were taken to remove some of the hundreds of nuclear weapons that the United States maintained in South Korea, a process that was not completed until 1991, under the first Bush administration.

It is against that background that the North Korean nuclear program developed.

North Korea has its own uranium mines and in 1965 obtained a small research reactor from the Soviet Union, which it located at Yongbyon. By the mid-1970s, North Korean technicians had increased the capability of that reactor and constructed a second one. Pyongyang agreed in 1977 to allow the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) to inspect the first reactor.

It was in the 1980s that the North Korean weapons program began its clandestine growth with the building of a facility for reprocessing fuel into weapons-grade material and the testing of chemical high explosives. In 1985, around the time U.S. intelligence discovered a third, once-secret reactor, North Korea agreed to sign the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT).

Five years later, U.S. intelligence discovered through satellite photos that a structure had been built that appeared to be capable of separating plutonium from nuclear fuel rods. Under pressure, North Korea signed a safeguards agreement with the IAEA in 1992, and inspections of facilities began. But in January 1993, IAEA inspectors were prevented from going to two previously unreported facilities. In the resulting crisis, North Korea attempted to withdraw from the NPT.

DOJ_NMG_0081800

The Clinton administration responded in 1994 that if North Korea reprocessed plutonium from fuel rods, it would be crossing a "red line" that could trigger military action. The North Koreans "suspended" their withdrawal from the NPT, and bilateral talks with the Clinton administration got underway. When negotiations deadlocked, North Korea removed fuel rods from one of its reactors, a step that brought Carter back into the picture as a negotiator.

The resulting talks led to the 1994 Agreed Framework, under which North Korea would freeze and eventually dismantle its nuclear weapons program. In return, it would be supplied with conventional fuel and ultimately with two light-water reactors that could not produce potential weapons-grade fuel.

However, a subsequent IAEA inspection determined that North Korea had clandestinely extracted about 24 kilograms of plutonium from its fuel rods, and U.S. intelligence reported that was enough material for two or three 20-kiloton plutonium bombs.

During the next six years of the Clinton administration and into the first years of the current Bush administration, the spent fuel from North Korea's reactors was kept in a storage pond under IAEA supervision. As late as July 5, 2002, in a letter to Rep. Edward J. Markey (D-Mass.), then-national security adviser Condoleezza Rice said the administration was continuing with the 1994 agreement but holding back some elements until the IAEA certified that the North Koreans had come into full compliance with the NPT's safeguards agreement.

In November 2001, when the Bush administration was absorbed in the aftermath of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, intelligence analysts at the Lawrence Livermore National Laboratory completed a highly classified report that concluded North Korea had begun construction of a plant to enrich uranium. A National Intelligence Estimate of the North Korean program confirmed the Livermore report, providing evidence that Pyongyang was violating the agreement.

Nonetheless, the Bush administration waited until October 2002 before confronting the North Koreans, who at one meeting confirmed they were following another path to a nuclear weapon using enriched uranium.

Soon thereafter, the United States ended its participation in the 1994 agreement. North Korea ordered IAEA inspectors out, announced it would reprocess the stored fuel rods and withdrew from the NPT. Earlier this year, Pyongyang declared it had nuclear weapons.

The Bush administration then embarked on a new approach, developing a six-nation strategy based on the idea that bilateral U.S.-North Korea negotiations did not work and that only bringing in China and South Korea, which had direct leverage over the Pyongyang government, would gain results.

In South, Most Call For New Policy, Own Nukes (WT)

By Andrew Salmon, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 15, 2006

SEOUL -- In less than a week since North Korea claimed to have tested a nuclear weapon, public opinion in the South has turned sharply against a South Korean policy of engaging the enemy in the belief it will eventually bring peace on the divided peninsula.

A JoongAng newspaper poll, several days after the reported nuclear test Monday, found 78 percent of respondents thought South Korea should revise its policy, and 65 percent said South Korea should develop nuclear weapons to protect itself.

Protesters have held nightly candlelight vigils, and some have burned North Korean flags.

"We worry about a war because the regime is so thoughtless," librarian Lee Young-sook said at one rally. "The South Korean people are being held hostage."

North Korea faces United Nations sanctions, approved yesterday in a unanimous vote of the 15-nation Security Council.

South Korean President Roh Moo-hyun has conceded the "sunshine" policy of engagement with North Korea is under threat because of the nuclear test.

A Korea Opinion Institute poll found approval for the opposition Grand National Party (GNP) at 40.1 percent, compared with an approval rating of 11.4 percent for Mr. Roh's ruling Uri Party.

The GNP has demanded that industrial and tourism projects with the North be shut down.

Even the left-wing newspaper Hankyoreh titled its editorial on the nuclear test "Shock and poor judgment."

The architect of South Korea's engagement with the North, former President Kim Dae-jung, remained unmoved by the test.

In a speech at a university Wednesday, he advised the United States to enter bilateral talks with North Korea, blamed American hard-liners for the crisis and said engagement must continue.

Andrei Lankov, a North Korean specialist at Seoul's Kookmin University, said a key weather vane of North-South ties points to North Korea's Mount Kumgang (Diamond Mountain), a resort for South Korean tourists inside the communist state.

"If the government stops the tours to Mount Kumgang, that will really send a message that they are serious," Mr. Lankov said.

DOJ_NMG_0081801

The resort, run by South Korean conglomerate Hyundai Asan, has welcomed more than 1 million tourists from the South since 1998, earning the impoverished North hundreds of millions of dollars in foreign currency.

Business has continued at the engagement policy's second flagship project, the joint North-South industrial complex at Kaesong, just inside North Korea.

Fifteen South Korean companies are established in the Seoul-funded project, but South Korea halted expansion after the North tested missiles on July 4 and, on Wednesday, it indefinitely halted further land sales at the site.

U.N.'s Next Leader Urges North Korea (AP)

By Edith M. Lederer

AP, October 15, 2006

South Korea's foreign minister, who has promised to make peace with North Korea a top priority as the new U.N. secretary-general, said Saturday the global community must engage the reclusive country in talks over its nuclear program, not just punish it with sanctions.

Ban Ki-moon, who was appointed Friday to succeed Kofi Annan on Jan. 1, said in an interview with the Associated Press that he welcomed the U.N. Security Council's "very clear, strong and unified message to North Korea" in the resolution it adopted Saturday, declaring Pyongyang's claimed nuclear test unacceptable.

The resolution demanded that North Korea give up nuclear weapons, and banned the country from exporting or importing any material for its weapons or ballistic missile programs. It also called on all countries to inspect cargo to or from the North to interdict weapons smuggling, and ordered governments to freeze all assets and ban the travel of anyone involved in illegal trafficking.

"I hope that North Korea will comply with this resolution," Ban said. "I hope that all member states of the United Nations will fully implement this resolution."

The resolution expressly rules out military action against North Korea, and Ban stressed in the interview that "we need a two-pronged approach at this time," relying not only on sanctions but on dialogue and talks.

He urged the North Koreans to return to six-nation talks which Pyongyang has boycotted for 13 months to protest financial measures imposed by the United States for alleged counterfeiting and money-laundering. The boycott began just after an agreement in September 2005 in which the North agreed to give up its nuclear weapons in exchange for security guarantees and aid.

"North Korea should return to the six-party process immediately without any preconditions," Ban said. "We need to have the North Koreans get on board with the negotiations."

"We hope that the North Koreans will take a more reasonable and practical approach for the future. A much brighter future lies ahead if they implement the joint statement adopted last year," he said, referring to its September 2005 pledge to abandon its weapons program.

Ban said he was "very much disappointed" at Saturday's statement by North Korea's U.N. Ambassador Pak Gil Yon, who rejected the resolution and accused the council of a "gangster-like action."

Pak said Pyongyang conducted the nuclear test "to protect its sovereignty" in the face of escalating U.S. threats and sanctions. He added that North Korea would give up its nuclear weapons if it didn't face continued threats from the U.S., stressing the country is ready for dialogue but prepared for confrontation if U.S. pressure intensifies.

"I am very much frustrated at the path North Korea has taken of testing nuclear weapons in violation of all existing regulations and conventions and treaties to prevent the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction," Ban said.

The test was conducted "in total disrespect" of South Korea's humanitarian aid, exchanges and cooperation with the North, he said.

Ban said last month that if he became secretary-general, he would use his authority to further peace, inter-Korean reconciliation, and a peaceful resolution of the North Korean nuclear issue. He also said he wanted to go to North Korea, something Annan never did.

Asked when he would visit the North, Ban said, "First of all I have to see how the situation develops."

"As the Security Council has adopted a very strong resolution, we will see how the resolution is implemented," he added.

Negotiations Must Follow UN's North Korea Action, Analysts Say (BLOOM)

By Jeff Bliss And William Varner

DOJ_NMG_0081802

Bloomberg, October 15, 2006

Oct. 15 (Bloomberg) -- The United Nations Security Council resolution punishing North Korea for a suspected nuclear test will only be effective if the Bush administration backs it with negotiations to end the weapons program, some national-security analysts said.

Stephen Bosworth, a former U.S. ambassador to South Korea under President Bill Clinton, said the administration should be congratulated for quickly unifying world opinion against the Oct. 9 test. Yet sanctions alone won't be enough to pressure a government that already is economically and diplomatically isolated, he said.

The resolution is ``an admirable demonstration of international sentiment against what the North Koreans have done," said Bosworth, now dean of the Fletcher School of Law and Diplomacy at Tufts University in Medford, Massachusetts. ``Will it change North Korea's behavior? Very unlikely."

The resolution, adopted 15-0 yesterday, bans the sale or transfer of missiles, warships, tanks, attack helicopters and combat aircraft, as well as missile- and nuclear-related goods to the North Korean government. It calls for UN member nations to conduct ``inspection of cargo" going to or from North Korea.

President George W. Bush must overrule those in the administration who are reluctant to talk directly with the North Koreans, said Joseph Cirincione, a senior vice president for national security at the Center for American Progress in Washington.

`Important Prods'

The sanctions ``can be very important prods that bring North Korea back to the negotiating table," he said. ``It will be important for the U.S. to be there ready to negotiate."

Those talks could be conducted within the multilateral discussions involving North Korea's neighbors -- Russia, China, South Korea and Japan -- on which the Bush administration has insisted, Cirincione said.

John Tkacik, a former U.S. diplomat in China, said the UN resolution may force the North Koreans back into those talks. If it fails to do so, the crisis might ``persist indefinitely," he said.

``The North Koreans are finding themselves friendless in the world," said Tkacik, now a senior fellow at the Heritage Foundation, a Washington-based research organization. ``Their strategy of defiance is not really working, especially with China and Russia signing into this agreement. This is going to put the squeeze on North Korea even harder."

The latest diplomatic crisis on the Korean peninsula was touched off by North Korean claims that it had conducted an underground nuclear test in the country's mountainous northeastern region.

Radioactivity

The U.S. notified South Korea yesterday that it had detected evidence of radioactivity near the site where North Korea said it conducted the nuclear test. U.S. intelligence officials have said they haven't come to a definitive conclusion about whether a nuclear bomb was exploded.

Bush said the resolution sends a ``clear message" to North Korean leader Kim Jong-Il that he should cease developing nuclear weapons in exchange for help in reviving his country's destroyed economy.

``This action by the United Nations, which was swift and tough, says that we are united in our determination to see to it that the Korea peninsula is nuclear-weapon-free," Bush said at the White House.

Congressional Republicans praised the resolution's passage and highlighted the role of John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the UN. Bolton has been criticized by lawmakers such as Senator Christopher Dodd, a Connecticut Democrat, who say he's brusque and undiplomatic.

``I'm pleased the UN has demonstrated that there are consequences to North Korea's reckless actions," said Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, a Tennessee Republican.

North Korean Response

North Korea, formally known as the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, ``totally rejects" the resolution, Ambassador Pak Gil Yon said yesterday. ``If the U.S. increases pressure on the DPRK, persistently, the DPRK will continue to take physical countermeasures, considering it as a declaration of war."

Pak yesterday walked out of the Security Council chamber when South Korea's envoy began to speak, an action that Bolton compared with Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev pounding his shoe on a desk in the General Assembly in 1960. Bolton suggested that the UN should consider expelling North Korea.

The diplomatic atmosphere is so charged that a mediator such as a high-ranking Chinese official or new UN Secretary-General Ban Ki Moon will be needed to persuade countries to resume negotiations, Cirincione said.

Different Interpretations

Some of the resolution's language is open to interpretation, showing the perils of using the UN to stop nuclear proliferation, said Lee Feinstein, a senior fellow for U.S. foreign policy and international law at the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington.

DOJ_NMG_0081803

The final text says nations are only ``called upon'' to inspect cargo coming from or bound for North Korea ``as necessary.''

While Bolton said nations are legally bound to follow through on the provision, Chinese Ambassador Wang Guangya said his country doesn't approve of the inspections.

``Even when you get unanimity, you have members like China instantly repudiating key provisions of the resolution they just approved,'' Feinstein said.

The resolution condemns North Korea's test, says that its nuclear program must be verifiably eliminated and demands that it not conduct any more tests and adhere to the Nuclear Non- Proliferation Treaty.

Freezing Assets

The measure also establishes a Security Council committee to identify people whose financial assets will be frozen because they contributed to North Korea's nuclear and ballistic missile programs. Foreign travel by the designated people would be banned.

Exceptions were made for delivery of humanitarian aid to North Korea.

Adoption of the text comes three months after the Security Council adopted a resolution barring North Korea from acquiring or selling missile technology. That measure was in response to North Korea's July 5 test of seven ballistic missiles.

Whatever the U.S. and its allies decide is their next move, they must act soon, Cirincione said. ``The more they test, the harder it is for them to stop,'' he said.

What Do We Do Now? (NSWK)

Newsweek

Newsweek, October 15, 2006

Four experts outline their visions for how the world should deal with North Korea and its nuclear threats. WEB EXCLUSIVE

North Korea is a geostrategic nut that—as diplomats from Beijing, Seoul and Washington have learned—is not easily cracked. What might be done to rein in North Korea's nuclear program? NEWSWEEK asked a handful of experts with first-hand knowledge of North Korea for their views on what the U.S. policy toward Pyongyang should be. Excerpts:

Kim Dae Jung

President of South Korea (1998-2003) and winner of the Nobel Peace Prize (2000)

The United Nations is contemplating actions against North Korea's nuclear test. The preconditions for any measure should be that we mustn't abide North Korea having nuclear weapons even though they tested one. [Their program] must be completely dismantled. The first option is the use of force, but the United States doesn't have the capability, and neighboring countries like Korea, China, Russia and even Japan are not considering this. The second option is economic sanctions, but there is no guarantee they will bring about the desired result. North Korea's economy could collapse. Another concern is that North Korea might try to sell its nuclear know-how to countries like Iran or Venezuela, two oil producers with a lot of money. The third option is dialogue. I cannot understand why the U.S. is still saying it won't [talk] because North Korea is evil. You can have dialogue even with the devil if necessary. In the past, President Nixon went to China and had dialogue with Mao Zedong. President Reagan called the Soviet Union an "evil empire" but still pursued dialogue. President Eisenhower pursued dialogue with Pyongyang during the Korean War, and because of that there was an armistice that [maintained] peace on the peninsula for the last 50 years. From a country that is very much responsible for world peace, the United States' refusal to talk is quite unacceptable. (Read NEWSWEEK's complete interview with Kim Dae Jung.)

Stephen W. Bosworth

Dean of the Fletcher School at Tufts University and the former U.S. Ambassador to South Korea (1997-2000)

The first thing we need to do is draw a collective deep breath and seek calm. Over time, I think there is going to be mounting pressure on us to engage more directly with the North Koreans. I am not at all confident that any conceivable combination of pressures on North Korea from us, South Korea or China are going to bring about a change of direction on the part of Pyongyang.

If we've learned anything about negotiating with the North Koreans over the last 25 years, it's that they do not react well to pressure. They believe that a crisis atmosphere benefits them; it creates openings [between] other countries that they can exploit, and they believe they're better than anyone else at managing this kind of crisis.

It seems to me there are three possible outcomes: One, we could try to negotiate a package of security assurances and economic goodies for North Korea that would be sufficient to convince them to roll back their nuclear-weapons programs and do so in a verifiable fashion.

The second alternative is that we put increasing pressure on them, including the use of military force, to destroy or at least disrupt their nuclear programs. The problem is that once you cross that path, you have no assurance that you're going to be able to contain the ensuing situation. It is stupid to assume that we could strike North Korea without provoking a counter-strike from them in some fashion. And while we may be willing to contemplate that—our national territory is a long way away from them—we do however have troops and lots of American civilians in Korea and Japan. What may seem to be a tolerable price to pay for destroying [North Korea's] nuclear programs would probably not seem so tolerable to South Koreans and Japanese. Added to that is the complicating factor that I doubt we have any real idea where their remaining nuclear devices or materials might be located.

The third outcome is that we learn to live with a nuclear North Korea. To do that, we would obviously have to have very close and careful cooperation with the parties in the region. We would have to lay down some very explicit red lines as to what would be tolerable or intolerable, including selling or exporting materials to other countries or other organizations. Two or three years ago, I had a significant level of confidence that a negotiated outcome was feasible, but I am no longer quite that confident.

We've got to listen to the North Koreans as they tell us what they think they want—that is, direct contact with the United States, not simply through the six-party process, but they want direct contact of the sort that we had under Bush One and under Clinton. To say we've tried that and it failed, as the president did [Thursday]—I simply don't agree with that. What is the disadvantage? Rewarding their bad behavior? That's patent nonsense. We talk all the time to people who behave badly.

Hans Blix

Veteran Swedish diplomat who headed the U.N.'s Monitoring, Verification and Inspection Commission. From 1981 to 1997, he served as director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency, during which time he oversaw inspections of Iraq's nuclear program. Today he chairs the Stockholm-based Weapons of Mass Destruction Commission.

[For Washington,] I think the latest statement from [President] Bush is relatively conciliatory. The [administration's] anger is understandable, but you have to convince and reassure [the North Koreans], too. You have to understand that when most countries turn to nuclear weapons, whether it's Iran or Pakistan or China, it's because of their perceptions of their own security. In the case of North Korea, it is reasonable to guess that while once they felt supported by Russia or China, now they no longer feel that way. And for a long time they have felt under threat from the United States—and they have seen what has happened in Iraq. Whether you can now say that the [conciliatory] "Sunshine Policy" [adopted by South Korea] has now failed, I am doubtful. In fact, I think it's the continued waving of the stick that may be dangerous.

The North Koreans now have a choice: they have to decide what would protect them better—paper assurances or nuclear weapons. To persuade them to go down the paper assurance route, I think you have to put some more carrots on the table. There's the possibility of offering diplomatic relations, for example, or [that] they could get more [aid] from the World Bank. As others have said, too, they should get assistance and gradually abandon their disastrous economic structure—not for a free market economy but for something like Vietnam's or China's.

We have to decide on our priority too. Is it human rights or making the regime in North Korea step back from nuclear weapons? A lot of valuable time has been lost by our ambivalent attitude in the past. We are harvesting what we have sown. The constraint is domestic policies in the West. With the elections coming up in America, Bush wants to be seen as firm, to look macho. In [an earlier crisis] in 1994, when I was at the IAEA, [former President] Jimmy Carter went to Pyongyang and met Kim Il Sung. Maybe another such trick is needed today.

Gordon G. Chang

Author of "Nuclear Showdown: North Korea Takes on the World" (Random House 2006)

I think it's important to disarm Kim Jong Il, because if you do that it will go a long way to also stopping the Iranian weapons program, too. For years, the Iranians have been watching the North Koreans and, more important, they have been watching the international community's reaction to Kim Jong Il's increasingly provocative behavior.

How do we stop both of those programs? I think there is a common tactic for North Korea and Iran. Both countries have two primary sponsors: North Korea has China and South Korea, and Iran has China and Russia. Historically, the Chinese have stood up to the U.S. when they've had [diplomatic support from other countries], and they have been accommodating when they've been isolated. So the real trick for American diplomacy is to isolate China, because that puts China in a position where it has no choice but to be responsible and to do the right thing.

Right now in Beijing there are many officials and analysts who believe it is in China's interest to be cooperative with the United States and to help disarm Kim Jong Il. And China can do that because it supplies 90 percent of North Korea's fuel oil, 80 percent of its consumer goods and somewhere between 40 and 45 percent of North Korea's food. If China wanted to, it could disarm Kim Jong Il next week: there would be no nuclear weapons program, no missiles program and indeed there would be no North Korea, and the North Koreans know this.

But there is no consensus in Beijing to change the focus of their foreign policy-supporting Kim Jong Il because there are many Chinese who maintain close ties with their North Korean counterparts, especially in the military. It's important for the United States to create the conditions under which the more progressive forces in Beijing are going to win out. The Chinese are ruthlessly pragmatic, and if we apply leverage, I believe that China will fall into line—especially so if we are able to solidify our military alliance with South Korea, because then that leaves China in a very difficult position. Ultimately, they value their relationship with us more than they value their relationship with North Korea.

The first issue is the U.N. Security Council deliberations right now. We have to make it clear to China that it's now or never. They're either stakeholders in the international system or they're adversaries of it. There is just no middle ground when the world is at such risk.

The Bush administration put sanctions in place about a year ago [to stop] North Korea's currency counterfeiting program. They've been surprisingly effective in constricting the flow of funds in and out of North Korea. They are really starting to hurt the regime. I don't think it's the time to loosen them; on the contrary, I believe the sanctions should be tightened. There is a concern about how sanctions would hurt the North Korean people, but by maintaining the regime, we maintain a repressive system, which is going to cause suffering for even more North Koreans in the future.

Hazel Smith

Professor in international relations at Warwick University in Britain. She spent two years in North Korea earlier this decade, helping to run the United Nations' food-relief program. Her latest book is "Hungry for Peace: International Security, Humanitarian Assistance and Social Change in North Korea."

The U.S. has to cut the rhetoric and get on with [diplomacy]. That means it has to have something to offer the North Koreans rather than just beating them about the head. All the other parties in the six-party talks now want America to start direct talks [with Pyongyang] and it could be done without loss of face in the context of multilateral negotiations. If America stops tightening the screws, the North Koreans will give. That's diplomacy.

What the North Koreans want is recognition—the buzzword is 'normalization.' And [in return] they might accept tight verification as part of some form of disarmament deal. They are utterly pragmatic. What they really want is money for economic redevelopment. The trouble is that America is paralyzed—with parts of the State Department wanting to negotiate while others refuse because they believe it's a moral issue.

Could sanctions succeed? It all depends on whether China and South Korea join in. The North Koreans' only substantial trade—including illicit trade—is with China. The complication is that so much of the trade is on a concessionary basis, and if sanctions covered fertilizers you would see starvation within months. North Korean agriculture isn't up to subsistence level. They are already on the brink.

China will probably go for a harsh form of words [denunciation of North Korea] at the United Nations. What they want to avoid is a resolution so wide open that it gives the United States cover for any form of military action. The real space to watch is the bilateral relationship between China and North Korea. What little development that's taking place in North Korea is all down to Chinese businesses. Just by cutting off oil, they could shut down the whole North Korean transport network.

The real danger is not the bomb. The North Koreans are not stupid enough to drop it on anyone. The real danger is that there will be a nuclear accident. They know the physics but they have no quality assurance systems and no engineering skills. Their culture is one of make-do-and-mend. Basically they have a homemade bomb and a homemade nuclear reactor of the same type as at Chernobyl. If there was an accident they have no capacity to deal with it, and are unlikely to call in help from outside until it is too late.

Worldview | Why Talks With N. Korea Eventually Must Resume (PHI)

By Trudy Rubin

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 15, 2006

North Korea's apparent test of a nuclear weapon has provoked another debate over whether it's worth negotiating with rogue states.

I believe this is not the moment for a U.S. dialogue with Pyongyang. This dangerous regime, with its track record of illegal weapons sales, must be disabused of any idea that it can get a free pass to the nuclear club. Strong U.N. economic sanctions are crucial, backed by a united front of U.S. and Asian powers. Also crucial is President Bush's warning that North Korea will be held accountable if it passes nuclear materiel to other states or groups.

But then what? I've talked to no one - dove, hawk or owl - who believes sanctions alone will force Kim Jong Il to give up his arsenal. Nor does anyone believe military force is a viable option (provided Kim doesn't sell his plutonium to al-Qaeda or Iran).

Unless sanctions are crafted to prod North Korea back to the table, it's hard to see any chance of curbing Pyongyang's nuclear program. But can talks with North Korea work?

Republicans contend that the Clinton-era negotiations with North Korea were a failure and demonstrate why talks are pointless. But that assessment stands history on its head.

DOJ_NMG_0081806

In 1994, North Korea was threatening to quit the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and turn spent reactor fuel into bomb-grade plutonium. The Clinton administration prepared for a possible military strike, but then turned to former President Jimmy Carter as negotiator in Pyongyang.

The result was the 1994 Agreed Framework, under which North Korea sealed its Yongbyon reactor and fuel rods and put them under U.N. inspection. Had that reactor not remained frozen until 2002, it could have produced enough fuel to make dozens of bombs.

On taking office, President Bush labeled North Korea part of the "axis of evil" and made clear he was more interested in "regime change" than talks. Then in 2002, U.S. officials found evidence that North Korea was cheating on the agreement, by pursuing a secret effort to enrich uranium. The United States drew back from the Agreed Framework, and North Korea expelled U.N. inspectors and started making nuclear weapons.

Yet a simple cost-benefit analysis shows that the Agreed Framework had still been a success. Clinton's negotiations stopped a program that was already capable of making bomb materiel. The secret uranium program, by contrast, is a long-term undertaking, and there are no signs that it has produced weapons materiel.

True, the Clinton administration's negotiations didn't end North Korea's nuclear program - but they did delay the production of weapons for eight years. Some on the Bush team now advocate bombing Iran's nuclear energy facilities - at terrible risk - just to delay the Iranian program perhaps three to five years.

Since the collapse of the Agreed Framework on the Bush watch, North Korea has produced about six to 12 nuclear weapons.

President Bush finally decided, during his second term, to try negotiations in concert with our Asian allies. He finally let U.S. negotiator Chris Hill meet directly with North Korea officials within those six-nation talks. This direct dialogue led to a promising joint statement in September 2005, in which Pyongyang pledged to dismantle its nuclear program in return for security guarantees and aid.

Those talks eventually fell apart, too. Many experts believe that a key cause was disagreement within the administration over whether the U.S. goal should be to change North Korea's regime or its behavior. Just as the joint statement was signed, U.S. officials were pursuing international bank sanctions against North Korea. These may have been justified in principle - the Pyongyang regime is a notorious counterfeiter and smuggler - but the timing seemed designed to kill any deal.

Now, North Korea has tested a weapon and is poised to make more bombs. Once again, the White House must choose its approach to this recalcitrant regime.

Talks with North Korea are horribly frustrating, and it is unclear whether Kim will ever give up his weapons. He may have taken the lesson from the Iraq invasion (as Iran has) that nukes are his guarantee of keeping power. There is strong Bush resistance to talks - especially direct talks - or sending a U.S. emissary along the lines of a Carter. And the chances of success are much slimmer now than under Clinton.

But at some point, the White House will have to decide whether it wants to pursue the small chance of freezing Pyongyang's program, or at least limiting the number of weapons. As Gary Samore of the Council on Foreign Relations says: "If they only have enough materiel for six bombs, they are less likely to sell it than if they have enough for 24 bombs."

Perhaps Bush will listen to his father's key adviser, James Baker 3d, who is already tasked with reassessing America's Iraq strategy. Baker recently said, "I believe in talking to your enemies. It's got to be hard-nosed, it's got to be determined. You don't give away anything, but in my view, it's not appeasement to talk to your enemies."

Baker has already spoken with an Iranian representative.

Pyongyang next?

China Buys The Soft Sell (WP)

By Joshua Kurlantzick

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

North Korea may have conducted a nuclear test last week, but it was China that went a little ballistic. Beijing condemned its longtime ally, denouncing North Korean leader Kim Jong Il's "flagrant and brazen" violation of global norms. Pyongyang, China declared, had "defied the universal opposition of international society."

Other nations joined the chorus of concern over North Korea's apparent entry into the nuclear club. But China remains the one country that can do more than fume and condemn. It now has the chance to wield the diplomatic influence it has carefully been amassing in recent years as it pursues a new strategy in Asia and elsewhere in the world. Call it Chinese power, 21st-century-style.

While Washington has focused on the fight against terrorism, China has quietly reoriented its foreign policy to emerge as a new advocate of "soft power" -- a combination of diplomatic outreach, cultural attractiveness and economic might that helps a nation persuade other countries to follow its lead.

North Korea is a case in point. China has lately become Pyongyang's major trading partner and source of aid. Chinese leaders have taken Kim on tours of their booming south to suggest how he might boost his backward economy, and they have trained North Korean officials in economic management. It was Beijing that helped persuade Pyongyang to come to the negotiating table for the six-party talks on North Korea's nuclear program.

It's all part of an international charm offensive that could threaten U.S. interests abroad, but could also -- if properly exploited by other nations -- transform the Asian giant into a more responsible member of the world community.

Beijing has embraced the concept of soft power with vigor. In recent years, it has dispatched more than 2,000 volunteer language instructors all over the world to teach Mandarin; upgraded its diplomatic corps (half of the country's 4,000 diplomats are reportedly younger than 35); boosted its foreign aid to match the United States as a donor in some countries; increased overseas investment; promoted the study of Chinese culture worldwide; and launched a frenzy of trade initiatives, developing more than 10 free-trade deals in the past five years.

China has even created its own version of the Peace Corps -- the China Association for Youth Volunteers. Like its U.S. counterpart, it sends young people to developing countries such as Burma, Ethiopia and Laos to work on long-term community-assistance projects -- and to polish China's global image in the process.

While it initially concentrated on the immediate neighborhood of Southeast Asia, China has lately expanded its soft power play into Latin America, Central Asia and Africa. Thousands of young professionals from sub-Saharan Africa now travel to China on scholarships provided by Beijing. Trade between the continent and China grew by more than 260 percent between 2001 and 2005. China offers Africa about $2.7 billion annually in loans and grants.

Beijing has also been busy planning Confucius Institutes -- Chinese language and culture schools attached to universities -- in key African nations such as Kenya, as well as countries such as Uzbekistan and the Philippines. And Chinese officials shrewdly advertise these initiatives at new summits such as the China-Africa Cooperation Forum, which was established in 2000, and the upcoming China-Africa summit next month.

The Chinese leadership's decision to go soft was a conscious one, a reaction to Western shunning after the Tiananmen Square crackdown in 1989 and the failure of China's attempts in the 1990s to use its growing military force to intimidate its neighbors into choosing Beijing over Washington. And it has yielded some dazzling success.

A BBC poll last year of 22 nations found that nearly all believed that China played a more positive role in the world than the United States. Today, Southeast Asian officials compete for junkets and training in China. "We have no money, and this is the only training we can get," a top official in Laos's Foreign Ministry told me. Chinese aid funds roads and hospitals across Asia, and neighboring countries orient their commerce toward Beijing: Growing trade with China has transformed Chiang Saen, a formerly sleepy Thai village on the Mekong River. Today, container vessels arrive with crates of Chinese apples that are unloaded into trucks lined up at the town's port, while Chinese traders gather at flashy massage parlors to barter with importers.

China's newfound popularity could raise a host of problems internationally. Its emergence as a donor country may allow aid recipients to play Beijing off against organizations such as the World Bank. Just this summer, Chad moved toward evicting two oil companies, Chevron Corp. and Malaysia's Petronas, from a project backed by the bank, which had insisted that some of the oil profits be spent on improving social welfare. There's a chance that Chad may replace the oil firms with Chinese companies; at the same time that it was kicking out Chevron and Petronas, it was breaking relations with Taiwan and establishing ties with China. China's growing foreign investment could also contribute to environmental destruction, because Chinese firms have little experience with green policies at home.

Worse, as Beijing charms the world, it could persuade other developing nations to choose a Chinese growth model -- promoting gradual economic change but clamping down on any political opening. Many foreign leaders, even in democracies, undeniably want to emulate China's breakneck development. "There's great admiration for China," says Dewi Fortuna Anwar, former assistant minister for foreign affairs in Indonesia. Even the head of the African Development Bank told the World Economic Forum in January that Africa can learn from the Chinese.

But as Beijing's profile rises, its foreign policy will also come under greater scrutiny. Its leaders will have to do more to maintain the country's appeal -- and this could be the opportunity the West needs to bend China toward becoming a more responsible international power and moving away from some of its more roguish friends, such as North Korea, Iran and Venezuela.

On core issues such as regime survival or vital oil and gas fields, change is unlikely. But there has been some positive movement on other fronts. Though China once disdained treaties, it has lately proved increasingly willing to work with multilateral institutions. Its image improved significantly in Asia after it signed the Association of Southeast Asian Nations' Treaty of Amity and Cooperation, the landmark agreement in the region.

Burma is another example of how China might be prodded to look beyond its narrowest interests. Burmese activists are adopting a strategy of quietly emphasizing to China that reflexive support for the regime in Rangoon will only exacerbate instability on China's borders and stir up anti-China sentiment among ordinary Burmese. They have a point. In Chinese towns near Burma, heroin junkies sleep in alleys, waiting for drug shipments from across the border. Inside Burma, domestic instability has made it easy for armed Burmese thugs to kidnap Chinese business people in the country.

And the strategy shows some signs that it's working. Chinese officials have begun cultivating relations with exiled Burmese dissidents, a step unthinkable only five years ago. At the same time, Chinese Prime Minister Wen Jiabao has prodded Burma to engage with its democratic opposition, and China has allowed the U.N. Security Council to take up Burma's human rights and security crises, suggesting that Beijing might also be willing to accept tough U.N. action against North Korea.

Similarly, Chinese diplomats say that Beijing became serious about using its influence to fight disease only after the SARS and bird flu crises made the government recognize how cross-border disease could produce instability. In response, China held a donor conference on bird flu this year that raised $2 billion in pledges.

In other cases, activists and foreign governments could try to convince Beijing that soft power exercised irresponsibly will hurt Chinese companies operating abroad. If local populations see China's soft power as undermining their freedom and social welfare, top Chinese corporations will never become competitive international players. Instead, Chinese businesses will suffer the kind of guilt by association that tars American companies such as McDonald's, which can at least draw upon massive advertising budgets to combat the United States's poor global image.

Beijing desperately wants to prevent Chinese firms from facing the kind of security threats that Western companies confront, but it's beginning to happen. Though China recently promised Nigeria $4 billion in new investment, armed militants have warned Beijing to stay away from the Niger Delta, where they think oil firms are destroying the waterways and Chinese companies could contribute to environmental damage.

In other countries, such as South Africa and Zambia, workers have protested Chinese firms' labor policies. Locals had celebrated several years ago when China revitalized Zambia's decrepit Chambishi copper mine. But when 49 miners died in an accident in April 2005, their families received no compensation; the resulting anger was so great that Chambishi's Chinese managers stayed away from the workers' funerals for fear of being attacked.

In the recent Zambian election, opposition candidate Michael Sata played on this anger, accusing Chinese companies of exploiting local workers and threatening to evict the Chinese firms if he won. When Sata lost, his supporters rioted in the Zambian capital, targeting Chinese businesses.

But China's growing soft power most needs checking as Beijing begins using its leverage to meddle in other countries' domestic politics. Before Sata lost, China's ambassador to Zambia had warned that Beijing might cut off diplomatic ties to the country depending upon whom Zambians chose for president. In interviews across Asia, Africa and Latin America, activists, politicians, writers and other opinion leaders expressed to me their fears that growing Chinese influence in their countries could stifle political change, though they simultaneously hope that Beijing can use its diplomatic influence to restrain Asia's most dangerous actors, such as North Korea.

China has amassed impressive soft power -- now it has to prove that it's willing to use it wisely.

Restraints Fray As Nuclear Age Grows Globally (NYT)

By William J. Broad And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

The declaration last Monday by North Korea that it had conducted a successful atomic test brought to nine the number of nations believed to have nuclear arms. But atomic officials estimate that as many as 40 more countries have the technical skill, and in some cases the required material, to build a bomb.

That ability, coupled with new nuclear threats in Asia and the Middle East, risks a second nuclear age, officials and arms control specialists say, in which nations are more likely to abandon the old restraints against atomic weapons.

The spread of nuclear technology is expected to accelerate as nations redouble their reliance on atomic power. That will give more countries the ability to make reactor fuel, or, with the same equipment and a little more effort, bomb fuel — the hardest part of the arms equation.

DOJ_NMG_0081809

Signs of activity abound. Hundreds of companies are now prospecting for uranium where dozens did a few years ago. Argentina, Australia and South Africa are drawing up plans to begin enriching uranium, and other countries are considering doing the same. Egypt is reviving its program to develop nuclear power.

Concern about the situation led the International Atomic Energy Agency to summon hundreds of government officials and experts from around the world to Vienna in September to discuss tightening restrictions on who is permitted to produce nuclear fuel.

"These dangers are urgent," Sam Nunn, an expert on nuclear proliferation and a former Democratic senator, told the group. "We are in a race between cooperation and catastrophe and, at this moment, the outcome is unclear."

But even the atomic agency itself exemplifies some of the underlying tensions inherent in the development of nuclear energy.

For decades, the I.A.E.A., known as the world's nuclear policeman, has pursued its other mandate — to promote safe nuclear power — by running technical aid programs with roughly a hundred states. Some of that knowledge could be useful in a weapons program, though the aid is meant exclusively for civilian use.

The agency still helps Pakistan, which exploded a nuclear bomb in 1998. It also helped North Korea until a decade ago. Even today, it is assisting Iran, which many experts fear is close to mastering the basics of making a bomb. It has 14 programs under way with Iran, including a study on upgrading a nuclear research laboratory, as well as helping it start up its Bushehr reactor.

North Korea's reported test has shaken the nuclear status quo and raised anew the question of whether Asia will be the first to feel a nuclear "domino effect," in which states clandestinely hedge their bets by assembling the crucial technologies needed to make a bomb, or actually cross the line to become new weapons states. In the Middle East, the confrontation with Iran has focused new attention on countries like Saudi Arabia and Egypt, both of which fear that an Iranian bomb would make Tehran the greatest power in the region.

Mohamed ElBaradei, the director general of the I.A.E.A., has estimated that up to 49 nations now know how to make nuclear arms, and he has warned that global tensions could push some over the line.

"We are relying," he said, "primarily on the continued good intentions of these countries — intentions which are in turn based on their sense of security or insecurity, and could therefore be subject to rapid change."

Worry about proliferation is hardly new. In March 1963, President John F. Kennedy said, "I am haunted by the feeling that by 1970, unless we are successful, there may be 10 nuclear powers instead of 4, and by 1975, 15 or 20." That timetable proved to be inaccurate. But in recent years there has been a sense around the globe that President Kennedy's prediction is about to come true, three decades late.

Kofi Annan, the United Nations secretary general, said this year that "the international community seems almost to be sleepwalking" down a path where states, after long living without nuclear arms, now feel compelled to revisit their logic.

He warned of a new arms race — not one of superpowers, but of regional powers. "Perhaps most damaging of all," he concluded, "there is also a perception that the possession of nuclear and other weapons of mass destruction offers the best protection against being attacked."

A New Nuclear Vision

Democrats and Republicans spent the past week arguing over who lost control of North Korea, Bill Clinton or George W. Bush. But seeds of the problem were planted by President Dwight D. Eisenhower, just months after the armistice ended the fighting on the Korean Peninsula in 1953.

"It is not enough to take this weapon out of the hands of soldiers," President Eisenhower told the United Nations that year, just as his administration was completing a series of 11 nuclear tests. "It must be put in the hands of those who will know how to strip its military casing and adapt it to the arts of peace."

His program was called Atoms for Peace, and soon involved dozens of nations, all seeking to unlock the magic of nuclear power. The first generation of nuclear reactors sprang up around the globe, as did a huge supporting industry and an international overseer, the I.A.E.A.

But almost from the start, evidence accumulated that countries were using the civil alliances and reactor technologies to make bombs. By 1960, France had joined the United States, Britain and the Soviet Union as a nuclear weapons state. China conducted its first test in 1964. Israel had the bomb by 1967, India by 1974, South Africa by 1982 (it has since given up its weapons) and Pakistan by 1998.

All but the original three built their weapons by exploiting at least some technologies that were ostensibly civilian, nuclear analysts say. They enriched uranium beyond the low level needed for power reactors. Or they mined the spent fuel of civil reactors for plutonium — the path that North Korea started taking in the late 1980's or early 1990's, according to American intelligence officials.

The international atomic agency, which still inscribes Atoms for Peace on its business cards, has worked hard to fight this kind of cheating while also helping with the basic technology. In the 1980's, it aided Iran's hunt for uranium.

Even today, Iranian technicians fly to Vienna and agency experts go to Iran to lend a hand. In August, two experts went to review progress at the Bushehr reactor, which is scheduled to go critical next year.

"It's helping establish that the plant is run in a safe and secure manner, which is in everybody's interest," said M. Peter Salema, an agency official. "Look at Chernobyl. That's the whole point."

Many of the agency's cooperative projects use nuclear science to humanitarian ends, like fighting disease and treating cancer. But others involve more basic atomic skills.

"We provide expert services," Dr. Salema said, "so they can learn to do things for themselves."

The Technology Boom

The Manhattan project scientists who built the first atom bomb predicted that the diffusion of their secret knowledge was inevitable. It was just a question of time. Now, after decades of scholarly digging, government declassification, open research in uranium and plutonium metallurgy and the rise of the Internet, much of that information is freely available.

"The general concepts are widely known," said Robert S. Norris, the author of "Racing for the Bomb." "Still, it's another thing to actually do it. That still requires certain skills of engineering and chemistry and physics."

The hardest part, experts agree, is not acquiring the weapons blueprints but obtaining the fuel. That is becoming easier because of developments both overt and covert.

Abdul Qadeer Khan, a chief architect of Pakistan's nuclear arms program who went on to establish the world's largest atomic black market, sold the secrets of how to make centrifuges for enriching uranium to Libya, Iran and North Korea. Tehran insists its intentions are entirely peaceful, though most analysts judge that all three countries bought from the black market because they wanted to make nuclear arms.

Dr. Khan sold plans and parts for Pakistan's first-generation centrifuge, the P-1, as well as the next generation, the P-2, which can spin faster to enrich uranium more rapidly.

Investigators are still trying to learn where else Dr. Khan may have planted his nuclear seeds. They discovered outposts of his network in Dubai, Malaysia and South Africa and found that before his downfall in 2004 he visited at least 18 countries, including Egypt, Niger, Nigeria, Sudan, Syria and Saudi Arabia.

The worrisome enrichment trends involve not just stealthy military advances but also soaring demands for nuclear power, driven by rising populations, dwindling oil supplies and fears that the combustion of fossil fuels is warming the planet.

"The nuclear renaissance is gaining momentum," said George B. Assie, vice president for business development at Cameco, the world's largest publicly traded uranium company, based in Canada.

In London, the World Nuclear Association says 28 new reactors are under construction, 62 planned, and 160 proposed, most in Asia. The required uranium, it estimates, could run to more than 65,000 tons.

While it is not clear if the expansion of the world's civilian atomic infrastructure will ultimately lead to a rise in the number of countries building nuclear arms, it could give more countries the means to do so.

There are two main ways to turn civilian technology to military use. The first is to enrich uranium fuel from its usual level of 5 percent for reactors to the 90 percent needed for a bomb, a modest step that requires longer processing in centrifuges. The second is to take spent reactor fuel and mine it for plutonium, the other main fuel for a bomb.

The Brazilian military, for example, worked hard for decades to develop centrifuges to enrich uranium fuel for a bomb, a secret program it renounced in the 1990's.

In May, Brazil, despite growing pressure to give up indigenous production, inaugurated its first uranium enrichment plant — an assembly of advanced centrifuges in Resende, in the state of Rio de Janeiro. While Iran has aroused global suspicions for erecting a similar plant, Brazil managed to reassure other nations, and the international atomic agency, that its aims are peaceful.

"We have an urgent need to expand the electric system," said Leonam dos Santos Guimarães, an official of Electronuclear, which operates nuclear power plants in Brazil.

Forecasting the size of the revitalized global industry is difficult. Even so, the predictions can be staggering. Hans-Holger Rogner, an economist at the international atomic agency, said that many forecasts for the 21st century foresaw huge expansions beyond the 443 power reactors now operating globally.

"An increase to 5,000 reactors is well within the range of many of the longer-range studies," Dr. Rogner said, adding: "People are positioning themselves. There seems to be a race coming and nobody wants to be left out."

A Complex Game

DOJ_NMG_0081811

A day after North Korea's nuclear test, Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, vowed not to abandon Japan's commitment to reject and never possess nuclear weapons, a cornerstone of Japanese foreign policy since Hiroshima and Nagasaki.

But, even so, Japan already has all the component parts. It has many tons of plutonium left over from the operation of its reactors, according to a 2004 government report to the I.A.E.A. A small nuclear warhead requires only 10 pounds.

Japan is the ultimate example of a "nuclear option" state, a country that the world knows could become an atomic power virtually overnight, if need be. "They could be very far down the road toward a virtual deterrent and not be in violation of any of the existing international treaties," said Robert L. Gallucci, the former chief American negotiator with North Korea, and now dean of Georgetown University's school of foreign service.

South Korea has also vowed not to pursue nuclear weapons. But it has an extensive network of nuclear power reactors and a few years ago, I.A.E.A. inspectors found evidence of undeclared experimentation to make highly enriched uranium. In the early 1990's, South Korea signed an agreement to keep the Korean Peninsula nuclear-free — but it signed the accord with North Korea.

Iran's nuclear rise has prompted concerns that the Middle East could experience similar pressures. In the region, only Israel is believed to possess nuclear arms, although it has never confirmed that. If Iran — a Shiite state — does indeed build nuclear weapons, there are fears that Sunni powers like Saudi Arabia or Egypt will be tempted to make their own bombs.

Egypt, which long ago sought to build nuclear arms, may be starting to rethink its earlier renunciation. The 1998 nuclear tests by India and Pakistan shook Cairo. "Egypt's leaders had placed their bet clearly in favor of the Middle East and the world moving away from nuclear weapons," said Robert J. Einhorn, a former senior State Department nonproliferation official. "But here was a disquieting indication that movement might be in the opposite direction."

Recently, the international atomic agency found that Egypt had kept some of its old and new efforts cloaked in secrecy, including a continuing project to acquire uranium ore in the Sinai desert. In September, Cairo announced plans to revive its stalled program to build reactors for generating nuclear power. It gave no sign of whether it, like Iran, planned to make reactor fuel on its own.

So the question now is whether North Korea's test, and Iran's challenge, will change the calculus. "When additional countries get the bomb, it does create new pressures," said Matthew Bunn of the Kennedy School of Government at Harvard, who tracks the spread of nuclear technology. "But each country is unique and there's little risk that the dominoes will fall quickly, especially if we take steps to prevent it."

New Ground Rules

When atomic specialists gathered in Vienna in September to discuss new ground rules for a second nuclear age, their proceedings were fueled by the fear that some of the old restraints — both technological and political — are fraying.

The central proposal debated at the I.A.E.A.'s headquarters sounded simple: No longer should nations be permitted to develop their own means of enriching uranium to make reactor fuel, which Iran and other developing states have claimed as their inalienable right under the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty. Nearly 40 years after the treaty was drafted, the dangers simply seem too great.

Instead, the argument went, nations should band together to make multinational fuel banks where they could watch one another, making sure no fuel is diverted for bomb production.

"A threat exists," said Sergei Kirienko, director of the Russian Federal Atomic Energy Agency. "We understand that only those solutions that are resolved together, that ensure access for all nations today, will be successful."

Russia took the lead, proposing an international fuel bank that it would set up on its own soil by next year — and from which it could potentially extract billions of dollars in sales. But the big splash came when Warren E. Buffett, the billionaire philanthropist, pledged $50 million for a fuel bank to be run by the I.A.E.A., making the United Nations body a "supplier of last resort" for any country that forsakes making its own fuel. The Bush administration has backed similar plans.

But while there is agreement on the problem, solutions bogged down in bickering — from weapons states that want to maintain their capacity and from developing nations that sniff a conspiracy to deny them the same nuclear rights that large powers have long enjoyed.

"We should guard against the notion that sensitive technologies are safe in the hands of some, but pose a risk when others have access to them," said Buyelwa Sonjica, the energy minister of South Africa, which wants to restart its enrichment program and build up to six reactors.

Few parties involved in the debate are optimistic about reform, and some say the enterprise is doomed to failure.

"Nuclear power is inextricably linked with nuclear proliferation," the environmental group Greenpeace said in a recent statement. "None of the schemes being promoted will solve this problem. In fact, they will make it worse."

So far, though, the countries that the world most wants to stop from enriching say they have seen no reason to do so.

DOJ_NMG_0081812

At a dinner in New York in September, President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran looked supremely confident as he batted away the idea that other countries could be relied upon to provide him with the nuclear fuel he said he needed.

"Before stopping enrichment by others, why don't you stop building the next generation of nuclear weapons?" he asked his American hosts. Then, smiling, he suggested that the United States just buy its nuclear fuel from Iran's new facilities. He would sell it to Washington, he said, "with a 50 percent discount."

A New Global Nuclear Order (LAT)

By Alissa J. Rubin

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

North Korea ... Iran ... and the list is growing. The treaty that once limited the spread of atomic weapons know-how is unraveling.

PARIS — When North Korea announced its nuclear test last week, it was just the latest sign that the effort to contain the spread of atomic weapons was breaking down: Several countries are on the verge of beginning uranium enrichment programs, and others have already started such efforts, policymakers and experts say.

Brazil recently inaugurated an industrial-scale uranium enrichment plant, and Argentina and South Africa are interested in similar projects. Australia, which has large supplies of natural uranium, is also considering an enrichment program. Iran has defied requests by the international community to suspend its program to enrich uranium, the first step toward making the fissile material suitable for a bomb.

North Korea's announcement of a test follows ones by India and Pakistan in 1998. The rise of a new generation of nuclear states has led to increasing concerns that others could follow, and fueled fears that the more countries with nuclear capability, the greater the risk that fissile material will fall into terrorist hands.

"We are, at present, at the unraveling of the nonproliferation regime and the global nuclear order that we've taken for granted," said Graham Allison, a former assistant secretary of Defense under President Clinton, who directs the Belfer Center for Science and International Affairs at Harvard University. "This is a huge event whose importance may only become evident in five years….

"In terms of global order, global nuclear order, this is a nuclear blast," he said.

On Saturday, the United Nations Security Council unanimously adopted a resolution imposing sanctions on North Korea for its declared nuclear test Monday.

But China's reluctance to take part in inspections of North Korean cargo to help stop the flow of weapons materials throws into doubt how effective the sanctions can be.

Policymakers point to three levels of problems with the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, which has been in force for 36 years: weaknesses in the treaty itself, at the political level in the Security Council, and at the technical level in the ability of nuclear inspectors to detect undisclosed nuclear programs.

Countries that had nuclear weapons when the treaty went into effect — the United States, Russia, Britain, France and China — were allowed to keep them, whereas others were asked to forswear them.

The "haves" made the commitment to reduce and eventually eliminate their arsenals, and the "have-nots" agreed not to seek atomic weapons as long as they could have the advantages of nuclear technology for peaceful purposes.

The International Atomic Energy Agency, the United Nations' nuclear watchdog, was put in charge of making sure countries refrained from taking steps toward making fissile material suitable for bombs. But the treaty, in effect, permitted any country that wanted nuclear weapons capability to go down that road.

Nuclear technology is such that once a country masters uranium enrichment, it is relatively easy to go from low-level enrichment, which produces fuel for nuclear power plants, to high-level enrichment, which produces material used for a bomb.

Although 187 countries have signed the treaty, some developing nations are skeptical of the intentions of the five original nuclear states and are reluctant to give up the option of enriching uranium, leaving the door cracked to nuclear weapons capability.

Immediately after the Cold War, the United States and Russia reduced their nuclear arsenals by thousands of weapons. Since then there has been a standstill.

There are now about 27,000 nuclear warheads worldwide — the vast majority in the U.S. and Russia. And most of the five original nuclear states have moved to modernize or, in China's case, expand their arsenals.

Countries that have pursued nuclear capability outside the treaty or by hiding their programs have, after an initial distancing by the international community, gone unpunished over the long term.

Three countries — India, Pakistan and Israel — refused to sign the treaty. Pakistan and India have developed nuclear weapons, and Israel is thought to have them.

DOJ_NMG_0081813

All three enjoy the favor and respect of world leaders, setting an example of what countries can get when they acquire nuclear weapons.

India and Pakistan, initially sanctioned over their nuclear tests, have seen the bans diminish, and India has been offered a multibillion-dollar deal with the United States that includes nuclear technology. The agreement has not been approved by the U.S. Senate.

Two other countries have refused to abide by the treaty, although they signed it: Iran and North Korea. The latter withdrew from the treaty three years ago. Neither nation has suffered significant consequences for refusing to comply.

That is because until Saturday, the five veto-wielding members of the Security Council could not agree on a punishment. At least one of the five has had national interests that superseded its intention to bring the countries to heel.

The only early-warning system to detect countries that are going down the nuclear weapons road appears unable to do its job. The International Atomic Energy Agency has failed to detect cheating by countries at an early stage in part because it lacks the authority to do necessary investigations.

It also has no enforcement power to stop what it discovers and can only report to the Security Council, which has had trouble agreeing on appropriate punishments.

"This has been an accident waiting to happen for a long time. The stresses and strains in the nonproliferation architecture have been apparent for many years," said a senior Western official from a nonnuclear weapons nation who is involved in his country's nuclear policy. "You can point the finger pretty much at anybody and they have a part in the blame."

Western countries with nuclear arsenals want to work within the system, which allows them to keep their weapons. Their policymakers insist that, overall, the system is working pretty well. They note that, under the treaty, several countries have given up nuclear weapons, including Libya, South Africa and the former Soviet republic of Kazakhstan.

"I don't agree that the problem is that there hasn't been disarmament by the nuclear weapons countries. The [treaty] is about security, and countries signed up for it because they thought their security was served by giving up nuclear weapons as long as their neighbors gave them up too," said a senior diplomat from a country with nuclear weapons.

A senior U.S. official involved in nuclear policy noted that "there are about three dozen countries that have the intellectual, technological capabilities to have and develop a nuclear weapons capability but have chosen not to. For those, such as Japan and Germany, it wouldn't take them long to make that transition, but they haven't, and the [treaty] is part of the reason."

Developing nations say they don't want to give up their rights to uranium enrichment and don't trust the United States or other nuclear countries to be consistent suppliers of the nuclear material they would need to run their power plants. Moreover, they say there is no guarantee that one of the nuclear counties won't attack them.

"There's a big credibility gap because of the double standard. You can't say, 'It's OK for you to have the weapon, but for everybody else it's wrong,' " said an ambassador to the International Atomic Energy Agency from one of the most influential of developing countries.

In the negotiations between the European Union and Iran over the Islamic Republic's uranium enrichment program, some people close to the negotiators say that unless the United States forswears efforts to change Iran's leadership, there will never be a deal.

Daniel Pinkston, a nuclear security expert at the Monterey Institute of International Studies, said the countries that had pursued nuclear weapons secretly or by refusing to sign the treaty were in tense neighborhoods — the Middle East or Asia — where they thought they could easily be attacked.

"Nuclear weapons can be attractive for the security benefits, and those might outweigh the benefits from participating in the nonproliferation regime," Pinkston said. "So unless you can resolve the security dilemma, you aren't going to resolve the problem."

The United States has helped to discourage some of its nonnuclear allies from going the weapons route by guaranteeing their security.

In Japan, where there is a political faction that would like the nation to develop atomic weapons, the majority of policymakers are willing to rely on the United States for protection. Taiwan and South Korea also fall into that category.

The problem is that once a country in a troubled area obtains nuclear weapons capability, others may get nervous, and the situation becomes hard to control.

Most worrisome to some nuclear countries and their allies is that the International Atomic Energy Agency has proved incapable of detecting transgressions by member states at an early stage.

Although Libya and South Africa gave up their nuclear weapons programs, the agency was not aware of the Libyan program until the day Moammar Kadafi announced the country was giving it up.

The Iranians had a program for 18 years that went undetected until it was disclosed by an anti-government group.

DOJ_NMG_0081814

"Countries are big — they can hide some things; they learn how to hide from other countries," said the senior U.S. official involved in nuclear policy. "And there's one thing you can't easily erase, and that's knowledge."

Who's Next To Go Nuclear? (WP)

By Andrew Grotto

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

North Korea announced its first test of a nuclear device last week, setting off hand-wringing around the world that a newly armed Pyongyang might sell nuclear weapons to rogue states or terrorists.

But another threat, more likely and more dangerous, may emerge. Pyongyang's test could encourage "near-nuclear" proliferation -- a world in which states master key technologies that are ostensibly for harmless energy-related purposes but can be quickly adapted for deadly, offensive ends.

Indeed, governments aspiring to join the small but growing club of nuclear states don't need to consider testing nukes or withdrawing from the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty. Instead, their first step could involve learning how to enrich uranium or separate plutonium; that technology can produce fuel for nuclear energy reactors -- or bombs.

Under common interpretations of the NPT, governments are allowed to acquire such technology for peaceful purposes. Once states perfect these techniques, though, they will have overcome the greatest obstacle to getting the bomb -- access to nuclear fuel.

These aren't hypotheticals: Iran has claimed that its fledgling uranium enrichment program is intended to diversify its energy supply by producing fuel for reactors. This year, Egypt and Turkey announced interest in nuclear energy as well.

A world in which countries have the capability to go nuclear on short notice is fraught with peril. Over the next decade, keep your eye on five nations in particular that may pursue that path:

JAPAN . Japan's stockpile of more than 40 tons of plutonium -- which it keeps for use in energy reactors -- is enough fuel for 3,000 to 5,000 nuclear weapons. It also has the technical capacity to produce a sophisticated nuclear arsenal on short notice that could rival the Chinese arsenal.

The Japanese public is traditionally anti-nukes, but politicians such as former prime minister Yasuhiro Nakasone have openly suggested that Japan may need to reconsider its nuclear options.

SOUTH KOREA. Since 1998, South Korea has followed a "sunshine policy" toward North Korea, emphasizing engagement over isolation. Nuclear weapons play no role in this approach. However, North Korea's test has prompted some anger in the south. Seoul's attitude toward Pyongyang may be shifting.

Seoul had a nuclear weapons program in the early 1970s, but joined the NPT in 1975. In 2004, however, South Korea admitted that it had conducted secret experiments with uranium enrichment and plutonium separation beginning in the late 1970s. Like Japan, South Korea could acquire a credible nuclear arsenal on relatively short notice.

IRAN . Flush with oil revenue, Iran has emerged as a newly assertive and ambitious player in the Middle East. If isolated and impoverished North Korea can get away with developing and testing nuclear weapons, better-positioned countries such as Iran may be emboldened to think they can, too.

EGYPT. Egypt once had a nuclear weapons program, but gave it up in the 1970s and joined the NPT. Since Iran's 1979 revolution, relations between the two countries have been strained. Iran bridles at Egypt's recognition of Israel, and is still sore about Egypt's siding with Saddam Hussein during the 1980-1988 Iran-Iraq war. Until 2004, a street in Tehran was named after the assassin of Egyptian president Anwar Sadat. Relations have improved in recent years, but suspicions still run deep.

Last month, Gamal Mubarak, son of Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and widely viewed as next in line for the presidency, suggested in a speech that Egypt pursue nuclear energy. In a thinly veiled reference to Iran, he noted that Egypt "is not the only country that is thinking about this alternative to save on energy sources."

SAUDI ARABIA. Like Egypt, Saudi Arabia regards Iran's nuclear program and growing clout with suspicion, and is also nervous about the precipitous decline in U.S. influence in the Middle East. Saudi Arabia helped finance Pakistan's nuclear program, and its leaders are rumored to have met with A.Q. Khan, the father of Pakistan's nuclear bomb and the mastermind of a global black market in nuclear technology. The Saudis couldn't develop a nuclear arsenal now, but a shortcut is possible. They could obtain a weapon from Pakistan, or invite Pakistan to station some of its weapons at Saudi bases. This could be legal under the NPT, just as the United States stations nuclear weapons at European bases.

More North Koreas? Get Used To It (LAT)

By William Langewiesche, William Langewiesche, International Correspondent For Vanity Fair, Is The Author Of "Atomic Bazaar:

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

Bad as a nuclear hermit kingdom is, the U.S. just can't control proliferation.

THERE IS NO DOUBT that the acquisition of atomic weapons by North Korea is the worst development yet in the ongoing story of nuclear proliferation by upstart states. The regime in Pyongyang is arguably the spookiest in the world today — bellicose, repressive, unstable and so mentally isolated that it sometimes appears to be outright insane. A nuclear North Korea is definitely a dangerous place; it increases the chances in Asia for all sorts of trouble and threatens to kick off a regional arms race. This needs to be acknowledged.

Nonetheless, what's done is done, and though we may protest and bluster, there is very little the U.S. can do to stop it from proceeding. Rather than making a show of our weakness, we would do well to calm down. After all, this was not unexpected; the fact is, the spread of nuclear weapons is, and always has been, inevitable.

A little perspective might help. In the months after World War II, a group of men responsible for producing the atomic bomb — including Albert Einstein, J. Robert Oppenheimer, Niels Bohr, Leo Szilard and others — created the Federation of American (Atomic) Scientists, or FAS, to educate the public about this new breed of weapon. Washington at the time harbored the illusion that it possessed a great secret and could keep the bomb for itself.

The founders of the FAS disagreed. They argued that with the destruction of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, any engineering doubts had been emphatically answered and, because the basic science of nuclear reactions was already widely known, other nations could invest in nuclear programs and be certain of the returns. There were any number of physicists and engineers worldwide capable of guiding them through the process. FAS members warned the American people in stark and simple terms. In essence, they said that the whole world would soon be nuclear-armed. There is no secret here, they said, and there is also no defense. The Nuclear Age is upon us, and it cannot be undone.

They got the timing wrong. Nuclear proliferation did proceed, but for 50 years it was slowed (and in some cases stopped) by diplomacy and, more fundamentally, by the Cold War itself, with the guarantees it offered to nonnuclear nations of surrogate nuclear strength under the U.S. and Soviet retaliatory "umbrellas."

Since then, however, the umbrellas have frayed, and the world has become a more fractured and complicated place, no longer bound by the old alliances, where independent nuclear arsenals have greater meaning than before. Paradoxically, the desire for nuclear weapons is spreading in inverse relation to the lowered risk of an all-out global nuclear war. This is a trend that began even before the fall of the Soviet Union, but it is accelerating in a world where countries must turn to themselves for protection and where the U.S., especially after the invasion of Iraq, is seen as an aggressor and a threat. For these reasons and others, new nuclear players are emerging to challenge the rules of the game.

What the new players have in common is that they are poor and undeveloped nations, with weak economies and precarious political systems. If this seems counterintuitive, consider the fact that nuclear weapons are not only simple but cheap.

Earlier this year in Moscow, a Russian nuclear official put it this way to me: "Nuclear weapons technology has become a useful tool, especially for the weak. It allows them to satisfy their ambitions without much expense. If they want to intimidate others, to be respected by others, this is now the easiest way to do it." Once a country decides to become a nuclear weapons power, he said, it will do so regardless of international sanctions or incentives.

Oppenheimer warned of this implicitly 60 years earlier. He wrote in 1945: "Atomic explosives vastly increase the power of destruction per dollar spent, per man-hour invested; they profoundly upset the precarious balance between the effort necessary to destroy, and the extent of the destruction…. None of the uncertainties can becloud the fact it will cost enormously less to destroy a square mile with atomic weapons than with any weapons hitherto known to warfare."

Oppenheimer talked about it in terms of the "evil that a dollar can do," but of course, one person's definition of evil may be another's definition of self-defense — or, more generally, a demand for equality among nations. The most succinct criticism of the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty came from the Argentines when they refused to sign it, that it amounted to "the disarmament of the disarmed."

In Islamabad, an official close to the nuclear-armed Musharraf regime said to me: "The best way to fight proliferation is to pursue global disarmament. Fine, great, sure — if you expect that to happen. But you cannot have a world order in which you have five or eight nuclear weapons states on the one hand, and the rest of the international community on the other. There are many places like Pakistan, poor countries which have legitimate security concerns — every bit as legitimate as yours. And yet you ask them to address those concerns without nuclear weapons, while you have nuclear weapons, and you have everything else? It is not a question of what is fair, or right or wrong. It is simply not going to work."

The man was right. When focused on the U.S., his point becomes an argument not for standing down from the diplomacy of nonproliferation but for finding the courage to accept the dangers of a changing world in which new countries have acquired nuclear weapons, and some may actually use them.

Has North Korea joined the ranks of nuclear powers? If so, so be it. There will be other nuclear newcomers in the decades to come. Iran will be next, but it will not be the last. Turkey, Syria and Saudi Arabia are believed to be interested and could easily proceed, depending on regional events. So could Algeria. So could Brazil and Venezuela. The future is unknowable, but there is no limit to where these weapons could spread.

The good news, however perversely, is that no nuclear-armed regime (and certainly not Iran's) is likely to be as reckless as North Korea's. In that sense, the developments in North Korea can serve as an exercise not in stopping nuclear proliferation but in learning how to live with it after it occurs. The ideal, of course, would be to desist from policies of preemptive invasion and to engage the upstart powers respectfully through economic and diplomatic ties.

If that is not feasible, however, other options exist, based on the premise that nuclear weapons are defensive in nature and that regimes even as strange as Pyongyang's are generally fairly conventional players with infrastructures at risk and subject to restraint through the guarantee of retaliatory strikes.

There is one move we can make right now that would sharply reduce, if not eliminate, another risk: that a regime like North Korea's or Iran's might hand off a functional bomb to stateless terrorists who, with nothing to lose, would have every reason to use it. We can make it emphatically clear that if we or our most important friends are ever hit by terrorists with a ready-made nuclear device, we will immediately devastate whatever regime is to blame.

Ultimately, however, it is important to recognize that the spread of nuclear weapons is a condition over which we do not have control and for which there is no solution. It does no good to bemoan the folly of it all or to belabor the fact that we are the ones who ushered in the Nuclear Age. The world is an unsafe place, and we have no choice but to live in it. Pretending otherwise, or imagining that we can impose order when we lack the power to do so, is the surest recipe for self-destruction and disaster.

Bush Unleashes The Nuclear Beast (LAT)

By Joseph Cirincione, Joseph Cirincione Is A Senior Vice President At The Center For American Progress. His New Book, "Bom

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

If the administration won't abide by time-tested nuclear treaties, why should anyone else?

IN THEIR THIRD PRESIDENTIAL DEBATE, in October 1960, John F. Kennedy went after Vice President Richard Nixon, blasting him as weak on national security for not stopping the spread of nuclear weapons. France had just tested its first nuclear device, joining the United States, the Soviet Union and Britain as the world's first nuclear powers. Kennedy warned "that 10, 15 or 20 nations will have a nuclear capacity — including Red China — by the end of the presidential office in 1964."

As president, Kennedy sought to fight that dark vision, telling the United Nations: "The weapons of war must be abolished, before they abolish us." He restarted talks on a comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty, began pursuit of a global nonproliferation pact and signed a treaty with the Soviet Union to ban atmospheric nuclear tests. Although Kennedy did not live to finish the job, in 1968, Lyndon Johnson signed what became the diplomatic crown jewel of his presidency: the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, or NPT. President Nixon secured its ratification.

The NPT is now considered one of the most successful security pacts in history. Every nation in the world is a member except Israel, India, Pakistan, and North Korea. Most of the 183 member states that do not have nuclear weapons believe what the treaty says: We should eliminate nuclear weapons.

The treaty became the hub around which liberals and conservatives built an interlocking network of agreements that deterred, though didn't altogether stop, the spread of nuclear weapons. As a result, by 2000, only three other countries — Israel, India and Pakistan — had joined the original five nuclear nations. With the success of these agreements, and the end of the Soviet-American nuclear standoff at the close of the Cold War, it seemed that the nuclear threat that had haunted the world for so many years might finally be receding.

But now, suddenly, the threat is back. In the last six years, we seem awash in nuclear threats: First it was Saddam Hussein, then North Korea and Iran. How did it happen? Is nuclear restraint dead?

At the heart of the problem is the strategy George W. Bush chose, which rejects international treaties as the solution to proliferation. He and his advisors saw these agreements as limiting U.S. flexibility and viewed the United Nations and other global gatherings as arenas where the world's Lilliputians could tie down the American Gulliver.

Bush scuttled the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, walked away from the nuclear test ban treaty secured by President Clinton, opposed efforts to enforce the treaty banning biological weapons, mocked the U.N. inspectors before the Iraq war and sent low-level officials to critical negotiations, including last year's NPT conference. The world now believes that the chief architect of the global nonproliferation system has abandoned its creation.

Instead, the administration preferred to rely on U.S. military might and technology, such as anti-missile systems, to protect the United States. Rather than negotiate treaties to eliminate weapons, it forged a strategy to eliminate the regimes that might use them against us. The Bush team felt they knew who the bad guys were, and they aimed to get them — one by one.

But the strategy has backfired. Both Iran and North Korea accelerated their programs, making more progress in the last five years than they had made in the previous 10. Now North Korea's test threatens to trigger an Asian nuclear-reaction chain that could prompt South Korea, Taiwan and even Japan to reconsider their nuclear options.

And it is not just the threats from small nations such as North Korea that could fuel a new atomic arms race. It is the continued existence of huge nuclear arsenals in the United States, Russia and other states. The importance of nuclear weapons as a cornerstone of U.S. defense had been declining since the Cold War ended. Though the U.S. never ruled out their use, Clinton and George H.W. Bush made it clear that they believed they were unusable, except perhaps in retaliation.

But the current president's policies have elevated the role of these weapons. The 2002 Nuclear Posture Review detailed plans to build new, more usable "low-yield" nuclear weapons and created missions for them. Bush decided to retain about 6,000 weapons and to research a new generation of nuclear missiles, bombers and submarines.

What's the relevance of this to proliferation? Simple. U.S. intelligence officials concluded as early as 1958 that other nations' nuclear appetites could not be curbed without limiting the superpowers' stockpiles. That judgment was confirmed by subsequent administrations.

As the superpowers cut their weapons from a Cold War high of 65,000 in 1986 to about 27,000 today, other countries took note. In the 1960s, 23 countries had nuclear programs, including Australia, Canada, Egypt, Japan, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland and West Germany. Most ended any weapons programs. Brazil and Argentina stopped research in the 1980s, and South Africa, Belarus, Kazakhstan and Ukraine gave up their bombs in the 1990s.

We now know that U.N. inspectors ended Iraq's nuclear program in 1991. In 2003, Libya abandoned its secret program. Until last week, no nation had tested a nuclear weapon for eight years — the longest period in the Atomic Age. The outrage that greeted the North Korean test shows how strong anti-nuclear sentiment has become.

Many political and military leaders recognize the limited military utility of weapons whose use would kill thousands of innocent civilians. Rep. David L. Hobson (R-Ohio), a solid Midwest conservative, led the effort last year to kill the administration's proposed "nuclear bunker buster," a new weapon designed to go after conventional targets. Former Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara advocates greatly reducing the U.S. and Russian arsenals and then working to eliminate them completely, just as countries have done with chemical and biological weapons. Even former Bush advisor Richard Perle has said the U.S. could cut to well below 1,000 warheads. "The truth is we are never going to use them," Perle said. "The Russians aren't going to use theirs either."

By clinging to our own nuclear arsenal, and touting the importance of these weapons to our own security, the Bush administration has sent the world a schizoid message: Nuclear weapons are very, very important and useful — but you cannot have them. This double standard is impossible to maintain.

Last year, International Atomic Energy Agency Director Mohamed ElBaradei said that until the world was committed to eradicating nuclear weapons, "we will continue to have this cynical environment that all the guys in the minor leagues will try to join the major leagues…. They will say, 'If the big boys continue to rely on nuclear weapons, why shouldn't I?' "

Bush administration officials have proved expert at smashing the agreements their predecessors so painstakingly built, but in doing so they broke the bars that had caged the nuclear beast. Those who will have to repair the damage would do well to look back at the handiwork of the past. They might learn a thing or two.

Will Nukes March Across Asia? (NSL)

By Michael Moran

Newark Star-Ledger (NJ), October 15, 2006

Since the very early years of the Cold War, two of Asia's most im portant and progressive countries Japan and South Korea have predicated most of their defense and foreign policy decisions on the assumption they would be protected, in the final analysis, by America's nuclear umbrella.

To an even greater extent than Western Europe, where Britain and France insisted on their own small nuclear deterrent forces in spite of America's guarantee, these two sophisticated Asian economic powers agreed to forswear nuclear weapons altogether. For decades, that contributed not only to the stability of Asia, but also to America's relative leverage in the region. With the decision of North Korea to test a nuclear weapon, those days may now be numbered.

The early results of North Korea's Oct. 9 nuclear tests may, ironically, work against the Stalinist re gime in Pyongyang, convincing South Korea and China, for instance, to drop the petty historical dispute that has prevented them from uniting against a mutually perceived threat to peace in their backyard. Japan's new prime minister, Shinzo Abe, in fact broke a five-year moratorium on meetings with the South Korean and Chinese leaders the very week the North chose to gatecrash the nuclear club. There is hope in Washington of finally convincing key players -- and especially China, which alone has real leverage on the North -- to slap the kind of political and economic sanctions on the regime that force it to heed world opinion.

In the longer term, however, the North Korean test could prove an important nail in the coffin of America's five-decade dominance of Asian security issues. The nuclear test shakes Japanese and South Korean faith, which has already eroded over the past several years, in the basic Cold War bargain and will transform their atti tudes about their own security.

As a South Korean diplomat at the United Nations put it to me last year, "Much of our thinking for the past two decades, and in Japan, too, I would say, has been based on the idea that we are under the U.S. nuclear umbrella. If the U.S. cannot prevent North Korea from testing a nuclear weapon, how can it deter North Korea from using one? That's the basic question being asked today."

So far, the reaction of North Korea's Asian neighbors has been moderate: careful condemnations, calls for sanctions, pledges to work for a peaceful solution, etc. This certainly is a far cry from Pakistan's tit-for-tat, nuke-for-nuke response to India's 1998 nuclear test. But those who make a living tracking proliferation threats remain concerned. Both South Korea and Japan are signatories of the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty, the treaty North Korea renounced in 2003 before its final push for nuclear weaponry began. Yet, of all the non-nuclear states that have pondered, secretly or openly, the wisdom of going nuclear, none is more capable of fielding an actual arsenal as quickly and completely as Japan and South Korea are.

As the only nation ever to suffer a nuclear attack, Japan has repeatedly vowed in the years since 1945 to never "develop, use, or allow the transportation of nuclear weapons through its territory." It later emerged Japan had, in fact, studied the idea during the 1960s. By and large, however, Japan has been true to its word. Yet Japan, more vulnerable than any other major industrial nation to oil crises, also developed a civilian nuclear power in dustry larger than any outside France and the United States. This expanding network of nuclear plants, which Japan hopes will produce over 40 percent of national electricity needs by 2010, also produced spent plutonium at levels which alarm nonproliferation ex perts. While this is not "bomb- grade" plutonium in the strictest sense, experts believe Japan could quickly field an arsenal if it so chose. Michael Levi, an expert in arms control and proliferation at the Council on Foreign Relations, says Japan could nuclearize its military "in a matter of months, if not sooner." This has led some to deem Japan a "paranuclear" state.

Such thoughts would have been quickly dismissed a decade ago given the lingering taboo and trauma caused by the Hiroshima and Nagasaki bombings. In recent years, however, particularly since North Korea test-fired a missile in 1998 that crossed Japanese territory before splashing into the Pacific Ocean, some politicians have called for a rethinking of the pacifism imposed on Japan by the United States after World War II. Yasuhiro Nakasone, a former prime minister, told a reporter last month Japan needed "to study the issue of nuclear weapons." Japan's new prime minister, before winning power, expressed the opinion that nothing in the country's constitution specifically forbids development of a nuclear deterrent. Abe has been careful since the North Korean test to say Japan is not planning to go nuclear. But he clearly is aligned with those who feel a nuclear arsenal to be on the table for study.

As with Japan, South Korea's sophisticated domestic nuclear power industry is poised to nuclearize if it so chooses. From the 1950s until the late 1980s, in South Korea's official accounts, Seoul pursued a nuclear weapons program as vigorously as its communist archrival to the north. In fact, International Atomic Energy Agency inspectors who visited South Korea in 2003 discovered research on enriching plutonium continued until at least 2000. While the IAEA found no evidence of any military motive, it was a reminder of how little we may actually know about such activity there and elsewhere.

Ever since Amy Carter raised the issue with her presidential daddy in the late 1970s, nuclear nonproliferation has loomed like Oz in the thoughts of diplomats and policymakers -- particularly those in the nations which made up the relatively stable Cold War- era "nuclear club," the U.S., Russia (then the Soviet Union), France, Britain, China, and, with a wink and a nod because they have nukes but won't publicly admit it, Israel. Like Oz, though, the concept of nonproliferation always looked bet ter from afar.

The closer any nation came to completing the nuclear fuel cycle, the more clearly futile efforts to prevent the next step turned out. In the end, those which came close and decided against actually test ing and fielding nuclear arms -- South Africa, Brazil, Argentina, for instance -- shied away for reasons of national interest, the strain on their scientific infrastructure, or the pure financial burden. Even Libya, which renounced its own nuclear designs in 2003, had little to show for its efforts and much to gain from dropping them.

Japan and South Korea cer tainly have the scientific prowess and financial ability to move in this direction, and no one, not even in Washington, contends they are wrong to feel threatened. Like China, India, Pakistan, and now North Korea, all of whom blasted their way into the nuclear club in past decades, these two economically minded powers may eventu ally find the benefits outweigh the slap on the hand such actions brought to previous gatecrashers. Until someone proves the consequences to be more serious than that, the temptation of going nuclear, and of having a permanent seat at the world's big table as a re sult, may prove too much to resist.

Michael Moran is executive editor of CFR.org, the Web site of the Council on Foreign Relations in New York.

Nukes And More Nukes (WP)

The Washington Post, October 15, 2006

Proliferation will continue as long as Russia and China treat it as a secondary priority.

THE MOST critical question following North Korea's reported nuclear test is whether anything can be done to stop other states or terrorist groups from acquiring such weapons in coming years. Can North Korea be prevented from exporting its nukes? Is the world entering an era in which nuclear war will be virtually inevitable? Based on the response to North Korea last week, the outlook isn't good.

Weaker countries, such as Libya, can still be bribed or bluffed into giving up a weapons program that hasn't advanced very far. A new international protocol on the production of nuclear materials is a possibility worth pursuing. But states such as North Korea and Iran can be stopped only if a powerful coalition of countries emerges against them, combining the United States and Europe with Russia, China and regional powers.

The five countries that have tried to bargain with North Korea over its nuclear program -- China, South Korea, Russia, Japan and the United States -- could have stopped the North Korean program and could reverse it still: Among them they have the capacity to force the collapse of the Kim Jong Il dictatorship. A similar coalition probably could stop Iran. But to do so, nuclear counterproliferation has to become those governments' highest priority. They have to be willing to make sacrifices and take risks.

As the diplomacy at the United Nations last week once again demonstrated, neither China nor Russia regard stopping the spread of nuclear weapons as essential. Both voted yesterday in support of a resolution imposing sanctions on North Korea, and talks will begin this week on a sanctions resolution aimed at Iran. But both Beijing and Moscow have worked to water down the measures, narrowing the list of sanctions and eliminating references to force. In doing so they have illuminated the priorities that for them matter more than limiting the spread of nuclear weapons.

China, though angry at North Korea, still finds it more important to preserve Mr. Kim's regime than to disarm it. Chinese officials reasonably worry about a destabilizing flood of refugees in the event the Kim dictatorship collapses. More cynically, they continue to see the regime as a means of containing U.S. influence in Asia. Beijing's view of Iran is similarly instrumental: It is a valuable source of energy and a check on the United States.

Russia is even less responsible as a partner in counterproliferation. The government of Vladimir Putin seems to have returned to the Soviet view of international relations as a zero-sum game with the United States. Any gain for U.S. policy is to be resisted or balanced with a concession in return.

So Russia agreed Thursday to support the U.N. sanctions resolution on North Korea -- but only after extracting U.S. agreement to another Security Council resolution about its neighbor, Georgia. The resolution extended the mandate of U.N. observers -- and legitimized the continued presence of Russian troops -- in two breakaway regions of Georgia and referred to "militant rhetoric and provocative actions" by Georgia's pro-Western democratic government.

In fact, it is Mr. Putin who is engaged in a militant and provocative campaign against his tiny neighbor: He has banned trade, closed transportation links and cracked down on Georgian-owned businesses in Moscow. He's willing to make a gesture toward preventing a world that bristles with nuclear weapons, but only if he can get some help in his attempt to crush a government that resists Russia's neo-imperialism. If such politics continue to underlie counterproliferation, we can expect a much more dangerous world.

Tehran Revives Nuclear Proposal (WT)

The Washington Times, October 15, 2006

TEHRAN (Agence France-Presse) -- Iran said yesterday a year-old offer from President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for foreign countries to handle its uranium enrichment activities still stands as a way to break the deadlock over its nuclear program.

Foreign ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini also said a suggestion made by Iran earlier this month for a French-led consortium to enrich uranium for Iran on Iranian soil remained "appropriate."

The spokesman made his comments as the five U.N. Security Council permanent members plus Germany discuss imposing sanctions against Iran over its failure to halt enrichment, a process the West fears could be diverted to making a nuclear bomb.

DOJ_NMG_0081820

"Mr. Ahmadinejad in his speech last year to the U.N. General Assembly proposed that other countries participate in the uranium enrichment and this proposal still stands," Mr. Hosseini said, according to the Web site of state broadcaster IRIB.

"We have received proposals from partners, but the final decision has not been made yet," he said later in an interview with state television. He did not specify who the partners were.

Mr. Ahmadinejad had proposed in his 2005 U.N. speech to "engage in serious partnership with private and public sectors of other countries in the implementation of the uranium enrichment program in Iran."

His proposal was revived earlier this month when a top Iranian nuclear official said France should form a consortium that would manufacture uranium on Iranian soil and thus break the deadlock. However, on both occasions his idea was met with a cool reception from Western powers, who object to enrichment done in Iran. Enriched uranium can be used to power nuclear reactors or atomic bombs.

"The Iranian nation is not scared of possible sanctions and is determined to go on its way to the peaceful use of nuclear energy," Mr. Hosseini said.

Germany: No Prospect Of Talks With Iran (AP-Y)

By Geir Moulson, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 15, 2006

Germany's foreign minister on Saturday said there is currently no prospect of successful nuclear talks with Iran but that pressure on the country would be applied gradually, leaving the door open to future negotiations.

Repeated attempts by the U.N. Security Council's five permanent members and Germany to entice Iran into negotiations on its nuclear program foundered earlier this month over Tehran's refusal to give up uranium enrichment.

The six powers have agreed to start working on U.N. sanctions against Iran next week, diplomats and officials have said, but still have to bridge differences on how harsh the penalties should be.

Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier gave no details of sanctions that might be taken against Tehran. However, he noted that a package of incentives aimed at persuading Iran to halt uranium enrichment is still being offered.

"We do not at the moment have a situation in which negotiations can be held with prospects of success, so the Security Council must take up its efforts" to work toward possible sanctions, Steinmeier said on Inforadio.

"But we have made equally clear that our offer for cooperation with Iran remains on the table," Steinmeier said. "That means we are ready to return to the negotiating table any time if Iran declares its readiness to recognize the conditions for negotiations," he said.

"Iran must understand that, if we negotiate, the building of further centrifuges must stop," he said.

Steinmeier said the six powers had talked about a "catalog of possible sanctions" in the summer but did not elaborate on what measures might be applied.

"We agreed that not all possibilities should be used immediately, but that we naturally seek a process in which, as far as it is necessary, pressure against Iran can be increased slowly," he added.

"The Security Council members will calculate sanctions with responsibility (in mind) for this route back to the negotiating table and the fact that it remains open, and I am relatively sure that we will reach an agreement," Steinmeier said.

Iran on Saturday called threats of sanctions "psychological warfare" and said it would not be intimidated.

Foreign Ministry spokesman Mohammad Ali Hosseini repeated his country's pledge to continue pursuing its nuclear program, according to a state-run television report on its English Web site.

While the United States favors a tough line on Iran, Russia and China have advocated less severe measures. Steinmeier argued, however, that both countries have reason to feel angered by Iran's brusque rejection in the past of proposed compromises.

"The Iranian leadership should not count on the economic interests that both states certainly have automatically determining the position of their governments toward the Iranian nuclear conflict," he said.

Uranium enriched to low levels is used to produce nuclear fuel. It can be used to develop nuclear weapons if enriched at higher levels.

Though Iran contends its nuclear program is for generating electricity, the U.S. and some of its allies allege it is trying to develop atomic weapons.

Israel Steps Up Attacks To Halt Palestinian Rockets (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0081821

JERUSALEM, Oct. 14 — The Israeli military killed seven Palestinian militants in fighting Saturday as tanks and other armored vehicles rolled into areas east of Gaza City in a stepped-up effort to halt Palestinian rocket fire.

Backed by helicopters and pilotless planes, Israeli troops have staged ground operations in eastern Gaza in the last three days, killing 20 Palestinians and wounding about 30. Most of the dead were Hamas militants who were targets of airstrikes, but several civilians also died.

The incursion appears to be yet another in a series of periodic escalations since an Israeli soldier was seized on June 25 and Israeli forces, which withdrew from the territory last year, moved back into Gaza.

The Israelis have concentrated their forces in open areas in the southeast corner of Gaza over the last several months. They have carried out frequent offensives, and since Thursday have been moving into more populated areas, looking for smuggling tunnels and trying to stop the rocket fire, the military says.

In recent weeks, Israeli political and security officials warned that they were prepared to respond more aggressively to the continuing Palestinian rocket fire out of Gaza. Israeli radio reported Saturday that Defense Minister Amir Peretz had given the go-ahead for broader operations, but provided no additional details.

Palestinian militants have been firing rockets from Gaza into southern Israel for more than five years, and the attacks continued after the Israeli withdrawal last year. The rockets have caused damage and injuries in many instances, though deaths have been rare.

Ghazi Hamad, a spokesman for the Palestinian Authority government, accused Israel on Saturday of "going ahead with evil plans for a bloody military escalation and seeking the highest possible Palestinian losses."

The latest incursion started after Palestinian militants fired three rockets from northeastern Gaza Friday night and lightly wounded three Israelis in the town of Sderot, which is just beyond Gaza's perimeter fence.

Shortly afterward, more than a dozen Israeli armored vehicles charged into the areas where the rockets had been launched, and ground clashes erupted. The Israeli forces came under fire from automatic rifles and at least one antitank missile, the military said.

An Israeli airstrike killed four Hamas militants taking cover in a house, according to the military and Palestinian medical workers. Two more Hamas gunmen were killed in the clashes, and several Palestinians were wounded.

The Israeli Air Force also bombed a house in the southern Gaza town of Rafah that concealed a smuggling tunnel, the military said. The military called residents and told them to evacuate before the strike, and no casualties were reported.

On Saturday afternoon, an Israeli airstrike on a vehicle in Gaza City killed one militant from Al Aksa Martyrs Brigades and wounded three more from the group, according to the military and Palestinian medical workers.

On Thursday and Friday, Israeli troops searched for tunnels and battled Palestinian militants in and around the village of Abassan, in southeastern Gaza, but the forces pulled back overnight, the military said Saturday.

Since the Israeli soldier was seized nearly four months ago, the Israelis have kept the Gaza crossing points into Egypt and Israel closed most of the time. Food, medicine, fuel and other essential supplies are allowed into Gaza, but few Palestinians are allowed in or out of the coastal territory to sell goods or do other business and the already feeble economy has largely ground to a halt.

Israel is demanding the release of the soldier, Cpl. Gilad Shalit; the Palestinians are seeking an exchange that would include freedom for a large number of Palestinian prisoners held by Israel.

The two main Palestinian factions, Hamas and Fatah, are deadlocked in their efforts to form a national unity government. Ahmed Yousef, a top adviser to the Palestinian prime minister, Ismail Haniya of Hamas, called for neighboring Egypt to renew its mediation efforts.

Sudan's Government Signs Peace Accord With Rebel Group In East (NYT)

By Jeffrey Gettleman

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

KHARTOUM, Sudan, Oct. 14 — The Sudanese government signed a peace deal on Saturday with a small rebel movement in the eastern part of the country, an agreement intended to end fighting that has lasted 10 years though with nowhere near the intensity of the conflict in Darfur.

According to state-run news media, Mustafa Osman Ismail, a government negotiator, and Mussa Mohammed Ahmed, chief of the Eastern Front, signed the deal at the presidential palace in Asmara, Eritrea.

According to Agence France-Presse, Sudan's president, Omar Hassan al-Bashir, called it an example of "Africans solving an African problem without foreign help," a clear reference to his government's continuing refusal to allow United Nations peacekeepers into Darfur.

DOJ_NMG_0081822

The rebels in eastern Sudan never posed the threat to the military dictatorship that Darfur's insurgents have, though they conducted hit-and-run guerrilla attacks on government forces for some of the same reasons. Eastern Sudan, like Darfur, is a poor, neglected area where many people feel disenfranchised.

Under the accord, the Eastern Front will get more representation in the national and regional administrations, including high-ranking posts in Khartoum, the capital.

The Darfur crisis, meanwhile, continues, with more fighting in El Fasher, one of Darfur's bigger towns, and reported clashes along Sudan's lawless border with Chad.

President Bush's special envoy for Sudan, Andrew S. Natsios, arrived in Khartoum on Friday night to begin meetings with top Sudanese officials. Few here expect President Bashir to back down from his refusal to allow United Nations peacekeepers to patrol Darfur.

Darfur is patrolled by African Union peacekeepers who are underfinanced and have failed so far to stop the bloodshed. The African Union has agreed to keep its peacekeepers through the end of the year in the hope that a bigger and better-equipped United Nations force will replace them.

Sudan, Eastern Rebels Sign Peace Deal (AP)

By Mohamed Osman

AP, October 15, 2006

The Sudanese government signed a peace deal Saturday with a group of rebels from eastern Sudan, ending a deadly strife that has been overshadowed by the conflict in the country's western Darfur region.

The Eastern Rebel Front has fought an intermittent war with the Sudanese government for 10 years. The signing of the agreement is considered a relief to Khartoum, which has been struggling to put down rebellions on both sides of the country, as well as to keep a shaky peace after a civil war with the south.

The conflict in Sudan's east bore some similarities to the more publicized strife in Darfur. In 2005, the U.N. World Food Program said the malnutrition rate in the east had grown worse than in Darfur.

On Saturday, Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir reiterated his opposition to allowing U.N. peacekeepers in Darfur.

The U.N. wants to send 20,000 U.N. troops to Darfur to replace an ill-equipped and understaffed African Union force that has not been able to quell the violence. More than 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million have been displaced since rebel groups rose up against the Khartoum government in early 2003.

Sudan "will never be the first African country to allow re-colonization of the continent to begin on its soil," al-Bashir said in the capital of neighboring Eritrea, Asmara, where the peace deal was signed. "But we are for a United Nations role that would provide logistical and material assistance to the African Union to carry out its role."

Al-Bashir and First Vice President Salva Kiir had traveled Eritrea to sign the deal with leaders of the Eastern Rebel Front under supervision of Eritrea's government.

Al-Bashir promised Saturday that all the money that was being spent on war will be paid for development.

The final peace deal was set to call for a cease-fire, the lifting of a state of emergency in Sudan's east and the deployment of Sudanese forces to the region, according to the official Sudanese news agency, SUNA.

Some $600 million also would be allocated to health and water programs in the area over the next five years, SUNA reported.

The Eastern Rebel Front has claimed responsibility for a number of attacks on Sudan's infrastructure, including an oil pipeline, and has ambushed cargo convoys and passenger buses. It also has threatened a vital road linking Khartoum with the country's main seaport on the Red Sea in eastern Sudan.

Some Darfur rebels also have fought in the east, and Eritrea has a history of supporting both the eastern and western Darfurian rebels.

In Somalia, Islamic Law Is Far From Uniform (LAT)

By Edmund Sanders

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

'They don't all have the same vision,' an official says of the courts that control the south.

MOGADISHU, Somalia — The public execution was set for 9 a.m., and thousands of men, women and children raced toward a sandy dune where the previous regime killed its political enemies.

A man accused of fatally shooting a Mogadishu businessman in a dispute over a cellphone two weeks earlier knelt and prayed in front of an eight-man firing squad, as impatient spectators whistled, hooted, stood on cars and scrambled up trees for a better view. The death sentence had been imposed swiftly by a local Islamic court. No attorney. No appeal.

DOJ_NMG_0081823

The first blast of gunfire didn't do the job, so an officer stepped forward and shot the accused in the head. Then the crowd broke through security lines and rushed toward the body, many yelling, "Allahu akbar!" or "God is great!"

Four months after they seized control of Somalia's capital, Islamists have won widespread praise for reestablishing order and stability in Mogadishu and surrounding areas after 15 years of anarchy.

But the Islamists are by no means uniform in their application of justice. In Islamist-run southern Somalia, how you live, and sometimes whether you live, depends largely on where you live.

In one Mogadishu neighborhood, court officials banned cinemas and satellite television as immoral, and have punished criminals with public lashings and executions, such as the one last month.

Under a different court less than a mile away, residents can view pornographic films at night and are free to watch CNN and Hollywood movies. Islamic leaders there have no stomach for public punishment, instead sentencing criminals to prison.

"They don't all have the same vision," said Mogadishu Mayor Mohamed Hassan Ali, who was appointed by Somalia's U.N.-backed transitional government but has struggled for authority under the Islamists. "They don't even know each other that well. Now they're trying to set an agenda, and it's creating some culture shock."

After their surprising victory over U.S.-backed warlords in June, the Islamic Courts Union reopened the airport and seaport, dispatched uniformed security officers who won't take bribes, and reintroduced consumer protection laws, such as halting the import of spoiled food, which unscrupulous businessmen had been dumping in Somalia for years.

But a clash of ideologies has emerged between leaders of the Islamist union and nearly three dozen smaller, semiautonomous courts that function as local governments throughout southern Somalia. These clan-based courts, some of which have their own militias, sometimes pursue distinct and competing interpretations of Islamic law.

On big issues, such as opposition to bringing foreign peacekeepers to Somalia and strategies to reach a power-sharing agreement with the transitional government based in Baidoa, the Islamists show few signs of discord. Most also support, in theory, the installation of an Islamic-based government.

But as Somalis begin debating how to implement such a system, cracks are beginning to show.

In Jawhar, north of Mogadishu, the local court last month banned love songs and Western music on the radio, though such fare still plays in the capital.

After an Italian nun and her bodyguard were shot to death in Mogadishu on Sept. 17, moderate court leaders accused a group of young fundamentalist fighters, known as Shabbab, of shielding one of the killers. The court leaders threatened to break from the union if the suspect was not handed over, two court sources said.

In an interview at his modest home in Mogadishu, with laundry hanging across the courtyard and children playing, Islamic Courts Union leader Sheik Hassan Dahir Aweys insisted that differences within the movement were minor.

"There may be some division," he said. "But there is no challenge to the authority and administration of the court. Our ideology is one." He denied any internal friction over the case of the nun's slaying.

Aweys heads the 91-person shura, a de facto parliament that includes representatives of various factions and clans. He shares power with Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, a former teacher who serves in a presidential role for the union. Ahmed is thought to represent the moderate side of the courts, though he has rarely differed from the more hard-line Aweys in public.

Both men said the disputes were being magnified by outsiders, including the Bush administration and Ethiopian government, who Aweys said were plotting to "divide and conquer" the fledgling alliance.

"The U.S. government accuses anyone who disagrees with it of being a terrorist, especially when they see a Muslim who wants to form an Islamic government," Aweys said.

Ibrahim Hassan Addou, who serves as foreign minister for the union, expressed disappointment that the more extreme actions by lower courts seemed to get the most attention in the news media.

"It seems that the extremists here are getting the focus and overshadowing us," said Addou, who worked as an administrator at American University in Washington before returning to Somalia in 1999. "We're wasting our time and resources closing movies and things like this. Minor things like this have to wait."

Islamic leaders said they planned to disband the local courts and replace them with one body that would provide consistency throughout Islamist-controlled regions.

"There are mistakes being made by individuals who lack experience," Addou said. "These decisions should be made by scholars and the shura council."

In recent weeks the shura has attempted to reverse or rein in lower court actions, issuing edicts such as a ban on attacks against foreigners or civil society groups. The council chastised one lower court for seizing control of a former police station, and it apologized to the families of some World Cup fans who were killed by local militiamen.

But to avoid alienating either side, Islamist leaders have skirted thorny issues, such as cinema and radio closures, leaving lower courts free to continue issuing and enforcing religious rulings as long as they don't conflict with the council.

"As a court we are free to make our own decisions," said Sheik Hussein Omar Hussein, a former tea seller who is chairman of one of Mogadishu's new lower courts in Hamarweyne district.

His recent rulings included a ban on cinemas and satellite television in public places. For a young woman accused of selling marijuana, he ordered 40 lashes in a public square.

North of the city is a court leader with a far different view of justice. Mahad Mohammed, chairman of Wanlaweyn court, studied economics in Pakistan and returned several months ago to pursue a career in politics.

He said he supported an Islamic government for Somalia, but believed there was room for interpretation.

He said he enjoyed music and movies. When faced recently with a man accused of theft, he said, he couldn't bring himself to order the man's hand amputated, as prescribed by some Islamic law. Instead he tossed the thief in jail.

"We can be flexible," Mohammed said.

But Aweys believes there is no room for compromise under Islam.

When asked what sort of model he would use to govern Somalia, Aweys said he would turn back to the 7th century. "Our model is to go back to the government during the life of the prophet Muhammad," he said.

To him, that includes amputating limbs of robbers, executing killers in public and stoning adulterers to death — a far more conservative vision of Islam than has ever been practiced in Somalia.

Nevertheless, support for the courts union remains high on the streets of Mogadishu. Many residents say they are willing to tolerate some limits on their freedom of expression in exchange for peace and normality.

But there is growing anxiety over how far it will go.

"They've done so much for Mogadishu, no question," said businessman Said Abdi Elye, who returned three years ago from Fairfax, Va. "The real question now is: Where are they taking us?"

Looking For Islam's Luthers (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

Islam sometimes comes across the airwaves in the West as the faith of medieval fanatics wielding swords and wearing explosive vests. Western doubts are bolstered when the pope accuses Islam of violence and fundamentalists protest by killing a nun.

But the public images of Islam we sometimes see — the violence in the name of God, the intolerance, the obsession with the past — represent only some stones in a complex mosaic. And those images can't explain why Islam appears to be in percentage terms the fastest-growing major religion in the world today.

Islam is on the rise for many of the same reasons evangelical Christianity is surging: they provide a firm moral code, spiritual reassurance and orderliness to people vexed by chaos and immorality around them, and they offer dignity to the poor.

While the thread of fundamentalism is real in Islam, so is the thread of reform. The 21st century may become to Islam what the 16th was to Christianity, for even in hard-line states like Iran you meet Martin Luthers who are pushing for an Islamic Reformation. One of the most surprising elements of this push for reform has to do with the emergence of a school called "feminist Islam."

I've written often about the honor killings and other abuses suffered by women and girls in some Muslim countries, and many Westerners think Islam is inherently misogynistic. But Muslim women themselves naturally resent that kind of Western paternalism, for they want opportunities and equality — and yet they frequently don't want to discard their faith (or even their head scarves).

"Yes, sexism exists in our culture, but that is not due to Islam," says Rima Khoreibi, an author from Dubai who wrote a children's book about an Islamic superhero who is female — Iman, a teenage girl with a cape, head scarf and deep religious convictions. That book, "The Adventures of Iman" (www.theadventuresofiman.com), was so successful that she is publishing a sequel in December.

Ms. Khoreibi says that she wrote "The Adventures of Iman" because of her "passion to promote Islamic feminism." She cites Koranic verses that promote gender equality and call for treating sons and daughters equally.

A Koran-quoting female caped crusader is part of a broad ferment for more gender equality in the Muslim world. Islamic feminists often argue that the Koran generally raised the status of women compared to earlier Arabian society — banning female infanticide, for example, and limiting polygamy — and that what is needed today is that larger spirit of progress and enlightenment rather than precise seventh-century formulations that would freeze human society.

Often the battles are over Koranic verses. For example, some note that the Koran permitted up to four wives as a way to care for orphans after wars that had left many women widowed. So they turn the verse on its head and say that in today's world where that situation doesn't apply, the Koran actually bars polygamy.

DOJ_NMG_0081825

Likewise, Saudi women sometimes argue that since the Prophet Muhammad's wife drove camels, they should be able to drive cars.

"Islam, like any religion, is subject to interpretation," Shirin Ebadi, the Nobel Peace Prize laureate from Iran, writes in her autobiography. "It can be interpreted to oppress women or to liberate them."

Female Muslim scholars like Fatima Mernissi of Morocco have also turned up evidence that Prophet Muhammad's youngest wife (and the person he said he loved most in the world), Aisha, vigorously contested the chauvinism of early clerics. Indeed, she sometimes comes across as the first Islamic feminist.

A well-known statement once attributed to Prophet Muhammad says that a man's prayers are ineffective if a woman, dog or donkey passes in front of the believer. Aisha denounced that as nonsense: "You compare us now to donkeys and dogs. In the name of God, I have seen the Prophet saying his prayers while I was there."

Likewise, Aisha denied various suggestions that her husband considered menstruating women to be unclean.

Aisha had prepared a series of corrections to early Islamic writings, but these have been largely ignored. Finally, these days, they are beginning to get a hearing.

All this underscores that Islam is much more complex than the headlines might suggest. The violence and fundamentalism gets the attention — and should be more loudly condemned by ordinary Muslims — but we would be close-minded ourselves if we ignored the more hopeful rumblings that are also taking place within the vast Islamic world ... including, perhaps, steps toward a Muslim Reformation.

Chavez Spreads Wealth To Aid U.N. Cause (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

MONTEVIDEO, Uruguay (AP) -- As Venezuela lobbies for a U.N. Security Council seat, President Hugo Chavez has bolstered its chances by spreading petrodollars across the Americas and beyond -- extending an airstrip on a Caribbean island, sending emergency food aid to Africa, fixing a rundown hospital in Uruguay.

Chavez's international support will be put to the test on Monday as Venezuela goes up against U.S.-backed Guatemala in a General Assembly vote. At the same time, Chavez is confronting accusations at home that his generosity has been excessive, and has argued it's a modest amount of aid for nations he sees as suffering from U.S. domination.

At Uruguay's Hospital de Clinicas, a state-of-the-art transplant unit is being built with Venezuelan money. The emergency ward's leaky roof and exposed cinderblocks have given way to freshly painted walls, windows in rust-corroded frames are being replaced, and new elevators are on order.

Hospital director Graciela Ubach put a hand over her heart to show her gratitude to Chavez.

"I thank him with my soul," she said. "Honestly, it's been a dream for the country."

The public hospital struggled for funding for years until Venezuela came through with $20 million -- half in donations and the other half to be paid off in reciprocal training and other services.

Other Chavez pledges include: $260 million in financing to repave a Jamaican highway and $17 million in upgrades to airports on the Caribbean islands of Antigua and Dominica.

Chavez also came up with $5 million for an Uruguayan tire plant, glass business and leather factory as part of a $400 million flow of aid since March 2005, when Uruguay's leftist President Tabare Vazquez took office, according to the Venezuelan Embassy in Uruguay.

According to the U.S. State Department, which tracks the bulk of foreign aid, $3.3 billion was allocated in financial and development aid to Latin America and the Caribbean for all of 2005 and 2006, including military and anti-narcotics programs. Other estimates, which include aid not tallied by the State Department, put that figure closer to $4 billion.

A consolidated figure for Venezuelan aid is harder to come by, but a review of public pledges by its government suggest Venezuela, with an economy one-ninetieth the size of America's, has offered at least $1.1 billion since the beginning of 2005 in loans, donations and financial aid in the region.

U.S. aid to Jamaica for 2005-2006 is listed as $42 million; the Chavez-financed highway job is six times costlier. The Venezuelan figure of $400 million for Uruguay compares with U.S. aid of $49,000 through the State Department plus an estimated $800,000 in military education and counter-drug assistance. No U.S. money was specifically set aside for Dominica.

In the case of Bolivia, the State Department estimates about $117 million in aid for 2006 compared with $140 million in Venezuelan donations and loans for scholarships and other programs.

Some of the aid involves relatively small sums aimed at highly symbolic targets, such as the tire-making cooperative in Montevideo that was abandoned three years ago by a U.S. company which ran into economic troubles. The factory was restarted with money from Chavez.

DOJ_NMG_0081826

"The Venezuela government has given us a big hand," said worker Wilson Tolotti, 57. "We will always be grateful."

Venezuelan bulldozers have already begun clearing land at Dominica's Melville Hall Airport for a longer runway to boost tourism. Under Petrocaribe, a deal bringing Venezuelan oil to needy Caribbean countries, the island has received asphalt, fuel storage tanks, university scholarships and $12 million for housing.

Dominica has supported Venezuela's U.N. bid despite lobbying by Guatemala, and its foreign minister, Charles Savarin, has acknowledged that Venezuela's aid "cannot go unnoticed" as a factor in the decision.

Both Venezuela and Guatemala say they have a majority in the 192-member General Assembly ahead of Monday's poll, but either would need two-thirds to win. If after repeated ballots neither side is able to muster that many votes, the 33-nation Latin American group might decide to put up another candidate.

It's a secret ballot, and countries aren't obliged to make known their preference, though much of the Caribbean and South America -- including Uruguay -- have voiced support for Venezuela.

U.S. officials, however, have spoken out against Venezuela and lobbied for Guatemala, which has the support of Colombia, apparently most of Central America, Europe and other countries.

The 53 countries in the African group are expected to tilt toward Venezuela, while Asia's 54 nations are said to be split.

Ten of the Security Council's 15 seats are filled by the regional groups for two-year stretches. The other five are occupied by its veto-wielding permanent members: Britain, China, France, Russia and the United States.

Chavez's aid pledges, meanwhile, have come under attack ahead of Venezuela's Dec. 3 presidential vote by opposition candidate Manuel Rosales, who says poor Venezuelans need the money.

Chavez points to government-funded improvements at Venezuela's universities, medical clinics, subsidized food markets and train lines, and insists his foreign aid is aimed at countering the effects of U.S.-inspired capitalism.

Ironically, this aid is bankrolled in large part by oil sales to the United States.

Venezuela also bought or pledged to buy more than $3.6 billion in bonds from Argentina, Ecuador and Bolivia to help them cover deficits. Most of that -- $3.5 billion -- went to Argentina, helping a leftist ally pay off its World Bank and International Monetary Fund debts. Venezuela then recycles the bonds though its own banks and ends up with a profit that between early last year and July 2006 totaled $200 million.

It's difficult to quantify the value of Chavez's many oil supply agreements under preferential terms to at least 17 countries across the region, including Cuba. Venezuela says it sells the fuel at market prices but offers low-cost financing and accepts partial payment in goods from cows to bananas.

The state oil company even offered an unspecified sum this year to a Brazilian samba group that won first prize in the Rio de Janeiro carnival parade. "It made us very happy and feeling like we are part of the triumph," Chavez said later.

The U.S. is the world's largest overall aid donor, though far less generous than Japan and European countries, given the size of its economy. Venezuela's largesse, meanwhile, goes far beyond the Western Hemisphere.

Last year it gave a total of $3 million in emergency food aid to Burkina Faso, Mauritania and Niger. It pledged to sell oil under preferential terms for London's trademark red buses in return for the leftist-run city's expertise in transport, housing and other areas. It is expanding its program in the United States to provide discounted heating oil to the poor.

Chavez says he's helping to build a "multipolar" world to counter U.S. dominance, lining up allies against what he calls a perpetual threat from Washington. A U.N. Security Council seat would give this ambition a sharp boost.

Associated Press correspondents Katie Burford in Mexico City, Ellsworth Carter in Roseau, Dominica, and Nick Wadhams at U.N. headquarters in New York contributed to this report.

Mexican Leftists Watching Tabasco Election (LAT)

By Sam Enriquez

The Los Angeles Times, October 15, 2006

Today's gubernatorial vote may determine the political fate of former presidential candidate Lopez Obrador and that of his movement.

TACOTALPA, Mexico — If you ask Cesar Ascencio, there isn't much to cheer about in this sun-baked southern town. Jobs are scarce and even shade is hard to come by after trees in the central plaza were chopped down for a renovation that's stalled halfway to nowhere.

"We live in one of the worst pueblos in Mexico," the 72-year-old retiree said. "This place is dead."

A couple of hours later, it came to life, if only for a little while, when hundreds of townspeople gathered at the plaza to hear leftist politician Andres Manuel Lopez Obrador promise to bring help to the nation's poor and vengeance on its rich. The crowd roared.

DOJ_NMG_0081827

Lopez Obrador, who lost the July 2 presidential election to free-market candidate Felipe Calderon, isn't running for office. But his political future, and that of his fledgling leftist movement, may rest on today's gubernatorial election in Tabasco, Lopez Obrador's home state. He has spent the last several weeks campaigning for Cesar Raul Ojeda, a fellow member of the Democratic Revolution Party, or PRD, who's making an uphill third bid for governor.

A win by Ojeda, 54, would also be a triumph for Lopez Obrador, whose followers barricaded Mexico City's main boulevard for weeks this summer to protest the national election. Lopez Obrador, who says Calderon won by fraud, plans to install himself as the "legitimate" president in an unofficial inauguration next month. But his fight may be an uphill one too, against perceptions that he'll bring Mexico more trouble than hope.

Support for Lopez Obrador has dwindled since protesters closed down their Mexico City encampments a month ago after judges rejected demands for a national recount. So the former Mexico City mayor returned to Tabasco and has since filled plazas in his bid to secure a victory for Ojeda — and keep his message alive.

"Lopez Obrador is trying to use Tabasco as a catapult for his movement," said Andres Granier, the 58-year-old former mayor of Villahermosa, the state capital, and Ojeda's opponent. "But it's not going to work."

Granier, who holds a lead of 9 percentage points in polls, is a candidate of the Institutional Revolutionary Party, or PRI, which has run the state for seven decades. He has waged an aggressive campaign and was a well-liked mayor, but that doesn't fully explain his advantage.

Lopez Obrador won 56% of the presidential vote in Tabasco and remains wildly popular here. The trouble is, his so-called campaign of civil resistance has scared people off, including admirers such as Gilberto Macias.

Macias was in no mood to talk politics as he waited for his overheated car to cool down off a road just outside town. But he quickly rattled off a wish list for the next governor: better salaries, more jobs, safer streets, more hospitals, new roads.

"The minimum wage here is 44 pesos a day [about $4], and food is expensive, electricity is expensive, toll roads are expensive," he said. "We all want help, but now people are afraid of the 'hard left.' We're not sure anymore if we're talking about Allende in Chile or some kind of totalitarian state."

The takeover of the capital of nearby Oaxaca state this summer by striking teachers has people rethinking their support of Mexico's emerging left, he said. "We don't want any kind of trouble like that here," the 53-year-old taxi driver said.

Another Tabascan, Ciro Perez Gomez, said Lopez Obrador was "a good man who's taken the wrong road."

Ojeda said a vote for him was a vote for Lopez Obrador and for the fight to steer Mexico toward a moderate left that uses government spending and private investment to make jobs, that pays subsidies to farmers to keep them from fleeing to the United States.

"It's a modern left," he said, "with government shouldering its responsibility to the people. How can the state have so much money and yet have so many poor?"

He disagreed that losing the election would hurt Lopez Obrador.

"This movement has its own life," Ojeda said. "A loss would give opponents the chance to say it's over, but I believe the roots are deep."

His PRI opponents, he said, were up to the same old political shenanigans that had kept them in power and soured voters on the party's presidential candidate, former Tabasco Gov. Roberto Madrazo, who finished a distant third in the national election.

Ojeda supporters posted a video on YouTube.com that shows a warehouse with hundreds of new bikes that they allege the PRI had planned to give to voters. The video, indexed under "mapacheo," slang for vote-buying, shows the warehouse being emptied within minutes by passersby after its discovery by Ojeda campaigners.

A PRI spokesman said voter giveaways — which included cooking pans and food — were humanitarian aid. He would not say whether the bicycles were the PRI's.

"They think they can buy the vote of the people," Ojeda said. "But we have more dignity than that."

The PRI warned last week that Lopez Obrador and the PRD had recruited more than 2,000 radicals to start trouble at the polls. On Friday, authorities announced the arrests of several out-of-state PRD supporters who acknowledged that they had planned to disrupt voting. One man was injured in a jailhouse fall before his confession, police said.

Granier has campaigned on a platform of unity and promises to bring potable water, as well as jobs, schools and clinics to outlying towns.

"There are two distinct roads: ours, which is one of accord; and theirs, of provocation," he said Wednesday in his closing campaign speech.

Later that night, Lopez Obrador boarded the last flight to Mexico City. An aide brought him a cup of coffee and Lopez Obrador begged off a last interview.

"It's over, and I'm tired," he said.

He answered one question: Does he really believe he and his movement will survive a loss in Tabasco?

"Yes, I do," he said. "I believe it in my heart."

China's New Leftist (NYT)

By Pankaj Mishra
The New York Times, October 15, 2006

One day earlier this year I met Wang Hui at the Thinker's Cafe near Tsinghua University in Bejing, where he teaches. A small, compact man with streaks of gray in his short hair and a pleasant face that always seems ready to break into a smile, he arrived, as he would to all our subsequent meetings, on an old-fashioned bicycle, dressed in dark corduroys, a suede jacket and a black turtleneck that would not be amiss on an American campus.

Co-editor of China's leading intellectual journal, Dushu (Reading), and the author of a four-volume history of Chinese thought, Wang, still in his mid-40's, has emerged as a central figure among a group of writers and academics known collectively as the New Left. New Left intellectuals advocate a "Chinese alternative" to the neoliberal market economy, one that will guarantee the welfare of the country's 800 million peasants left behind by recent reforms. And unlike much of China's dissident class, which grew out of the protests in Tiananmen Square in 1989 and consists largely of human rights and pro-democracy activists, Wang and the New Left view the Communist leadership as a likely force for change. Recent events — the purge of party leaders on anticorruption charges late last month and continuing efforts to curb market excesses — suggest that this view is neither utopian nor paradoxical. Though New Leftists have never directed government policy, their concerns are increasingly amplified by the central leadership.

In the last few years, Wang has reflected eloquently and often on what outsiders see as the central paradox of contemporary China: an authoritarian state fostering a free-market economy while espousing socialism. On this first afternoon, he barely paused for small talk before embarking on an analysis of the country's problems. He described how the Communist Party, though officially dedicated to egalitarianism, had opened its membership to rich businessmen. Many of its local officials, he said, used their arbitrary power to become successful entrepreneurs at the expense of the rural populations they were meant to serve and joined up with real estate speculators to seize collectively owned land from peasants. (According to Chinese officials, 60 percent of land acquisitions are illegal.) The result has been an alliance of elite political and commercial interests, Wang said, that recalls similar alliances in the United States and many East Asian countries.

As he spoke about how market reforms have widened the gap between rich and poor, between rural and urban areas, smartly dressed students browsed through a highbrow collection (Leo Strauss, Jürgen Habermas), checked their e-mail and sipped their mochas. At the privately owned Thinker's Cafe and the adjoining All Sages bookshop, Wang seemed to be famous. Students greeted him reverentially; the staff was extra attentive. Yet Wang still belongs to a minority. Recoiling from the excesses of Maoism and the failures of the old planned economy, most Chinese intellectuals, even those with no connection to the state, see the market economy as indispensable to China's modernization and revival. Zhu Xueqin, a history professor at Shanghai University who is one of China's best-known liberal intellectuals, told me that he wants more, not fewer, market reforms. For him, China's present instability is caused not by economic forces but by a politically repressive regime that has prevented the emergence of a representative democracy and a constitutional government.

Wang readily acknowledges that China's efforts at economic reform have not been without great benefits. He applauds the first phase, which lasted from 1978 to 1985, for improving agricultural output and the rural standard of living. It is the central government's more recent obsession with creating wealth in urban areas — and its decision to hand over political authority to local party bosses, who often explicitly disregard central government directives — that has led, he said, to deep inequalities within China. The embrace of a neoliberal market economy has meant the dismantling of welfare systems, a widening income gap between rich and poor and deepening environmental crises not only in China but in the United States and other developed countries. For Wang, it is the task of intellectuals to remind the state of its old, unfulfilled obligations to peasants and workers.

Despite his invocation of socialist principles, Wang was quick to tell me that he dislikes the New Left label, even though he has used it himself. "Intellectuals reacted against 'leftism' in the 80's, blaming it for all of China's problems," he said, "and right-wing radicals use the words 'New Left' to discredit us, make us look like remnants from the Maoist days." Wang also doesn't care to be identified with the radical intellectuals of the 60's in America and Europe, to whom the term New Left was originally applied. Many of them, he said, had passion and slogans but very little practical politics, and not surprisingly, more than a few ended up with the neoconservatives, supporting "fantasy projects" like democracy in Iraq.

Wang prefers the term "critical intellectual" for himself and like-minded colleagues, some of whom are also part of China's nascent activist movement in the countryside, working to alleviate rural poverty and environmental damage. Though broadly left wing, Dushu publishes writing from across the ideological spectrum. Wang's own work draws on a broad range of Western thinkers, from the French historian Fernand Braudel to the globalization theorist Immanuel Wallerstein. "Intellectual quality is important to me," Wang said. "I don't want to run just any left-wing garbage." The magazine has carried abstract debates on postcolonial theory as well as, he claims, some of the most interesting analyses in China of how the government's urban-oriented reforms have damaged rural society. There are restrictions on what Dushu can publish, of course, and Wang is frank about them. As with all intellectual journals in mainland China, authors and editors at Dushu have to exercise a degree of self-censorship. Articles cannot directly criticize the leadership or deviate much from the official line on subjects that the Chinese government considers most sensitive — Taiwan or restive Muslim and Buddhist minorities in Xinjiang and Tibet.

"I get asked in Western countries, 'How do you define your position?'" Wang said. "'Are you a dissident?' I say no. What is a dissident? It is a cold-war category. And it has no meaning now. Many of the Chinese dissidents in America can return to China. But they don't want to. They are doing well in the U.S. To people who ask me if we are dissidents, I say, we are critical intellectuals. Some government policies we support. Others, we oppose. It really depends on the content of the policy."

Born in Yangzhou in the southeast province of Jiangsu, Wang was just 7 and entering primary school when the Cultural Revolution began in 1966. The decade-long chaos, which traumatized older generations, seems to have left benign memories for Wang. He remembers being taken by his school to work in the villages for a week or two during the school year. "My generation of urban intellectuals," he said, with a hint of pride, "is the last to have firsthand experience of conditions in the countryside."

He counts the 20 months he spent working in factories around Yangzhou after middle school as a valuable experience. In 1977, he took the first university entrance exams to be held after the Cultural Revolution, during which many universities were either shut or would admit only peasants, workers and soldiers. "Thousands of aspiring students," he reminisced, "were competing for a single place."

When he moved from Yangzhou to Beijing to begin his doctoral studies in the mid-80's, Wang found himself part of an even more privileged class. "Intellectuals," he said, "had been targeted during Mao's time; now, post-Mao, they were the elite again." And by then, Wang said, they all agreed on what needed to be done: China had to abandon its "feudal" and socialist traditions and catch up with the capitalist West. Scarred by the Cultural Revolution, intellectuals saw socialism in China as a failure. Consequently, they had, Wang argues, no real debate on whether a Western-style consumerist society could be successfully recreated or was environmentally sustainable in China. The West, especially the United States, was idealized.

Wang first began to develop his own views on contemporary China while working on a dissertation about one of the most admired of modern Chinese writers, Lu Xun (1881 1936). Lu Xun, Wang explained to me, was a writer of the left, but he was very critical of left-wing writers and activists. He criticized Chinese tradition, but was also an excellent classical scholar. He welcomed the Western idea of progress, but was also skeptical of it. The paradoxes in Lu Xun helped Wang to see that Chinese modernity could not be a simple matter of abandoning the old and embracing the new — as it had been for both Maoists and free-market capitalists.

For Wang, the problems associated with China's uneven development were first identified by the demonstrators in Tiananmen Square in 1989. Wang himself was one of the last protesters to leave the square on the morning of June 4, 1989, as the tanks of the People's Liberation Army closed in. Normally rather brisk and matter-of-fact, he grew animated as he described in fluent, if occasionally idiosyncratic, English how a "broad social movement" began to grow out of the distress caused by the shock therapy of market reforms. The students demanding freedom of speech and assembly were certainly the most visible. But there were, he said, many more Chinese in the cities — workers, government officials and small businessmen — demanding that the government control corruption and inflation, which had shot up to 30 percent after price controls on basic commodities were lifted.

In the spring of 1989, Wang was a fellow at the prestigious Chinese Academy of Social Sciences. Wang told me that he saw "democratic potential" in the protests and felt obliged to participate even though he had reservations about the students' lack of "theoretical or methodological coherence." For Wang, the student leaders recalled the Chinese intellectuals of the early 20th century, who were never more united than when they radically rejected everything in the past. Nevertheless, after the government sought to crush dissent by declaring martial law on May 20, 1989, Wang was drawn deeper into the movement. On the night of June 3, when the tanks and armored cars charged through Beijing, killing hundreds of unarmed resisters and injuring thousands more, Wang was among those assembled in the center of Tiananmen Square. He could hear the gunfire, but some of the more radical among the students still refused to leave.

Wang decided to stay and to try to persuade the students not to sacrifice their lives. "I knew," he said, "that if the result was violence, it would be disastrous for the whole country." Wang said that his fears were proved right: violence shrank the space for political debate, and the Chinese government used the period of intellectual silence that followed to begin dismantling more aspects of the welfare state, like the state-owned enterprises, that had long offered cradle-to-grave benefits to workers.

Eventually, the students advocating peaceful retreat prevailed and persuaded the People's Liberation Army to give them safe passage in the southeast corner of the square. Just before dawn, hundreds of students left the square through a narrow corridor, jostled and taunted by hostile soldiers. Within minutes, the students dispersed. Some of them were arrested and sentenced to long prison spells; others fled to Hong Kong and eventually to the West; many others, like Wang, disappeared for a few weeks.

When Wang returned to Beijing in late 1989, the authorities were waiting for him. "That was the most difficult time for me," he said. He was asked repeatedly: "What was your organization? Who were your associates?" After interrogations lasting for many months, he was sent to the northwestern province of Shaanxi, where dozens of other young scholars from Beijing were already undergoing — in the uniquely Chinese way — "re-education" by exposure to rural conditions.

In Wang's case, punishment by pedagogy seems to have been more successful than Chinese authorities could have anticipated. He dates his "real education" to the time he spent in Shaanxi, one of the poorest regions of China. He was shocked by the obvious disparity between the coastal cities, then enjoying the first fruits of economic reform, and the provinces. He was shocked, too, by his own ignorance and that of his colleagues in the 1989 social movement. "We had no idea that the old order in much of rural China was in deep crisis," he said.

The commune system in Shaanxi was dismantled as part of Deng Xiaoping's reforms, and land was redistributed. But the area produced nothing of much value, not even enough food. Deepening poverty led to a sharp increase in crime and social problems; violent conflicts broke out over land; men took to gambling, beating up, even selling, their wives and daughters. Wang lived in a low-lying village where his dormitory was frequently flooded while he slept. Much of his daily work consisted of writing didactic pamphlets warning peasants against gambling and crime; he also worked on the reconstruction of a primary school that had been destroyed by floodwaters. "It was during that year," Wang said, "that I realized how important a welfare system and cooperative network remained for many people in China. This is not a socialist idea. Even the imperial dynasties that ruled China kept a balance between rich and poor areas through taxes and almsgiving.

"People confine China's experience to the Communist dictatorship and failures of the planned economy and think that the market will now do everything. They don't see how many things in the past worked and were popular with ordinary people, like cooperative medical insurance in rural areas, where people organized themselves to help each other. That might be useful today, since the state doesn't invest in health care in rural areas anymore."

Many poor people Wang met during his year in Shaanxi saw him as the educated man from Beijing who would tell the mandarins of the central government to send them some help. "I felt burdened by this role," Wang said. "I couldn't tell them that I was in no position to do anything." Wang returned, he told me, from his 10-month exile with a keen sense of the gap between the worlds of intellectuals and ordinary people.

During his time in Shaanxi, the influential Journal of Literary Review denounced his research on Lu Xun as an example of "bourgeois liberalization." Nevertheless, Wang had no trouble returning to academic life.

Wang doesn't like to talk much about 1989. He complains about the "stereotype" of China in the Western media conjured by Tiananmen. Nonetheless, our conversation about Tiananmen was unusual. While traveling through Chinese cities, I had found it hard to get people to talk about it. When Deng Xiaoping sought to bury the ghosts of Tiananmen for good by calling for speedy market reforms in 1992, he may well have calculated that the prospect of personal wealth — and access to Western brand-name goods — would compensate many newly enriched people for the lack of political democracy. If so, he seems to have been proved right. The largest public disturbance in China since Tiananmen occurred in August 1992, when hundreds of thousands of Chinese tried to buy shares in the newly opened stock exchange of Shenzen.

The effort to create wealth in urban areas through export-oriented industries — part of the "let some get rich first" policy announced by Deng Xiaoping and affirmed by his successors — has given the Chinese economy an average growth rate of 10 percent and made it the fourth largest in the world. Yet China remains one of the world's poorest countries. More than 150 million people survive on a dollar a day. About 200 million of the rural population are crowding the cities and towns in search of low-paying jobs. More than four million Chinese participated in the 87,000 protests recorded in 2005, and these statistics may not fully convey the rage and discontent of Chinese living with one of the world's highest income inequalities and deteriorating health and education systems, as well as the arbitrary fees and taxes imposed by local party officials. Much of this, Wang said, could be laid at the feet of the "right-wing radicals" or neoliberal economists who cite Milton Friedman and Friedrich Hayek (advocates of unregulated markets who inspired Ronald Reagan and Margaret Thatcher in the 80's) and who argue for China's integration into the global economy without taking into account the social price of mass privatization. And it is they, Wang added, who have held favor with the ruling elite and have dominated the state-run media.

Only in the last decade, Wang said, have intellectuals of the New Left begun to challenge the notion that a market economy leads inevitably to democracy and prosperity. Wang, who helped found an academic journal called Xueren (The Scholar) after returning from exile in 1991, was well placed to observe those intellectuals. As they came into greater contact with Western academics and scholars, they became more aware of problems not just in European and American societies but also in post-Communist countries that were trying to bring their planned economies closer to neoliberal models. China's intention to join the World Trade Organization (which it did in 2001) provoked unexpectedly sharp debates among scholars. As Wang described it, the terms of the debate had changed: "Many people knew by then that globalization is not a neutral word describing a natural process. It is part of the growth of Western capitalism, from the days of colonialism and imperialism." Which is not to say that the New Left embraced an easy antiglobalist position; it has been critical of recent anti-Japanese and anti-American outbursts among urban, middle-class Chinese — of what Wang dubbed "consumer nationalism." That, Wang said, was the same kind of globalization that America advocates: "It is really a form of hypernationalism, which is why you hear talk of tariffs and penalties on China when American economic interests are hurt."

Wang paused and then added: "Many people also learned that the reason the Chinese economy did not collapse like the Asian tiger economies in 1997 was that the national state was able to protect it. Now, of course, China with its export-dominated economy is more dependent on the Western world order, especially the American economy, than India."

In January of this year, Wang published a long investigative article exposing the plight of workers in a factory in his hometown, Yangzhou, a city of about one million. According to Wang, in 2004 the local government sold the profitable state-owned textile factory to a real estate developer from the southern city of Shenzen. Worker-equity shares were bought for 30 percent of their actual value, and then more than a thousand workers were laid off after mismanagement of the factory led to losses. In July 2004, the workers went on strike. In what Wang calls an agitation without precedent in the history of Yangzhou, the workers obstructed a major highway, halted bus traffic and attacked the gates of local government buildings.

Wang told me that he was helping the workers to sue the local government. He had spent time working in a nearby factory before college and this, he said, made him feel a particular connection to them. He remembered that his pay had been low — less than $2 a month by current exchange rates — but, he said, what was crucial was that the workers he knew then felt secure in their jobs. "People claim," he said, "that the market will automatically force the state to become more democratic. But this is baseless. We only have to think about the alliance of elites formed in the process of privatization. The state will change only when it is under pressure from a large social force, like the workers and peasants."

Wang's story about Yangzhou is not unique. There are many accounts of how local government officials controlling public property have amassed fortunes by privatizing state assets. According to a recent report by the activist Liu Xiaobo, more than 90 percent of the 20,000 richest people in China are related to senior government or Communist Party officials.

For Wang, democracy is not just a simple matter of expanding political freedom for the middle class or creating legal and constitutional rights for a minority already substantially empowered by market reforms. Democracy in China, he said, has to be based upon the active consent and mobilization of the majority of its population, and be able to ensure social and economic justice for them.

Yet for some New Left intellectuals, like Cui Zhiyuan, a close friend and collaborator of Wang's who teaches political science at Tsinghua University, there is opportunity in the collision of capitalism and socialism. "There is more space here for new ideas," Cui told me as he described why he had returned to China after many years in the United States. "The capitalist system is fixed in the West, but things are still in flux in places like China and India. We have a historic opportunity to build a better, more just society than the West." For Cui, it is important to clarify the concepts first. "It is not helpful," he said, "to see socialism and capitalism as opposed and separate. Both have traveled together in the 20th century. Not just European welfare states, even American capitalism has a socialist component, which was arrived at after compromise with the trade unions."

In recent years, Cui has found a receptive and powerful audience on an issue that lies at the very foundation of the Chinese socialist state: the collective ownership of property. Liberal Chinese economists argue that private property is sacred and inviolable in a market economy, a radical idea in the Chinese context. In an article he published in Dushu in 2004, Cui challenged this notion, emphasizing the essentially communal nature of property ownership. He cited Thomas Jefferson's decision to reword John Locke's principles of life, liberty and property with life, liberty and happiness in the Declaration of Independence.

"Jefferson recognized," he said, "that property rights emanate from society, not from nature. That's why there was no specific article on property rights in the U.S. Constitution and it had to be brought in later through the Fifth Amendment." Cui went on to relate with something close to glee that his article had circulated widely among legislators in the National People's Congress, China's Parliament, in 2004. It had helped, he said, to provoke a debate that led the Congress to adopt a compromise amendment to the constitution, similar in wording to the Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, which simply states that no person "be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law."

This spring it began to become clear that the New Left's advocacy of a welfare state is being echoed within the Communist leadership, which is fearful of social instability and is keen to consolidate its power and legitimacy. In March, a few weeks before I met with Wang, the National People's Congress convened in Beijing and unexpectedly became a forum for the first open ideological debate within the party for years. Legislators accused government officials of selling out China's interests to market forces. Such was the antimarket mood that a bill to defend private property and grant land titles to farmers — one that both foreign investors in China and Chinese businessmen had been lobbying for — was not even discussed. Describing major new investments in rural areas, the Chinese premier, Wen Jiabao, emphasized that "building a socialist countryside" was a "major historic task" before the Communist Party. He also outlined steps to balance economic growth with environmental protection.

A German journalist told me that it was the most left-wing speech he had heard from a senior Chinese leader during his eight years in Beijing: "Even American and European politicians don't talk about achieving a Green G.D.P." Wang agreed. He said that he was also pleased to see President Hu Jintao and Premier Wen Jiabao focusing on relations with Asian countries. "We were too obsessed with the United States during Jiang Zemin's time," he said. "We really need to improve our relations with Japan and India. We belong to such old and distinguished civilizations, and we cannot just be simple followers and imitators of America.

"It is a huge achievement," he added, a smile on his face, "that the premier should openly admit that health care and education is a failure. It has never happened before." Wang said he thought that the government was sincere about eradicating rural poverty. But he was still cautious. "There has been so much decentralization in China," he said, "that it is not easy to translate central government policy into action." Last month, in the first purge of a high-ranking party member since 1995, the central leadership removed the Shanghai party chief on corruption charges, leading to speculation that there would be a reconfiguring of relations between the central government and provincial leaders and perhaps a shift in policy toward shoring up social-welfare systems and stemming pollution. Wang remained skeptical. "The Shanghai case is encouraging at least," Wang said in a recent e-mail message. "I think there will be some political results from it, but they are results rather than reasons."

The dangers of failing to improve conditions for the majority are clear to Wang: "If we don't improve the situation, there will be more authoritarianism. We have already seen in Russia how people prefer a strong ruler like Putin because they are fed up with corruption, political chaos and economic stagnation. When radical marketization makes people lose their sense of security, the demand for order and intervention from above is inevitable."

In attacking corrupt local governments, the New Left often seems to want to institute big-brotherly government of the kind authoritarian politicians like. Certainly the growing accord between the central government's socialist rhetoric and New Left ideas makes many uneasy. Lung Yingtai, a well-known Taiwanese writer and democracy advocate, told me earlier this year that she was wary of the New Left intellectuals, who, she said, appear too close ideologically to the Communist regime. Taking this view one step further, Liu Junning, a popular liberal political theorist who left China in 1999 after being blacklisted by the Chinese government but has since returned, claimed that the New Left was another name for the nationalistic old guard of the Communist Party, which was inspired by hatred of the West.

While this seems an exaggeration, Wen Tiejun, a former government official who runs rural reconstruction projects and is identified as New Left, had attended what he called "brainstorming sessions" with Hu Jintao and Wen Jiabao. Typically, intellectuals in Communist countries (Vaclav Havel or Adam Michnik, for example) have gained moral authority by assuming a critical stance toward the all-powerful state. How do New Left thinkers in China calibrate their relationship with a state that has imprisoned many of their colleagues and generally shown little tolerance for criticism of the party?

When I posed this question to Cui, he momentarily lost his exuberant manner. "It is a very important question," he said. "How to deal with the government, both morally and intellectually. This is a big challenge for us."

Cui does not regard the Communist regime as a "totality." There were, he said, many different aspects of it, at both the local and central levels. "Almost every day," Cui said, "The New York Times carries reports of peasants agitating against the Communist government, but if you listen to what the peasants are saying, they are telling the central government that the local government has violated their rights. So even the peasants can see the different aspects of the state, who supports them and who doesn't."

Wang Xiaoming, professor of cultural studies at Shanghai University, positions himself to the right of Wang Hui but says that he sympathizes with the New Left's pragmatic attitude toward the Communist regime. "Civil society is very weak in China," he said, "and since the government is the most active agent of change, we have to push the government to do what it should do besides pushing the government to give up some of its powers."

When I met with Wang Hui for the last time, he dismissed any claims about increased New Left influence over the regime. "What we have tried to do is create an intellectual situation in which new policies can be explored," he said. "I know that many leaders read Wen Tiejun's article; they also read Cui's article on property rights. There have been other articles in Dushu that have been equally influential, and I am pleased about this. But we have no other connection with the regime."

Wang also seems to have no anxiety that ideological convergence with the regime will turn New Left intellectuals into pro-government policy wonks and hacks, part of an old Chinese tradition of intellectuals advising the state. "We look at things from a Chinese perspective naturally, but we also try to think beyond the framework of the nation-state," he said. "People ask in the West, How could China develop capitalism with an authoritarian state? But that's ignoring how modern capitalism grew in the West, without much democracy and with the help of imperialism and colonialism. You have to ask whether this unique economic model of the West can be globalized without great wars and destruction of the environment. This is not an abstract issue. China has stopped felling its forests, most of which have disappeared, but some country still has to produce wood for Chinese consumption."

At our last meeting, Wang also spoke more about a subject Cui had brought up with me: how the rise of China and India throws up new challenges and possibilities with profound implications for the world at large. "Western societies have been on top for the last two centuries and shaped the world with the decisions they made," he said. "China and India will now play equally crucial roles in the new century. But what will they be? I think it is very important for Chinese and Indian intellectuals not just to imitate the West. They have to explore alternatives to the Western model of modernity. Otherwise, the 'consumer nationalists' are already saying, 'America was on top; now we are on top.'"

Wang laughed, and added, "This is not interesting."

Cold Warrior (NYT)

By Henry A. Kissinger

The New York Times, October 15, 2006

Dean Acheson was perhaps the most vilified secretary of state in modern American history. Robert L. Beisner, in "Dean Acheson: A Life in the Cold War," his sweeping and thoughtful account of Acheson's tenure, cites a scholar who, with meticulous pedantry, discovered that during the four years — 1949-53 — that Acheson served as secretary of state, Republicans made 1,268 antagonistic statements about him on the Senate floor and only seven favorable ones (one wonders for what).

History has treated Acheson more kindly. Accolades for him have become bipartisan. Secretaries of state appointed by the party of his erstwhile tormentors have described him as a role model; Condoleezza Rice is the most recent example. Thirty-five years after his death, Acheson has achieved iconic status. This is all the more remarkable in view of his out-of-scale personality, so at odds with the present period, in which eminence seems to be tolerable only in the garb of the commonplace.

The debonair conduct, the bristling mustache, the Bond Street tailoring, the biting wit, the extraordinary analytical skill coupled with a defiant refusal to turn the other cheek bespoke an affirmation of the idiosyncratic over the conventional. Acheson was a man of high principle, whose hero was Oliver Wendell Holmes Jr., an iconoclastic Boston Brahmin shaped by the 19th century, and whose best friend was Felix Frankfurter, the brilliant son of Jewish immigrants.

Though Acheson served during the transition when America emerged as a world power and enjoyed a nuclear monopoly, the scale of government was as yet relatively small, and Washington was still a comparatively provincial city. Its political conflicts were not shaped by public relations advisers or tested on focus groups; hence they were somewhat personal. That senior officials must remain blandly obliging while their veracity or honor is being systematically challenged was never part of the Acheson code. This explains the scene, unimaginable today, when Acheson, in the author's words, at a hearing before the Senate Appropriations Committee, admonished Senator Kenneth Wherry of Nebraska not to shake his dirty finger in his face. When Wherry persisted, Acheson rose and launched a roundhouse swing at the senatorial gadfly, which was stopped at the last moment because Adrian Fisher, the legal adviser of the State Department, wrapped his arms around Acheson and pulled him down into his seat.

When Acheson became secretary of state, America had only just started its journey toward global involvement. Africa was still colonial; Britain was predominant in much of the Middle East; Indian democracy was only two years old; Germany and Japan were still occupied countries. The debate was not over aspirations to hegemony but over whether the nation should engage itself internationally at all, never mind permanently. It was appropriate that Acheson entitled his memoirs "Present at the Creation."

The position of secretary of state is potentially the most fulfilling in the government short of the presidency. Its scope is global; ultimately it rests on almost philosophical assumptions as to the nature of world order and the relationship of order to progress and national interest. Lacking such a conceptual framework, incoherence looms in the face of the daily task of redefining America's relationship to the world via the thousands of messages from nearly 200 diplomatic posts and the constant flow of communication from the Executive Department — all this against the backdrop of Congressional liaison and press inquiry.

Acheson served as under secretary of state and then as secretary during the period when a people that had known no direct continuing threat to its security since the early days of the Republic had to be brought to recognize that its permanent participation in the world was indispensable for peace and security. Inevitably this realization was painful and slow in coming, if indeed it has been fully achieved to this day. This is why Acheson was assailed from both political sides, by those insisting on an end to involvement through total victory over the threat and, on the other side, by those who thought there was no threat to begin with, or at least none that required Acheson's militant response.

In this maelstrom, Acheson dealt with the five principal tasks of any secretary of state: the identification of the challenge; the development of a strategy to deal with it; organizing and motivating the bureaucracy in the State Department and in other agencies; persuading the American public; and conducting American diplomacy toward other countries. These tasks require the closest collaboration between the president and the secretary of state; secretaries of state who seek to base their influence on the prerogatives of the office invariably become marginalized. Presidents cannot be constrained by administrative flowcharts; for a secretary of state to be effective, he or she has to get into the president's head, so to speak. This is why Acheson made it a point to see Truman almost every day they were in town together and why their friendship was so crucial to the achievements of the Truman years.

No secretary can fulfill all these tasks with equal skill — though Acheson came closer than any other of the modern period. His overriding challenge was to define a conceptual framework on which to base America's involvement in global affairs. Beisner, a former president of the Society for Historians of American Foreign Relations, describes this process in detail and with special emphasis on Acheson's growing debate with George Kennan. Acheson turned Kennan's seminal article, "The Sources of Soviet Conduct," into the operating principle of American foreign policy. He interpreted it to mean that the task of foreign policy was to create situations of strength around the Soviet periphery to deter any temptation for aggression. Negotiation with the Soviet Union was to be deferred until these situations of strength had come into being; any attempt to begin diplomacy prematurely would undermine the primary task.

Acheson's overriding priority, in the years immediately following World War II, was to restore Western Europe and create an Atlantic community to resist what then appeared as the Soviet colossus. He built the structure that sustained democracy during the cold war, with the Marshall Plan, the creation of NATO and the return of Germany and Japan to the community of nations. But Acheson was less precise about the role of diplomacy in this process once the architectural phase was completed.

Kennan represented the other strand of American thinking. He rejected what he considered the militarization of his own views, inaugurating a debate that has not ended to this day. Acheson implicitly believed that situations of strength would be self-enforcing, and he played down the importance of diplomatic engagement with the adversary. Kennan raised the question of how to gain Soviet acquiescence in the process and urged negotiation, even while the ultimate structure was being built. Acheson treated diplomacy as the more or less automatic consequence of a strategic deployment; Kennan saw it as an autonomous enterprise depending largely on diplomatic skill. The danger of the Acheson approach has been stagnation and gradual public disenchantment with stalemate. The danger of the Kennan approach has been that diplomacy might become a technical exercise in splitting differences and thus shade into appeasement. How to merge the two strands so that military force and diplomacy are mutually supportive and so that national strategy becomes a seamless web is the essence of a continuing national controversy.

Beisner shows how the failure to do so with respect to the Korean War was the cause of the single greatest error of Acheson's tenure: initially, the placing of Korea publicly outside the American defense perimeter (though this was conventional wisdom at the time) and, later, the inability, after the United States crossed the 38th parallel, to correlate military operations with some achievable diplomatic objectives.

For someone like myself, who knew Acheson, Beisner's portrait does not always capture the vividness of his personality, which emerges too much as a list of eccentricities. Acheson's relationship with the Nixon White House, and to President Nixon himself, is too cavalierly dismissed as the result of ego and an old man's vanity. As a participant in all these meetings, I considered that relationship an example of Acheson's generosity of spirit. Nixon had made essentially unforgivable attacks on Acheson during his 1952 campaign for vice president. But when he reached out to Acheson, it was received with the consideration Acheson felt he owed to the office, as a form of duty to the country. Acheson dealt with the issues Nixon put before him thoughtfully, precisely, without any attempt at flattery, in pursuit of his conception of national service and, unlike some other outside advisers, without offering advice that had not been solicited.

Acheson emerges from the Beisner book as the greatest secretary of state of the postwar period in the sweep of his design, his ability to implement it, the extraordinary associates with whom he surrounded himself and the nobility of his personal conduct. He was impatient with relativists who sought surcease from the complexity of decisions by postulating the moral equivalence of the United States and the Soviet Union. His values were absolute, but he knew also that statesmen are judged by history beyond contemporary debates, and this requires a willingness to achieve great goals in stages, each of which is probably imperfect by absolute standards.

This was the theme of an Acheson speech at the War College in August 1951: "There was not 'one more river to cross' but 'countless problems stretching into the future.' ... Americans must reconcile themselves to 'limited objectives' and work in congress with others, for an essential part of American power was the 'ability to evoke support from others — an ability quite as important as the capacity to compel.' "

The importance of that perception has not changed with the passage of time.

U.S. govt appeals court's NSA wiretapping decision

WASHINGTON – The Bush administration Friday appealed a federal judge's ruling this summer that a controversial post-Sept. 11, 2001, domestic spying program was illegal.

The U.S. Justice Department, in documents filed with a federal court in Cincinnati, argued that President Bush had acted within the law in authorizing the surveillance of domestic wiretaps of international telephone calls.

In its appeal, the government stated that the federal judge's ruling "dismantles a tool that already has helped detect and disrupt al Qaeda plots."

It stated that U.S. District Judge Anna Diggs Taylor's decision directly conflicts with the Supreme Court's direction to "proceed with great caution in resolving challenges in this extraordinarily sensitive context."

Nearly a year ago, media reports revealed the existence of the domestic spying by the National Security Agency.

Civil libertarians, including the ACLU, which brought the suit, have argued the government could gain the same type of intelligence information through warrants.

Judge Taylor ruled in August that NSA's five-year-old surveillance program, implemented as part of the government's war on terrorism, violates the civil rights of Americans because the government does not have to present justification for its monitoring in court and obtain a warrant.

In its appeal, the government argued the surveillance program was narrowly targeted and thus did not violate Americans' constitutional rights, while being an effective tool in stopping potential terrorist attacks.

The expedited appeal called for the government to submit its arguments to the appeals court by Friday, with a response due a month later.

The losing side is almost certain to appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, which is likely to take up the case.

Earlier this month, an appeals court in Cincinnati ruled that the Bush administration's wiretap program can continue pending the government's appeal.

In late September, the House passed legislation authorizing President Bush's domestic spying program. But the measure stalled in the Senate and Congress is now on a long election-year recess.

Bush administration argues to continue detention of Cuban militant wanted in Venezuela

WASHINGTON_The Bush administration is urging a federal judge to keep an anti-Castro Cuban militant locked up in the United States.

In court documents, the government argued Friday that Luis Posada Carilles should not be released until a country can be found that would take him and the Department of Homeland Security has determined whether his release would harm U.S. foreign policy interests.

The 78-year-old Cuba native and naturalized Venezuelan citizen is wanted in Venezuela on charges that he plotted the deadly 1976 bombing of a Cuban jetliner from Caracas.

Justice Department lawyers say Posada has failed to follow through on promises to seek asylum in El Salvador, Honduras or Panama, and should continue to be held in a federal immigration jail in El Paso, Texas, on the Mexican border.

Posada, a former CIA operative and longtime opponent of Cuban President Fidel Castro, has been in U.S. custody since his arrest in Florida in May 2005 on immigration charges.

When U.S. officials reported in September that a third country had not been found that was willing to take Posada, U.S. Magistrate Judge Norbert Garney concluded that he should be released.

The Justice Department filed its objection to the magistrate's ruling with a U.S. District Court that will decide whether Posada will be set free.

Posada's lawyer said his client wants to return to Miami, where his wife, son, daughter and three grandchildren live. In court papers, Posada says he has been offered a job as a salesman for scaffolding and building supplies if he is allowed to the remain in the United States.

Posada's history of violent Castro opposition dates to the CIA's ill-fated Bay of Pigs invasion in 1961 and includes links to a series of bombings in Cuba that killed an Italian tourist in 1997.

Cuban officials say he was involved in an assassination plot against Castro during a conference in Panama in 2000. Posada was wounded in a 1990 attack in Guatemala that he blames on Cuban agents. He also helped the United States supply the Nicaraguan Contras battling the Sandinista government during the 1980s.

Lawyers Seek to Free U.S. Citizen Held in Iraq

By NEIL A. LEWIS

WASHINGTON, Oct. 14 — An American citizen who was tried in an Iraqi court on charges that he had assisted in the kidnapping of three Romanian journalists last year has been sentenced to death, along with five Iraqi co-defendants, a spokesman for the United States Embassy in Baghdad said Saturday.

The spokesman, Lou Fintor, did not identify the American by name, but according to officials in Baghdad and his own legal team, he is Mohammed Munaf, 53.

Lawyers for Mr. Munaf filed papers in federal court in Washington on Friday to try to prevent his transfer to the Iraqi government, arguing that his death sentence undermined one of the United States government’s principal arguments for transferring him, namely that he would be in no danger of physical abuse in Iraqi custody.

Mr. Munaf, an Iraqi native who became a citizen of the United States in 2000, traveled to Iraq in March 2005 to act as translator and guide for three Romanian journalists. The journalists were kidnapped by Iraqis and held for 55 days, as was Mr. Munaf.

The Romanians were freed by American forces on May 23, 2005, but Mr. Munaf was held on suspicion of having been an accomplice in the kidnapping.

According to the government, Mr. Munaf confessed to concocting the plot with friends and relatives and only acted as if he were a victim.

But Jonathan Hafetz, a lawyer with the Brennan Center for Justice at the New York University School of Law, said Mr. Munaf's confession was made under torture.

Mr. Munaf is being held by the American military at Camp Cropper near the Baghdad International Airport.

Because Mr. Munaf is a United States citizen, Mr. Hafetz and his other lawyers have asked Judge Royce C. Lamberth of the United States District Court here to order the military to maintain custody and not give him to the Iraqi criminal court.

In papers filed with the court, Mr. Hafetz said that United States military officials had intervened with the Iraqi judge and insisted that Mr. Munaf be convicted and sentenced to death. Earlier, the Justice Department said that Judge Lamberth should not intervene in the case for several reasons. The department said that Mr. Munaf's claims that he could face torture and physical harm if transferred to Iraqi custody were only speculative and based on news reports of abuse in the government's prison system.

The Justice Department also argued that Mr. Munaf was not actually in United States custody but was being held by a multinational force that was helping the Iraqi government in detention operations.

A judge in another case rejected an argument by the department that an American was being held by a multinational force.

In a similar case involving another American citizen held by the multinational force, a different federal judge rejected the department's argument that the prisoner was not being held by the United States military as a legalistic fiction.

In that case, involving a native of Jordan, the judge issued a restraining order to stop the United States military from transferring the man to Iraqi custody. That case is on appeal, and Mr. Munaf's lawyers have asked Judge Lamberth to await a ruling from the appeals court.

Arizona man still locked up from Sept. 11 terror sweeps

By MARTHA MENDOZA

AP National Writer

In a jail cell at an immigration detention center in Arizona sits a man who is not charged with a crime, not suspected of a crime, not considered a danger to society.

But he has been in custody for five years.

His name is Ali Partovi. And according to the Department of Homeland Security, he is the last to be held of about 1,200 Arab and Muslim men swept up by authorities in the United States after the Sept. 11, 2001, terror attacks.

There has been no full accounting of all of these individuals. Nor has a promised federal policy to protect against unrestricted sweeps been produced.

Human rights groups tried to track the detainees; members of Congress denounced the arrests. They all believed that all of those who had been arrested had been deported, released or processed through the criminal justice system.

Just this summer, it was reported that an Algerian man, Benemar "Ben" Benatta, was the last detainee, and that his transfer to Canada had closed the book on the post-9/11 sweeps.

But now The Associated Press has learned that at least one person _ Partovi _ is still being held. The Department of Homeland Security, which enforces immigration law among its many duties, insists he really is the last one in custody.

"Certainly it's not our goal as an agency to keep anyone detained indefinitely," said DHS spokesman Dean Boyd. Boyd said the department would like to remove Partovi from the United States but that he refuses to return to his homeland of Iran.

And so he remains, a curious remnant of a desperate time.

Arar to miss award over fear of arrest

JEFF SALLOT

OTTAWA -- Maher Arar will be honoured with a human-rights award at a ceremony next week in Washington, but will be unable to attend because he fears he might be arrested again by U.S. authorities.

Mr. Arar, 36, a Canadian software engineer, was arrested and deported from New York to the Middle East as an alleged al-Qaeda terrorist. He was tortured while held in Syria for more than a year.

His struggle to clear his name and draw attention to American abuses of human rights in dealing with terrorist suspects will be honoured by an award from the private Institute for Policy Studies.

"I'm really sorry I can't travel to Washington to accept this award," Mr. Arar said in an interview yesterday.

At the time of his deportation four years ago, U.S. authorities said he was not allowed to come back to the United States for five years.

A Canadian commission of inquiry last month found there was never any evidence that Mr. Arar was connected to terrorists. Prime Minister Stephen Harper told U.S. President George W. Bush by telephone last week that Canada is lodging a formal complaint against Washington for deporting Mr. Arar to the Middle East.

But there has been no indication from U.S. authorities they will purge Mr. Arar's name from security watch lists used to screen travellers at airports and border crossings.

Ottawa announced it was removing Mr. Arar and his family from a watch list after the release of the commission report.

Mr. Arar has recorded a video message to be used at Wednesday's ceremony. The award will be accepted on his behalf by the U.S.-based Center for Constitutional Rights, which is trying to get compensation for Mr. Arar from the American government.

Mr. Arar has flown domestically since his release from Syria. He has also flown to Brussels to testify before a European Union human-rights panel

PG&E WINS JUDGMENT

The PG&E Corporation won a $42.8 million judgment against the federal government after delays in building the Yucca Mountain nuclear storage facility in Nevada forced the utility owner to store spent fuel itself. Judge Emily C. Hewitt of the United States Court of Federal Claims in Washington announced the award in a 179-page opinion. She ruled earlier that the federal government broke a promise to take waste from PG&E nuclear plants in California to the Yucca Mountain site, entitling the company to compensation.

Utilities across the country have filed billions of dollars of claims against the government, seeking to recover costs incurred by storing spent nuclear fuel and radioactive waste on site amid delays to the Yucca Mountain project. The court has awarded more than $220 million to plaintiffs so far.

Charles Miller , a Justice Department spokesman, said government lawyers would review the ruling before deciding whether to appeal.

The ruling is the latest in an ongoing Freedom of Information Act lawsuit, filed by Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington, over documents related to the DOJ's 2005 decision to lower the civil penalties it sought against tobacco companies to $10 billion from $130 billion.

The Oct. 5 decision by Judge Emmet Sullivan of the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia allows CREW to keep two sets of correspondence printed from the computer of former DOJ official Sharon Eubanks, who now works at the organization. Ark. doctor sued for performing unnecessary heart surgeries

FORT SMITH, Ark. - A federal lawsuit filed by a heart patient and a doctor accuses St. Edward Mercy Medical Center and a surgeon of performing unnecessary heart surgeries to defraud Medicare and other federal health programs.

The civil lawsuit, filed in federal court in Little Rock, names the Fort Smith hospital and Dr. David Mark McCoy. An amended complaint was filed Thursday; the original lawsuit was filed under seal last year.

Former patient Paul Montgomery of Fort Smith filed the complaint, along with cardiologist Lonnie Harrison. The federal government also is listed as a plaintiff; the suit accused the hospital and McCoy of violating the Federal False Claims Act.

The lawsuit says Montgomery underwent unnecessary heart surgery, and complications from that procedure led to the amputation of his leg.

"From April 1999, and earlier, McCoy knowingly, systematically, routinely and repeatedly submitted false claims to and received reimbursements from Medicare and other federal health care programs for medically unnecessary cardiac and vascular surgical procedures, including but not limited to coronary bypass grafting and lower extremity bypass grafting," the complaint said. "As a result of these false claims, McCoy fraudulently obtained payments from Medicare and other federal health programs to which he was not entitled."

The lawsuit claims that St. Edward knew McCoy was performing unnecessary surgeries.

"St. Edward's recognition in 1999 as a top heart hospital, however, was accomplished through improper practices and at the expense of patients' health and safety," the lawsuit said.

The hospital issued a statement Friday, saying it had done no wrong.

"St. Edward Mercy has high standards related to clinical quality and patient safety and once the facts of the claim are fully reviewed and understood, we believe that it will be shown that St. Edward Mercy has provided appropriate and necessary care," the statement read.

Harrison, a former cardiologist at St. Edward, often saw patients after McCoy performed surgery, the lawsuit said. In one instance, McCoy had bypassed five arteries on a patient; Harrison said three of the vessels were bypassed needlessly, the complaint said.

A separate lawsuit involving Montgomery and McCoy was decided in Sebastian County Circuit Court earlier this year. In March, a jury awarded Montgomery and his wife $3.3 million in a case that claimed McCoy was negligent in his treatment of Montgomery. That decision is under appeal.

Healthcare Firm Owner Pays $33.8 M to Settle Charges

Momar G. Visaya/Asianjournal.com

LOS ANGELES - A registered nurse who owned two of the largest home health care facilities in the state of California has paid the federal government $33.8 million in one of the largest Medicare fraud cases in state history, according to a federal prosecutor.

Lourdes "Lulu" Perez, 53, a resident of San Diego has pleaded guilty to defrauding Medicare out of $40 million and to filing false tax returns that concealed her ill-gotten gains, according to U.S. Attorney Debra Wong Yang.

She entered the plea Tuesday in federal court as part of a settlement in which she, her husband and her two businesses repaid the amount to the government.

Perez was the owner of Los Angeles-based Provident Home Health Care and San Dimas-based Tri-Regional Home Health Care, which billed Medicare for work that was never performed.

Perez came under federal investigation after a payroll clerk at Provident filed a whistleblower lawsuit in 2003, under the qui tam provisions of the False Claims Act. The government intervened in the case and got one of her coconspirators to agree to plead guilty.

The companies were "the epicenter of home health care fraud in Southern California," U.S. Attorney Debra Wong Yang said Tuesday.

Perez is scheduled to be sentenced Oct. 16 by U.S. District Judge Stephen Wilson. Prosecutors have recommended that she be sentenced to 46 months in prison, but she could get up to 59 years in prison.

A second registered nurse involved in the scheme, Margaret Tan, 29, of Santa Monica, who for a time was the director of nursing at Provident, has agreed to plead guilty to health care fraud charges.

Tan is expected to appear in court on October 23. Both Perez and Tan are cooperating with law enforcement in an ongoing investigation into Provident, Tri-Regional and a number of other home health agencies.

The scheme being run out of Provident and Tri-Regional came to light in April 2003 when a payroll clerk at Provident, Marietta Diaz, filed a "whistleblower" lawsuit against Perez, her husband, and the two home health agencies.

Specifically, the complaint alleged that from October 2001 through April 2003 Perez and her employees systematically billed the Medicare program for thousands of home health care visits that never occurred. Moreover, the lawsuit alleged, the scheme was executed by paying illegal kickbacks to patients, nurses, marketers and physicians, who were paid to participate in and disguise the fraudulent scheme.

The government, Diaz, and the defendants last year entered into a settlement agreement that led to $33,872,626.03 being repaid to the government. As a result of her whistleblower status, Diaz received 20.75 percent of that recovery. The case remained under seal during the ongoing investigation, and was unsealed last Tuesday.

United States Attorney Debra Wong Yang, who serves on the Attorney General's Advisory Committee Working Group on Health Care Fraud, added: "The cases against Perez and Tan represent a major step in this Office's home health fraud initiative. The cooperation we have obtained from key figures in this fraud has assisted us in recovering a particularly large amount of fraudulently obtained proceeds and should enable law enforcement to proceed against others involved in the scheme."

Earlier this year, three individuals were convicted and sentenced in a similar scheme at a smaller home health agency called Community Home and Health Care Services. Nida Campanilla, a 45-year-old Los Angeles resident, who owned Community was sentenced in May to two years in federal prison after making restitution of $608,000.

The investigation of Provident and Tri-Regional was conducted by the Federal Bureau of Investigation's Health Care Fraud Unit in Los Angeles; IRS Criminal Investigation Division; and the Department of Health and Human Services' Office of Inspector General, Office of Investigations. (AJ)

Opinion: Paxil Five-Year Litigation History

It would be difficult to find a better career than employment as a GlaxoSmithKline attorney, especially if job security is a top priority. Not a year goes by when the company is not doling out millions of dollars to defend against charges involving corporate misconduct of one kind or another.

A limited review of the company's involvement in the legal system over just the last five years reveals a clear pattern of habitual corruption. However, although Glaxo has paid billions of dollars in accumulated fines, penalties and awards to plaintiffs in civil cases, not one company official has been arrested and charged with a crime.

Glaxo's latest escapade was revealed on October 5, 2006, when Bloomberg News reported that Glaxo conducted a recall of Paxil CR, a selective serotonin reuptake inhibitor antidepressant, last month because some of the pills may lack an active ingredient, but that the company did not warn patients who may be taking the useless pills.

Doctors told Bloomberg that patients who either abruptly stop taking Paxil or get inactive pills, can face the risk of suicidal thoughts, shooting pains and flu like symptoms.

The Paxil CR pills are the highest dose sold, and can cause severe withdrawal symptoms, according to

Dr Stephen Ellen, a psychiatrist from the University of Massachusetts Medical School in Worcester. "If it is true that patients might have gotten dummy pills without knowing it, it is outrageous," he said.

According to Glaxo, the FDA knew about the problem and approved the limited recall plan, but FDA spokeswoman, Susan Cruzan, told Bloomberg that she did not know the details of the September Paxil CR recall.

This incident is even more outrageous because back on March 4, 2005, the government cited Glaxo for the exact same wrongdoing when the FDA and the Department of Justice initiated the seizure of Paxil CR tablets after Glaxo failed to meet the standards laid out by the FDA to ensure product safety, strength, quality and purity.

Among the violations noted then by the FDA, was the finding that the tablets could split apart and patients could receive a portion of the tablets that lacks any active ingredient, or alternatively a portion that contains active ingredient and does not have the intended controlled-release effect.

The seizures followed warrants issued by the U.S. District Courts for the District of Puerto Rico and the Eastern District of Tennessee and were executed by the U.S. Marshals Service at Glaxo's Cidra, Puerto Rico manufacturing facility, its Knoxville, Tennessee distribution facility, and a Puerto Rico distribution center.

The FDA said that Glaxo had voluntarily recalled some of the affected lots of Paxil CR but had failed to recall all of the affected lots and that failure resulted in the seizures by federal authorities.

"FDA and the Department of Justice will not allow drug manufacturers to ignore our high public health standards for drug manufacturing," said John Taylor, FDA Associate Commissioner for Regulatory Affairs in a statement released by the agency at the time.

"Once we discover a company is not following the standards, which were created to ensure safety and quality, we expect them to correct the deficiencies in an expedited manner," Mr Taylor stated.

"American consumers," he said, "deserve the best health care products on the market today, and companies that are not adhering to these standards cannot assure FDA and American consumers of the quality of their products."

A month and a half later, on April 28, 2005, the FDA announced that Glaxo had signed a consent decree to correct the manufacturing deficiencies at its Cidra, Puerto Rico facility.

However, the consent decree required Glaxo to post a penal bond of $650,000,000 contingent upon either successfully reconditioning the drugs seized in March 2005, or destroying them and paying the costs to the government.

To resolve the matter, Glaxo supposedly recalled all of the lots of Paxil CR made before November 2004, and agreed to an independent quality review of the manufacturing.

But now here we are in October 2005, with Glaxo still putting patients at risk due to the exact same wrongdoing.

When it comes to civil lawsuits against Glaxo, a steady stream of cases have been filed as a result of Glaxo's concealment of the known dangers associated with Paxil, including an increased risk of suicide, birth defects, violence and withdrawal syndrome.

But the company's most egregious conduct, many critics say, in light of all the serious adverse effects now linked to Paxil, was the concealment of the fact that with many patients, and especially children and adolescents, Paxil does not even work.

Glaxo has clearly put profits over patients when marketing Paxil. While concealing clinical trials that showed Paxil was ineffective and could cause children to commit suicide, according to New York state Attorney General, Elliott Spitzer, Glaxo raked in $55 million by selling Paxil to adolescents and children in 2002 alone, when more than two million prescriptions were written for pediatric patients.

The Los Angeles based Baum Hedlund law firm is handling lawsuits involving Paxil related child suicides. On March 23, 2006, the firm filed a national class action lawsuit against Glaxo on behalf of the mother of Trevor Blain, an 11-year old Kansas boy who committed suicide after being prescribed Paxil, and Tonya Brooks from Texas who attempted suicide while taking Paxil.

Trevor Blain was prescribed Paxil for "separation anxiety disorder" in October 2000 and he immediately began having angry outbursts and sleeping problems. However being the side effects of Paxil were not discussed with his parents, they did not realize that the troubling behavior could be linked to the drug.

Trevor continued to take Paxil until early November 2000, when he hanged himself in the family laundry room using his dog's leash. After the suicide attempt, Trevor remained in a coma until he died on December 7, 2000.

Plaintiff Tonya Brooks, age 17, was prescribed Paxil in 2004 after being diagnosed with social anxiety disorder. She too became agitated, aggressive and had sleep problems but was unaware that she might be experiencing the adverse effects from Paxil.

Tonya first attempted suicide by taking an overdose of Paxil and Ambien, a sleeping medication, and when that attempt was unsuccessful, she took a pair of scissors and gouged a hole in her leg two days later and was hospitalized for several days.

The two named plaintiffs in the case seek to represent all individuals under the age of 18 in the US who attempted suicide while taking Paxil, or the families of individuals who killed themselves while taking the drug.

The lawsuit's claims against Glaxo include fraud, negligence, strict liability and breach of warranty.

The Baum Hedlund firm has been handling SSRI lawsuits since 1990, and served on the Plaintiffs' Steering Committee in the first suicide related case involving Prozac, the first SSRI approved by the FDA.

Baum Hedlund partner, Karen Barth Menzies leads the firm's SSRI Department and was Lead Counsel for the Plaintiffs' Steering Committee in Paxil Products Liability Litigation.

Ms Menzies' advocacy efforts on behalf of SSRI suicide victims have not been limited to the legal arena. She has also testified on the matter before the California State Assembly and the FDA's psychopharmacologic Drugs Advisory Committee and has met with members of Congress from both the House of Representatives and the Senate regarding the risk of SSRI induced suicidality.

The firm is also now handling Paxil birth defect litigation. On July 28, 2006, Baum Hedlund filed a lawsuit on behalf of the parents of Adrian Vasquez, who was born with life-threatening birth defects on April 19, 2004, as a result of his mother unwittingly taking Paxil during pregnancy.

Adrian was born with congenital heart defects and since eight days old, he has undergone three open heart surgeries in an attempt to repair the heart defects. He will also likely have to undergo more surgeries in the future and possibly a heart transplant at some point.

The lawsuit alleges that Glaxo, "by directly and indirectly advertising, marketing, and promoting Paxil for the treatment of women during pregnancy and by placing this drug in the stream of commerce knowing that Paxil would be prescribed to pregnant women in reliance upon the representations … that Paxil was safe and effective for the treatment of women during pregnancy and without significant risk to the fetus."

The complaint also alleges that Glaxo "did not timely warn the medical community and consumers generally that taking Paxil during pregnancy is associated with a significant increased risk of birth defects and abnormal development of the unborn child."

In reviewing Glaxo's entanglements in the legal system over the last five years, the first guilty verdict in a Paxil-related suicide case was issued on July 7, 2001, when a jury in Cheyenne, Wyoming, ordered SmithKline Beecham (now GlaxoSmithKline) to pay $6.4 million to the relatives of Donald Schell, who after taking Paxil for only 2 days, shot and killed his wife, daughter, and granddaughter before killing himself.

At trial, the jury heard the expert testimony of British psychiatrist and SSRI researcher, Dr. David Healy, who told the panel that all SSRIs could trigger suicidal and violent behavior in some patients. On the stand, Dr Healy described his own studies that showed that SSRIs could even cause one in four "healthy volunteers" to become agitated, and in some cases suicidal.

"Healthy volunteers" means the subjects were not mentally ill to begin with.

Dr. Healy further revealed internal SmithKline documents from clinical trials conducted by the company to support his findings. He presented a summary of a study involving more than 2,000 healthy volunteers, taking either a placebo or Paxil, that found that hundreds of healthy volunteers on Paxil had experienced adverse reactions, ranging from insomnia or anxiety to attempted suicide, that doctors in the study coded as "possibly," "probably" or "definitely" caused by Paxil.

Glaxo's defense team told the jury that taking 2 Paxil pills could not have caused Mr. Schell's violent and suicidal behaviors. However, the summary of the company's own study showed that some healthy volunteers experienced anxiety, nightmares, hallucinations and other side effects coded as "definitely" caused by Paxil within two days.

In as early as four days, another volunteer experienced akathisia, a severe form of agitation that experts believe increases the risk of violence and suicide, and 2 other volunteers attempted suicide after taking Paxil for 11 and 18 days.

In the end, after considering all the evidence, the jury placed 80% of the blame for the tragedy on Glaxo.

Glaxo is notorious for concealing negative information from Paxil and legal experts say civil litigation has played a major role in exposing the dangers kept hidden for so long. According to Attorney Menzies, "Civil lawsuits uncover internal company documents to which not even the FDA has access."

"Through our Paxil litigation," she notes, "we've obtained documents that show a seriously troubling mentality of profit over safety and a callous disregard for the welfare of children."

"That's about as reprehensible as you can get," Ms Menzies says.

There is certainly enough available evidence to back up that assertion. For instance, on July 15, 2003, after meeting with the Canadian regulatory agency, Health Canada, Glaxo issued a public advisory in Canada alerting pediatric patients, their parents or guardians, and healthcare professionals that until further information was available that Paxil should not be given to pediatric patients, due to concerns of a possible increased risk of suicidal thinking, suicidal attempts or self-harm.

The advisory also said, "Paxil must not be used in pediatric patients with major depressive disorder due to the additional fact that studies have failed to show that Paxil was effective in this patient population."

In addition, Glaxo distributed letters to physicians in Canada and the UK, informing them that studies had failed to demonstrate the efficacy of Paxil in the pediatric population and that there was a doubling of the rate of adverse events, including emotional lability. However, Glaxo did not provide American physicians with this information.

Instead, it sent Medical Information Letters only to those physicians who specifically requested information concerning Paxil as a treatment for children and adolescents.

Glaxo also took steps to actively conceal the negative information about Paxil from the American public. In a June 10, 2003 press release in UK, Glaxo disclosed the suicidal thinking or attempts in children, and particularly in adolescents. But the company's American press release on June 19, 2003, stated that "there is no evidence that Paxil is associated with an increased risk of suicidal thinking or acts in adults" and that "not a single person committed suicide."

The American press release also provided no safety or efficacy information about Paxil regarding its use in the treatment of pediatric patients.

The five-year litigation history of Glaxo involves many different types of cases. For instance, in April 2003, Glaxo paid $88 million and signed one in a slew of corporate "integrity agreements," to settle charges that the company overcharged the Medicaid programs for Paxil and the nasal-allergy spray, Flonase, using a complex scheme that involved the re-labeling of products sold to an HMO at deeply discounted prices, to avoid the obligation to pay millions of dollars in rebates to the Medicaid program.

The Medicaid Rebate program requires Glaxo to give Medicaid the same discounts it gives to commercial customers like HMOs, hospitals and drug store chains. Drug companies have to report their lowest discount price for each Medicaid covered drug on a quarterly basis, and then pay a rebate based on that price.

To resolve another shady deal, in a February 6, 2004 press release, Glaxo announced that it had agreed to pay $175 million to settle an antitrust class action lawsuit involving the anti-inflammatory drug Relafen filed on behalf of direct purchasers, including pharmaceutical wholesalers.

This lawsuit alleged that Glaxo used "sham" patent litigation to block generic versions of Relafen from reaching the market. Glaxo filed the patent infringement lawsuits against two generic drug makers in 1997, which triggered an automatic 30-month stay of the FDA's authority to grant approval of the generic drug applications.

However, Glaxo lost the patent litigation when U.S. District Judge ruled after a trial that Glaxo had obtained the Relafen patent through fraudulent misrepresentations to the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office.

The two generic companies, Teva Pharmaceuticals USA and Eon Labs Manufacturing Inc., later filed antitrust suits alleging that Glaxo's patent lawsuits were "sham" litigation filed for the purpose of maintaining a monopoly.

In regard to these lawsuits, Glaxo's Februay 6, 2004 press release said, "Similar actions from other plaintiffs in the Relafen antitrust matter, including claims made by Teva, chain drug stores and Eon Labs have also been settled, resulting in further payments from GSK."

And of course the press release contained the standard claim that Glaxo "continues to believe that its actions were appropriate in obtaining and enforcing its patent for Relafen."

Five months after the announcement of the settlement in the patent case, on June 2, 2004, New York State Attorney General, Eliot Spitzer, issued a press release to report the filing of a lawsuit against Glaxo for concealing information about the safety and efficacy of Paxil in treating children and adolescents.

The complaint alleged that, starting in 1998, Glaxo engaged in a concerted effort to withhold negative information concerning Paxil and misrepresented data concerning the drug's safety and efficacy when prescribed for depression in children and adolescents and pointed out that Paxil "has not been approved for any condition or illness in children or adolescents."

Specifically, it said, Glaxo conducted at least five studies on the use of Paxil in children and only published and disseminated one, which showed mixed results on efficacy.

According to the lawsuit's complaint, because its studies failed to demonstrate efficacy and suggested a possible increased risk of suicidal thinking and acts for these youth:

"GSK sought to limit physicians' access to only the most favorable aspects of the data from these studies. To accomplish this, GSK embarked on a campaign both to suppress and, conceal negative information concerning the drug and to misrepresent the data it did reveal concerning the drug's efficacy and safety."

The complaint also alleges that Glaxo failed to disclose this information in "Medical Information Letters" that the company sent to physicians.

"By concealing critically important scientific studies on Paxil," Mr Spitzer said in the press release, "GSK impaired doctors' ability to make the appropriate prescribing decision for their patients and may have jeopardized their health and safety."

Mr Spitzer noted that an internal Glaxo document from 1998 showed that Glaxo intended to "manage the dissemination of data in order to minimize any potential negative commercial impact."

The lawsuit also alleges that Glaxo misrepresented the results of its research to sales representatives who promoted Paxil to doctors and portrayed the drug as having "remarkable efficacy and safety in the treatment of adolescent depression."

According to the lawsuit, Glaxo's studies did not demonstrate efficacy and in fact in one study, the children in the placebo group actually out performed the children in the Paxil group.

This impression was reinforced, the lawsuit said, by the mischaracterization of much of the information that Glaxo did disclose, and its Paxil-related targeting of psychiatrists who treated only pediatric patients.

In a statement responding to the allegations in the lawsuit, Barry Perlman, M.D., President of the New York State Psychiatric Association, said:

"The relationship between a doctor and a patient must be based on a sense of trust. In order to hold true to that principle, physicians must have access to all relevant medical information regarding treatment. Any obstacle placed in the way of full and complete communication with our patients undermines the trust upon which the doctor-patient relationship is based and prevents us from providing the best care we can to our patients."

Other members of the medical profession expressed similar views. Arthur Levin, Executive Director, for the Center for Medical Consumers, stated: "The ability of drug companies to pick and choose the research they provide doctors in support of their product is an outrageous conflict of interest and puts us all in harm's way."

Less than 3 months after the filing of the lawsuit, in an August 26, 2004, press release, Attorney General Spitzer reported that Glaxo would pay $2.5 million in disgorgement and costs to the State of New York as part of the agreement to resolve the charges that Glaxo concealed information about the safety and effectiveness of Paxil.

In addition, the press release said, Glaxo will establish an online "Clinical Trials Register" that will contain summaries of results for all GSK-sponsored clinical studies of drugs conducted after December 27, 2000 and any earlier studies that may be relevant.

"Each clinical study summary posted," Mr Spitzer advised, "will contain over 20 categories of information including information regarding the effectiveness of the drug tested, the type and severity of adverse side effects the study participants experienced, whether the goals or other components of the study were changed mid-stream, and whether the study was terminated early before full completion and why."

"This settlement holds GSK to a new standard of disclosure about studies concerning its drugs," Mr Spitzer said, "a standard that helps to ensure that doctors and patients have access to all scientifically sound information so doctors can prescribe appropriate medication for their patients."

As part of the settlement, Glaxo also agreed to ensure that all Medical Information Letters provided to doctors concerning off-label use of Paxil and other drugs "will fairly and accurately reflect the safety and efficacy data from clinical studies concerning off-label use."

Shortly after the settlement was announced, Mr Spitzer said that he would continue to watch Glaxo despite the settlement, because the company and its CEO, J.P. Garnier, appeared "unrepentant" with regard to changing behavior related to the disclosure of adverse clinical trials.

He referred to the "arrogance" of the Glaxo official as "offensive and problematic" and said, "We are going to be watching them with a hawk's eye to see that they have abided by the terms of the settlement."

In addition to Paxil suicide related litigation, for the past few years, Baum Hedlund has also been engaged consumer fraud litigation against Glaxo. The firm filed a class action similar to that of Mr. Sptizer's, likewise alleging that Glaxo suppressed evidence of Paxil's failed efficacy and increased risk of suicidality in children and adolescents, on behalf of residents of California, Florida, Massachusetts, Nevada, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Texas and Washington under the title, Smith v. GSK, Case No. 04CC00590, Superior Court of the State of California, County of Orange. According to Baum Hedlund, these particular states were selected because they have similar consumer protection laws.

The firm filed another similar class action in Minnesota on behalf of residents of Minnesota, Illinois, Missouri, North Dakota and Ohio, titled, Engh v. GSK, Court File No. PI 04-012879, State of Minnesota, County of Hennepin, District Court, Fourth Judicial District.

Although discovery is on-going in these cases, hundreds of thousands of documents have been amassed and reviewed, with key documents selected, organized and categorized to prove up the various causes of action in these cases. Depositions of key Glaxo employees have been taken and are continuing, as well as depositions from academic "thought leaders" hired by Glaxo to tout the benefits and safety of Paxil.

A little more than a month after Mr Spitzer charged the company with fraud in New York, on July 8 2004, Glaxo announced an agreement to settle anti-trust litigation involving the antibiotic drug, Augmentin, by paying $92 million to settle a class action brought on behalf of direct purchasers, including pharmaceutical wholesalers, and indirect purchasers such as consumers and third party payers.

The press release said the settlements were being submitted for review to the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, where the cases have been pending since 2002.

In an all too familiar refrain, Glaxo once again said that it continued to believe that its actions were appropriate in obtaining and enforcing its patents for Augmentin.

That said, on November 18, 2004, in a press release, the self-proclaimed not-guilty Glaxo said it had agreed to pay $29 million to settle a class action lawsuit brought by the New York State United Teachers Union and other plaintiffs on behalf of consumers forced to pay more for Augmentin.

NYSUT joined the class action in 2002 and other major plaintiffs included the Welfare Fund of the United Federation of Teachers, NYSUT's affiliate in New York City schools.

The suit alleged that Glaxo illegally maintained a monopoly over Augmentin, and without a generic equivalent, consumers were forced to pay more for the drug, according to a press release issued by the Teacher's Union.

"This should send a loud and clear message to the prescription drug industry," said the union's President Tom Hobart in hailing the settlement.

On November 18, 2004 Paxil was back in the spotlight when a press release announced a notification program ordered by the US District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, to alert consumers, insurers, and employee welfare benefit plans who paid for Paxil, or its generic equivalent, paroxetine, to a proposed $65 million settlement of the case against Glaxo.

This lawsuit claims that Glaxo broke antitrust and consumer protection laws by keeping lower cost generic versions of Paxil off the market and included a class of people who paid for Paxil or a generic paroxetine, from January 1, 1998 through September 30, 2004 and included consumers who paid any portion of the cost of Paxil or a generic paroxetine, as well as insurers and Employee Welfare Benefit Plans that paid on behalf of patients and insureds.

In a similar case, on December 1, 2004, the drug Relafen was back in the news again when Glaxo announced in a press release that the company would pay $75 million to settle a lawsuit with a class of consumers and third-part payors who purchased Relafen.

The Prescription Access Litigation (PAL) project had previously announced on May 24, 2004, that its attorneys had settled a suit against Glaxo alleging that it used illegal tactics to maintain its patent on Relafen, and to keep a generic, cheaper version off the market.

"This settlement agreement is a significant victory for consumers who struggle each day with the enormous cost of prescription drugs," PAL Project Director Alex Sugerman-Brozan said.

"Cases such as this," he stated, "put the drug industry on notice that consumers are fed up with the manipulation of drug prices: When drug companies use the courts to illegally extend their patents and keep drug prices artificially high, consumers will not hesitate to turn the tables and fight back through the courts."

The plaintiffs in this case also alleged that Glaxo fraudulently obtained a patent to cover Relafen when internal company documents showed that Glaxo knew that a patent should not be issued.

The settlement involved many Federal cases that had been consolidated in a US District Court in Massachusetts, that claimed that the monopoly had resulted in consumers and payors paying exorbitant prices for Relafen.

"Once approved by the court," PAL said in a statement, "the settlement will result in the creation of a $25 million consumer pool through which individuals may seek reimbursement for Relafen overcharges, and a $50 million pool for third party payors."

The court issued its final order approving the settlement on October 13, 2005.

In a completely different type of litigation, on January 21, 2005, the New York Daily Record reported that 1,300 Glaxo workers who were improperly classified as temporary employees were awarded a $5.2 million settlement.

With such classifications, the Record said, workers were not able to take advantage of the drug maker's employee benefit plans.

Six months later, in a September 20, 2005 press release, the US Department of Justice announced a $150 million settlement with Glaxo to resolve charges that the company engaged in a scheme "to set and maintain fraudulent and inflated prices" for two drugs, knowing that federal healthcare programs established reimbursement rates based on those prices.

According to the DOJ, the difference between the reimbursement rate and the actual price paid by healthcare providers is commonly known as the "spread," and the larger the spread the larger the profit or return on investment.

The drugs involved are typically administered in doctors' offices or hospitals to counter nausea brought on by chemotherapy and radiation. The DOJ said that Glaxo purposely overcharged government programs and then charged health care providers less than the reimbursement rate, to make it more profitable for those providers to sell Glaxo drugs.

The government also alleged that Glaxo engaged in a "double dipping" billing scheme by encouraging health care providers to pool leftover vials of one drug to create an extra dose, which then would be administered to a patient and rebilled to health care programs.

"Because reimbursement from federal programs was based on the fraudulent, inflated prices," the DOJ charged, "GlaxoSmithKline caused false and fraudulent claims to be submitted to federal healthcare programs."

The investigation in this case was massive and involved the Civil Division of the DOJ, the US Attorney's Offices for the Districts of Massachusetts and the Southern District of Florida, the Office of Inspector General for the Department of Health and Human Services, the Office of Program Integrity of TRICARE Management Activity, and the National Association of Medicaid Fraud Control Units.

The investigation began after the filing of a whistleblower lawsuit by a small, home-infusion company, Ven-A-Care of the Florida Keys under the False Claims Act which allows private persons to file whistleblower suits to provide the government with information about wrongdoing.

When persons submit false claims, under the FCA, the government is entitled to recover treble damages and $5,500 to $11,000 for each claim. In lawsuits in which the government is successful in litigating the case, the whistleblower can receive between 15-25% of the amount recovered. As part of the settlement in this particular case, the DOJ said the whistleblowers received approximately $26 million.

In addition, as a condition for doing future business with the Medicare and Medicaid programs, Glaxo signed an addendum to an existing Corporate Integrity Agreement requiring the company to report accurate average sales prices and average manufacturer's prices for its drugs covered by Medicare and other federal healthcare programs.

"This agreement marks another in a series of cases in which a pharmaceutical manufacturer has settled claims that its fraudulent drug pricing cost federal healthcare programs and taxpayers millions of dollars," said Assistant Attorney General Peter Keisler of the DOJ's Civil Division in the press release.

"The Justice Department will continue to pursue these types of fraud schemes vigorously," he said, "to make clear that we will not tolerate fraudulent pricing practices designed to reap profits for drug companies and doctors at the expense of healthcare programs for the poor and the elderly."

"Any pharmaceutical company that intentionally inflates the cost of prescription drugs with elaborate pricing schemes robs states and beneficiaries nationwide of millions of Medicare and Medicaid dollars," said Daniel Levinson, HHS Inspector General.

"We will not tolerate any company abusing programs intended to benefit our most vulnerable citizens," he stated

About six months later in March 2006, in a new case involving the same old behavior, Paxil was back in the news when Glaxo paid $14 million to settle another lawsuit brought by New York Attorney General Spitzer on behalf of 49 states, alleging the company fraudulently tried to delay competitors from marketing a generic version of Paxil by filing frivolous patent infringement lawsuits.

In a statement, another state Attorney General involved in the case, Jay Nixon from Missouri said: "GSK used the courts to hold onto a monopoly for a popular drug and the end result was that consumers - including Medicaid - paid more than they should have."

The settlement reportedly covered the cost of Paxil purchased by state and federally funded Medicaid programs but as usual Glaxo denied any guilt. "We made the decision that settling was appropriate," it said, "to avoid the expense and distraction of protracted litigation."

The next month, on April 17, 2006, the Sun Herald announced that a $3.5 million multistate antitrust settlement had been reached with Glaxo concerning the drug Augmentin, once again to settle charges that Glaxo fraudulently delayed generic competition.

In another case a few months later, in August 2006, Glaxo agreed to pay more than $70 million to settle a number of lawsuits alleging that the company over charged patients, health care plans and insurers for pharmaceuticals for more than a decade.

This litigation involved more lawsuits filed by New York Attorney General Spitzer and other state attorneys general claiming that Glaxo overcharged customers by hundreds of millions of dollars and accused the company of consumer fraud, commercial bribery, and false statements to government health plans.

Mary Anne Rhyne, spokeswoman for Glaxo, said the settlement would cover a class action filed by individual consumers, health-care plans, and insurers, according to Bloomberg News on August 11, 2006.

She said the company had also settled overpricing litigation or investigations by the attorneys general of New York, California, Connecticut, Montana, Nevada and Arizona and potential claims from 34 other states, including New Jersey, Delaware, and the District of Columbia, she said.

"Our lawsuit helped stop a long-standing practice that inflated the cost of drugs for people suffering from cancer and cheated the Medicaid system," Mr Spitzer said in the Bloomberg article. "Today's settlement provides significant restitution for consumers and the Medicaid program."

It is worth noting that this settlement with state governments came less than a year after Glaxo agreed to pay the $150 to settle the same charges in the lawsuit filed under the False Claims Act by Federal health care programs.

But last month, the government hit the jackpot with Glaxo. On September 12, 2006, the Huffington Post reported that Glaxo had agreed to pay more than $3 billion to settle charges by the IRS that the company under-reported profits to avoid paying US taxes.

However, here too, in true Glaxo form, the company denied any guilt and said it only paid the $3 billion to settle the case to avoid protracted litigation.

Comair sues U.S ., airport over crash

LEXINGTON, KENTUCKY Comair sued the federal government and the Lexington airport Friday over the deadly crash of a commuter plane that mistakenly took off from a too-short runway. Forty-nine people were killed in the accident Aug. 27.

In a statement, the airline said it intends to reach fair settlements with the victims' families but is suing to ensure other parties that bear responsibility pay their share.

Airport officials and their attorney had no immediate comment, saying they had not seen the lawsuit. A spokeswoman for the Federal Aviation Administration in Washington did not immediately return calls.

Comair also filed an administrative claim with the government, saying it has more than $17.3 million in losses related to the crash.

A week before the crash, a repaving project changed the taxi route to the 7,000-foot main runway that Flight 5191 should have used rather than the 3,500-foot-long runway at the Lexington-Fayette Urban County Airport.

Grandmother Sues USPC Over Fruitcakes

WILMINGTON, Del._Lucille Greene takes baking and mailing about 30 fruitcakes as Christmas gifts seriously. Seriously enough that the 88-year-old grandmother sued the U.S. Postal Service for emotional distress after accusations of being a terrorist from a postal clerk, according to her federal lawsuit.

In December 2002, Greene showed up at the Magnolia post office to mail fruitcakes to relatives and friends when, her lawsuit says, a postal worker asked her, "What kind of explosives do you have in here?" before shaking the box.

In the lawsuit, Greene said others in the post office laughed at her, leaving her upset and in tears. She said she tripped over a concrete parking barrier outside and fell, breaking her glasses and chipping a tooth.

The judge dismissed her allegations two weeks ago, and her appeal for $250,000 compensation, because Greene had a prior eye condition and contradictory testimony.

But U.S. District Judge Sue Robinson wasn't entirely unsympathetic. She wrote the clerk "was likely being less than courteous" despite following standing procedures for suspicious packages.

Even though she has to go a post office farther from her home, Greene said she hasn't given up on fruitcakes as Christmas gifts.

"My lawyer got a couple this year," she said.

Local dairyman sues the federal government -- again

Joyce Lobeck

The Sun, Yuma, Ariz.

Oct. 16--Hein Hettinga, a Yuma-area dairyman, says all he's doing is keeping the price of milk down.

But he has to fight the federal government to do it.

Hettinga has filed a lawsuit against the federal government protesting a law passed last spring by Congress that requires him to conform to federal milk marketing regulations.

"I had to do it," he said of his lawsuit filed recently in the U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia. "I felt I was wronged. I'm crying foul."

Hettinga is one of only a handful of dairymen in the United States who also process the milk their cows produce -- a "producer-handler." Traditionally, such independent producer-handlers have been exempt from federal regulations.

However, because Hettinga's operation exceeds monthly sales of 3 million pounds of milk, dairy cooperatives in Arizona and other states have argued that he presents an unfair advantage. Dairy cooperatives process and market milk produced by member dairies under federal regulations.

"I'm a real problem," Hettinga said. "I keep the price down. If I wasn't here, they (the co-ops) could charge 20 cents a gallon more."

He said the major processing companies are pushing the small independent producer-handlers out of business around the country. "The big ones are eating the little ones and raising prices."

Hettinga is determined not to be eaten. It's a fight he's been fighting for years, both in Congress and in the courts.

The latest blow against him came March 28, when the U.S. House of Representatives voted for the Milk Regulatory Equity Act, which already had been approved by the Senate.

In testimony in the House filmed by C-SPAN, lawmakers made several references to a "dairyman in Yuma, Ariz.," and even mentioned Sarah Farms by name as the target for the legislation.

As a result of the law, Hettinga now is subject to the marketing regulations and having to pay into the Arizona dairy co-op even though he receives no benefit from it. "I am sending hundreds of thousands of dollars a month to the government that's given to my competitors," he said.

The House voted on the regulatory bill 12 hours before Hettinga's case was scheduled to appear in court. He was requesting an injunction against a U.S. Department of Agriculture ruling that subjected his operation to the federal regulations.

As a result of the last-minute vote, the judge ruled that Hettinga's court case was no longer valid.

But Hettinga is again turning to the courts.

According to his attorney, Al Ricciardi, the new law is a bill of attainder and is in violation of the U.S. Constitution, which prohibits the government from singling out one individual or group and imposes punishment without a trial.

"We believe passage of the bill specifically is against Sarah Farms (Hettinga's milk-processing company in Yuma) and imposes economic punishment on him," Ricciardi said.

Hettinga said the federal milk marketing regulations have outlived their usefulness and today only serve to support the government bureaucracy created to administer them.

"The government has no business being in the milk pricing and structuring business," he said.

The next step in Hettinga's battle is waiting for the federal government to respond to his complaint, Ricciardi said, adding that he expects to receive that by late November. "We will reply to whatever they say."

Ricciardi said there are a number of cases that set a precedent for Hettinga's claim that the law is unconstitutional.

FEMA helping handicapped in trailers

By TOM WILEMON

FEMA has set up a hot line for handicapped people to call for assistance who have had problems with trailers provided by the federal agency.

The number to call is 1-888-294-2820 between 8 a.m. and 6 p.m. Monday through Saturday.

The federal agency began providing the hot line last week under terms of a court-approved settlement after handicapped individuals filed a federal lawsuit.

About 25 percent of Katrina evacuees have disabilities, but at the time the suit was filed, only 1 to 2 percent were provided with accessible trailers, according to the National Center for Law and Economic Justice. It and other advocacy groups, including the Mississippi Justice Center, provided lawyers for the disabled individuals.

Depending upon their needs, people may be entitled to a trailer with a ramp, wider doorways, more turn space for wheelchairs, lower appliances, accessible showers, grab bars near toilets or other features.

Claire Brou of Ocean Springs, a disabled U.S. Air Force captain, was the first plaintiff listed in the class action lawsuit. Other disabled South Mississippi residents who sued the federal agency were Eugene Joseph Johnson of Bay St. Louis and Terry West of Kiln.

Cobell sees parallels in Aboriginal wage theft

Elouise Cobell, the lead plaintiff in the Indian trust fund case, has been in Australia to support Aboriginals whose wages were stolen by the government.

Aboriginals, including children, were taken from their reserves and forced to work. Their wages were handled by "protectors," but in many cases, they never saw their money.

The system lasted from 1897 until 1972, when a government official offered a "full and final" settlement of $55.6 million to the workers. Half of the survivors have refused to take the payment and are preparing lawsuits. Of those who applied for the payout, one-third were rejected because the government couldn't find documents.

"I don't see how any Australian, after listening to the stories, can feel good. It's emotionally draining," Cobell said, The Australian reported.

But first, North Korea. The United Nations Security Council voted 15-to-nothing to impose sanctions on North Korea for developing a nuclear weapons program. With us now to talk about that, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton.

Mr. Ambassador, good morning.

MR. JOHN BOLTON: Good morning.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me show you a press report describing what happened yesterday afternoon, and give you a chance to respond. "The United States was compelled to water down key measures designed to ensure that the sanctions could be enforced. And China - which shares an 880-mile border with North Korea - said after the vote that it would ignore a critical provision, which calls on governments to inspect goods entering or leaving North Korea...

"The resolution stops far short of imposing the kind of sweeping trade embargo initially proposed by Japan. It no longer contains a U.S.-proposed provision to give North Korea 30 days to suspend its nuclear program or face 'further action.'

"The text also provides no additional authority to allow inspections of North Korean vessels suspected of transporting illicit weapons. The United States claims that it already possesses that power, but China maintains that such actions violate international law."

If the Chinese are unwilling to protect the 880-mile border, or to board North Korean vessels for inspections, what good are these sanctions?

MR. BOLTON: I think, first off, you have to remember that China voted in favor of this resolution, which is under Chapter 7 of the U.N. charter, and therefore binding on them. So I don't think there's any reason to believe that they're not going to abide by the terms of the resolution. And the, the guts of the resolution are sweeping sanctions against North Korea's nuclear, chemical and biological weapons programs and their ballistic missile program. The council was unanimous in saying that North Korea has to completely, verifiably and irreversibly abandon all of those programs. This in response to the nuclear tests and, frankly, in response to the missile test earlier this summer.

We think that the inspection provision that the resolution contains is essentially identical to the inspection provision that we proposed on Monday, so we're quite satisfied with this outcome.

MR. RUSSERT: Will the U.S. board North Korean vessels, if necessary, to inspect them?

MR. BOLTON: The intention that we have and that many other governments have, particularly those that are part of President Bush's proliferation security initiative, will be to continue to carry out the inspections that we deem necessary in, in aid of this resolution. And, again, the inspection provision is quite broad. It talks about compliance with all of the provisions of the sanctions paragraph of the resolution.

MR. RUSSERT: After the vote was taken, the North Korean ambassador to the U.N. addressed the assembly. Let's watch.

(Videotape, Yesterday):

MR. PAK GIL YON: The Democrat People's Republic of Korea is ready for both dialogue and confrontation. If the United States increase pressure upon the Democrat People's Republic of Korea persistently, the DPRK will continue to take physical countermeasures, considering it as a declaration of war.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: In effect, considering the sanctions as a declaration of war. After the ambassador spoke, he left the assembly, and—prompting you to say this. Let's watch.

(Videotape, Yesterday):

MR. BOLTON: I'm not going to waste any of our time responding to what the representative of the DPRK has said, but I want to call your attention to that empty chair. It is the contemporary equivalent of Nikita Khrushchev pounding his shoe on the desk of the General Assembly.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: That's back in 1960, and here's Nikita Khrushchev pounding his fist on the desk in a very similar time period. Is it helpful to compare the North Koreans to Mr. Khrushchev?

MR. BOLTON: I think the North Koreans twice now in the space of three months rejecting unanimous Security Council resolutions and walking out on the meeting of the council while it's still in session, a meeting they requested to participate in, I think shows a very unfortunate pattern of behavior on their part. Now, hopefully there's somebody in Pyongyang who's going to appreciate somewhat better the force of a unanimous Security Council resolution under Chapter 7. North Korea has the opportunity here to change course; the ball's really in their court at this point.

MR. RUSSERT: Three and a half years ago, President Bush made this firm commitment to the people of the United States and the world. Let's watch.

(Videotape, May 23, 2003):

PRES. BUSH: We will not tolerate nuclear weapons in North Korea.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: Will the president hold to that pledge?

MR. BOLTON: I think President Bush has made it very clear that he wants to have a peaceful and diplomatic solution to the problem posed by North Korea's continuing pursuit of nuclear weapons and delivery systems. That's part of the reason why we've pushed for these very strong sanctions in the Security Council, to deprive North Korea of the ability to continue its nuclear weapons and other programs of weapons of mass destruction. At this point, the choice is really in North Korea's hands; if they would come back to the six-party talks, if they'd comply with the declaration that they themselves joined in in September of 2005 to eliminate their nuclear weapons programs, they could have a much brighter future for the, for the impoverished people of North Korea. The choice is theirs at this point.

MR. RUSSERT: Then let's discuss nuclear accountability. Will this administration say to the North Koreans, "If we find that you are the originators of any nuclear materials that hit the U.S. or our allies, there will be full retaliation against North Korea"?

MR. BOLTON: Well, I think it's very clear to the North Koreans that, as the president said a couple of times in the past few days, we're going to meet all of our defense commitments to our allies—South Korea and Japan—in the region, we'll increase defense cooperation with them, and we will undoubtedly defend ourselves if we need to. But the point here is that by working multilaterally through the Security Council, twice now in three months, we've made it clear that we're trying to get North Korea to see reason and abandon these programs. Libya was also pursuing nuclear weapons until it came to the conclusion it was safer giving up nuclear weapons than continuing to pursue them. That's North Korea's choice to make now.

MR. RUSSERT: How concerned are you that North Korea would decide to flood South Korea or China with millions of refugees?

MR. BOLTON: Well, I think the, the possibility of refugee flows is very much on everyone's mind. And what we would like to see is the possibility of what our policy has been since 1945 when the peninsula was supposedly temporarily partitioned after World War II, and that's peaceful reunification under a democratic government. But the immediate concern is that North Korea not use the threat of refugee flows to intimidate its neighbors. That's their typical bargaining style, and it's a style we have to resist.

MR. RUSSERT: Has North Korea's nuclear capability increased during the Bush presidency?

MR. BOLTON: I, I think we have no way of being certain of that one way or the other, but that's why here, confronted with this attempted nuclear test by the North Koreans, we've sought and obtained these very sweeping sanctions. This is an example of multilateral diplomacy, it was a unanimous vote by the Security Council, and I think it's going to put enormous pressure on the North Korean regime.

MR. RUSSERT: Former Secretary of State Jim Baker said, "I believe in talking to your enemies. ... It's not appeasement to talk to your enemies." Why not sit down one-on-one with the North Koreans, look them in the eye and draw the line?

MR. BOLTON: Well, we have sat down one-on-one with the North Koreans in this administration on multiple occasions. The first was when we confronted them with their evidence—the evidence we had of their violation of the agreed framework. We've had discussions with them one-on-one in the context of the six-party talks. We could have more discussions with them one-on-one if the North Koreans would come back to the six-party talks. They were offered as recently as a couple of months ago in Kuala Lumpur the possibility of a foreign minister-level meeting with Secretary Rice in a six-party environment, they rejected that.

The difficulty here of conversations between North Korea and the United States doesn't lie with the United States, it lies with North Korea.

MR. RUSSERT: The North Koreans have said, and the Iranians have said, that "The lesson of Iraq is that the U.S. will invade you if you don't have nuclear weapons. And therefore, we're going to have a nuclear capability to help prevent a pre-emptive attack." What's your response?

MR. BOLTON: I think that both the North Koreans and the Iranians have been pursuing nuclear weapons for decades—the Iranians for close to 20 years, the North Koreans for at least 15 years and maybe more. This was a course of action that they had decided upon and were implementing long before the overthrow of Saddam Hussein. And again, you know, the president has said on any number of occasions, both with respect to Iran and with respect to North Korea, that he wants a peaceful and diplomatic solution.

MR. RUSSERT: Bottom line, will North Korea have a nuclear bomb when George Bush leaves office?

MR. BOLTON: I think the president's spending every effort he can make. He personally has engaged in extensive diplomacy this week. Secretary Rice will be going to the region. We're working with our friends and allies, we're working in the Security Council, we're working in the International Atomic Energy Agency. There's not much more multilateral or bilateral diplomacy we can imagine here. And we're putting pressure on North Korea. The real question now is what Pyongyang is going to do.

MR. RUSSERT: And if they do nothing, but continue to develop their program, what do we do?

MR. BOLTON: We're going to continue to ratchet up the pressure, make it clear that their international isolation is only going to increase, and we're going to make it, to the extent we can, impossible for them to continue the program through making sure they don't get the materials and technology and equipment they need to continue these programs.

MR. RUSSERT: May we have to use a military option eventually?

MR. BOLTON: The president never takes the military option off the table, but he has said more times than we can count, he wants a peaceful and diplomatic solution.

MR. RUSSERT: Ambassador John Bolton, we thank you very much for your views.

MR. BOLTON: Thank you.

MR. RUSSERT: Coming next, our Senate Debate series continues. This morning, all eyes on Minnesota where Republican Mark Kennedy faces off against Democrat Amy Klobuchar. They debate right here on MEET THE PRESS. Twenty-three days to go until the midterm elections.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: Our MEET THE PRESS Senate Debate series: Minnesota. The candidates square off after this station break.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: And we welcome Democrat Amy Klobuchar, Republican Mark Kennedy.

Welcome, both.

REP. MARK KENNEDY (R-MN): Good to be here, Tim.

MS. AMY KLOBUCHAR: Good to be here.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me pick up on North Korea, Mr. Kennedy. If the North Koreans simply ignore these sanctions, or the Chinese don't enforce the sanctions, what do we do? Do we use military action to stop their nuclear program?

REP. KENNEDY: I think we need to continue to ratchet up the diplomatic efforts. You know, we've had two U.N. resolutions unanimous. And we also need to continue to push China. China has the novel—nozzles that they can push on food, on energy. They have far more influence over North Korea. If they're going to be a world power, they have to act like a world power.

MR. RUSSERT: But President Bush said, "We will not tolerate nuclear weapons in North Korea." Do we hold him to his commitment?

REP. KENNEDY: Yes, but he also said that we want to have a peaceful and diplomatic solution. So we have to push every channel we can to achieve it in a peaceful and diplomatic way, not taking anything off the table. And we've seen a step towards that just yesterday. We need to continue, and we need to continue to push China.

MR. RUSSERT: But if George Bush leaves office with nuclear devices in North Korea, will it have been a failed policy?

REP. KENNEDY: We need to take every step we can to prevent that from happening.

MR. RUSSERT: Ms. Klobuchar?

MS. KLOBUCHAR: You know, as a prosecutor, I know that when people cross a line, Tim, there's got to be consequences. And in foreign affairs, it's the same thing. I believe these sanctions are incredibly important; we can't have North Korea begin to be some kind of weapons factory, and they can't be selling and bartering nuclear materials. And the rest of the world is watching. We don't want to create an arms race here. And especially Iran is watching, and that's why I think these sanctions are incredibly important.

MR. RUSSERT: But if the North Koreans ignore them, what do we do?

MS. KLOBUCHAR: Again, we have to keep ratcheting things up. We have to keep working with our partners.

But one of the things that went wrong here is that these multilateral discussions broke down, North Korea walked away from the table, and I believe we have to keep talking. We have to—it's good that China's part of this, but if it's moving in the right direction and if we believe it's in our national security interests, we should be talking to them directly. I mean, even during the Cold War we kept talking to Russia. And so the discussions are important, and we need to keep the diplomatic pressure on.

MR. RUSSERT: Should President Bush sit down one-on-one with Kim Jong Il?

MS. KLOBUCHAR: Again, it's too early to say that, but I believe that we need to keep those discussions going, as well as keeping the sanctions ratcheting up, if necessary, and keeping the military option on the table.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me show you what Bill Clinton, when he was president 13 years ago, said about North Korea right here on "Meet the Press."

(Videotape, November 7, 1998):

PRES. BILL CLINTON: North Korea cannot be allowed to develop a nuclear bomb.

We have to be very firm about it.

(End videotape)

MR. RUSSERT: So we've had two presidents, one Democrat, one Republican. When President Clinton said that, the North Koreans probably had the potential to build two nuclear devices. It's now up to 13. And if nothing is done when George Bush leaves office, it could reach 17. It seems as though the United States talks tough with North Korea, but allows the program to go forward.

MS. KLOBUCHAR: Again, keeping the military option on the table is key, but these sanctions are the first step, and unlike how we handled Iraq or where it was "Go it alone," I believe we have to work with our allies in the area. That's starting to happen more, but we have to keep that up.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me turn to Iraq, because it's an issue that's been very important in your campaign and one that I think is affecting elections all across the country. Mark Kennedy, you've been there three times. Let me go back to comments you made after your first trip in '03.

"On the whole, the trend [in Iraq] is very positive. ... Our troops ... face ... a collection of terrorists and thugs, of whom there are fewer each day." That's just dead wrong.

REP. KENNEDY: If you looked at the time in 2003, months afterwards, were we potentially a bit optimistic? Possibly. And we've seen more challenges than we expected, no question. But if you look at what's happened, we have trained 300,000 Iraqi troops. We have a government that is a unity government.

This is the number one issue in this race, and there are stark differences between my opponent, Ms. Klobuchar, and myself. She says it's a distraction. I think that it is one of the central fronts in the war on terror. Osama bin Laden and Zarqawi says as well. She has set out a specific timetable for bringing our troops home that would tell the terrorists when they can take over an oil-rich country as a sanctuary for terrorists. And I believe we ought to be bringing our troops home as soon as we can after we're sure the terrorists can't win. And she's also come out against a bill funding body armor for our troops that a majority of Democrats join me in supporting. We have no higher priority than to support our troops in time of war, and we have to win this war on terror.

MR. RUSSERT: But 10 months ago you said "Progress was clear, we're making great strides." Why shouldn't voters in Minnesota say, "This is rosy-colored glasses. It's not reality. There were no weapons of mass destruction and the level of sectarian violence is at an all-time high and Congressman Kennedy is saying, 'Everything's fine. We're making progress.'"

REP. KENNEDY: I never said everything's fine, but we are making progress.

MR. RUSSERT: "Progress is clear. We're making great strides. It's very positive"?

REP. KENNEDY: Each and every year I go back to Iraq. I see a government that is further down the path of being independent and addressing serious issues. Each and every year I go back, their military is more closely—more fully developed and taking over more and more of the responsibilities for us. The path is to make sure that terrorists can't win. And by so doing, allow us to bring our troops home. But we also need to make sure we're taking care of ourselves here at home. Again, key differences in the war on terror. Ms. Klobuchar has come for weakening the Patriot Act that has allowed us to have five years without a terrorist attack on our country. She's come out against making sure that we were paying attention when al-Qaeda was talking to somebody in America to make sure that we knew what plots they were planning. And she came out against a bill to make sure that we can get the intelligence we need from those we hold in custody to prevent future attacks. We cannot let the same poor judgment that Ms. Klobuchar has shown, that has made Minneapolis more dangerous, to be in the U.S. Senate, making America less safe.

MR. RUSSERT: Knowing what you know today, if the CIA came to you and said, "Congressman Kennedy, Saddam Hussein does not have weapons of mass destruction," would you still vote to go into Iraq?

REP. KENNEDY: We acted on the information that we knew at the time.

MR. RUSSERT: No, but knowing what you know today, would you still vote?

REP. KENNEDY: We acted—you know, you can't really play TiVo and rewind in the real world, but let me just say this: First of all, I stand by my vote. And second of all, we just got done talking about Korea. We just got done talking about consequences for actions. Seventeen U.N. resolutions. If we had let one of the top sponsors of terrorists, that was paying thousands of dollars to those families that had suicide bombers, if we had let 17 U.N. resolutions go by, what chance would we have of North Korea or China paying any attention to the resolution just passed yesterday?

MR. RUSSERT: So you'd still go into Iraq?

REP. KENNEDY: I stand by my vote. We can't rewind. We acted on the information we knew at the time and acted correctly.

MR. RUSSERT: Ms. Klobuchar, you said on your Web site, "2006 ... should be a year of transition in which we bring a significant number of our troops home." This is October, now, of 2006. You told the Star Tribune in Minneapolis, "I am saying change the course. I believe that we need to bring a significant number of our troops home. ... One would hope that by 2007, we would have withdrawn the vast majority of our troops [from Iraq]." That's next—a matter of months from now. Is that still your position?

MS. KLOBUCHAR: Tim, you know, the congressman is talking about body armor, and of course I support body armor for our troops, I support winning this war on terror by being smart, I supported the Patriot Act. But I will say this: the best way that we can protect our troops is to get this policy right, and I believe that that means changing course in Iraq.

We need to transition to Iraqi governance, we need to send the clear message that they have to take control of their own government, and that means no permanent military bases. The congressman and I differ on this. This means not saying 2010 we're going to have the same number of troops. And we need to be more accountable for the help that we're giving Iraq.

You look at what's been happening here, you know, $10 billion in cost overruns with Halliburton, putting a 24-yer-old in charge of the stock exchange with no financial experience, building a military academy for $75 million for the police and then finding out the plumbing isn't right so they have to demolish part of it. I believe that we do need to start bringing our troops home. Clearly, at this time, this late date in mid-October, we can't bring a significant number home. We have to be reasonable. I have never been one to say "Bring them all home tomorrow." I have never subscribed to one of those mandatory dates, because I understand that, despite my opposition to the war from the beginning, that we have to be responsible about how we bring our troops home.

MR. RUSSERT: But you did say, "Bring home a significant number this year," and you're saying now that's probably not doable. What about a "vast majority in 2007," which is what you said also?

MS. KLOBUCHAR: These predictions were built on the promises and the predictions of progress from this administration, and we simply haven't seen that. So you have to be reasonable in what you're going to do here. But let me tell you this, you cannot solve a problem that you don't admit exists, and that is what's going on here with the congressman. This war has basically devolved into a civil war. Eight times the number of deaths were caused by sectarian violence other than by bombs. You have Shiite militia roaming the neighborhoods and taking young men, putting them in cars, shooting them in the head and dumping them out on the streets. This is a civil war, and, yes, we need to be more accountable and do a better job of training the police, but we also have to realize that this solution isn't going to be more boots on the ground, it's going to be a diplomatic and political solution. It's—we have done this before with even more difficult situations. This war, as of Thanksgiving, will have lasted longer than World War II. So I believe that we need to bring people together and help this country to come up with a diplomatic and political solution in addition to giving them the tools that they need.

MR. RUSSERT: Speaking of predictions, Congressman Kennedy, this is what you said six months ago. "I fully expect that over the next year there will be a significant number of troops who will be returning home because of success in Iraq." Flat wrong.

REP. KENNEDY: I said in November that...

MR. RUSSERT: But this is February, six months ago.

REP. KENNEDY: ...in February that we expected troops. We have less troops, not as much as I would like, we've run into tougher patches...

MR. RUSSERT: A significant number. Why can't you say you were wrong?

REP. KENNEDY: I was wrong in the significant number, I was right in terms of the fact that there are less troops, but I'm also right in saying, whatever I said, I'm going to support what the commanders in the field say. And when we talk about accountability—let's talk about accountability.

Ms. Klobuchar refuses to be accountable for coming out against the bill funding body armor for our troops. She refuses to be accountable for statements that she says, and, and you didn't get the June of this year NPR, where she said she wanted more than half the troops out this year and all of them out by next year. That is a clear timetable. That is irresponsible. And she's also—continues to try to mislead people, not just about her own record and where's she's taken positions, but about my record as well. I never voted for permanent bases. I voted for making sure that we could have an agreement as to keeping our troops in a sovereign country and making sure that we had the base protection that would keep our troops safe. We need to bring our troops home as soon as we can, after we're sure the terrorists can't win. But we don't need to let politicians' predictions or anything else drive this, it has to be the commanders in the field and what is going to achieve that end.

MR. RUSSERT: To that end, Ms. Klobuchar, there was a question asked of you back in March. "QUESTION: So your desire to withdraw troops does not depend on the commanders agreeing with it. They should be told to do it and just told to find the best way to do it. AMY KLOBUCHAR: Correct."

And then this: "If the president is unwilling to provide a plan [for the drawdown of American troops], Congress should call upon the Joint Chiefs of Staff to do so."

So you would overrule the military commanders and you think the Senate has the authority to direct order the Joint Chiefs of Staff to draw down troops?

MS. KLOBUCHAR: Tim, no, I don't believe that. What I was saying here is because the president refuses to bring us a plan and deal with this as it is, as a civil war, that we need to have the direction coming from Washington. Of course we should listen to the commanders on the ground. In fact, there's generals that have returned from there that say we need to change course. Senator Warner just came back from there and said "Give this a few months, and we need to change course." Jim Baker went over there and started talking about this.

What I'm hearing is a general consensus around what I'm talking about, that we cannot, as Congressman Kennedy and the president are talking about, just stay the course indefinitely with more troops dying, over $300 billion spent.

And the idea is to listen to the commanders on the ground, but to have the direction come from Washington that we need to change course. I was talking about bringing the Joint Chiefs in to discuss with Congress what the plan should be, because I just do not see it coming from this commander in chief.

MR. RUSSERT: If we withdrew from Iraq and a full-blown civil war erupted, what do we do?

MS. KLOBUCHAR: First of all, we aren't going to completely withdraw from Iraq at this moment. And I believe that we need to redeploy some of these troops to surrounding areas so that they would be ready to come in. And I'm not suggesting...

MR. RUSSERT: Where? Where would we put them?

MS. KLOBUCHAR: Well, in Afghanistan, where we've seen a complete, a deterioration of the situation there, in part because we have put singular focus on Iraq, and to surrounding areas, perhaps Kuwait, other places that we can keep these troops so that can come back in if necessary. Again, reaching out to regional powers to get their help. You cannot, you cannot talk about this unless you acknowledge that this is a civil war that's going on here. Yes, there's terrorists there. In fact, 16 agencies of this government who deal with national intelligence said that this war has fomented more terrorism.

So if we look at what we need to do about the war against terror, we need to get—to be smart about this, we need to focus on Afghanistan again and get that situation under control, we need to beef up our homeland security where the 9/11 Commission has given us D's and F's. You know, the president identified the "axis of evil" when he talked about North Korea and Iran. We have them both now talking about nuclear weapons.

MR. RUSSERT: Republicans have been talking about Iraq in a very different way. Jim Baker, the head of the Iraq study group, former secretary of state for former President Bush: "I happen to think ... that there are alternatives between ..." the course and cut and run and staying the course. Negotiate a settlement. Strong suggestion.

And this from John Warner, Republican, chairman of the Armed Services Committee: "I assure you, in two or three months, if this thing hasn't come to fruition and if this level of violence is not under control, ... I think it's a responsibility of our government ... to determine: is there a change of course we should take? And I wouldn't take off the table any option at this time."

So you talk about timetables. The chairman of the Armed Services Committee, Republican, has basically said to the Iraqis, "You have 90 days to stop the violence or we could very well change the course, and every option's on the table."

REP. KENNEDY: Senator Warner has also said and rejected a specific timetable for withdrawal. And I agree with Senator Warner. We ought to, not just in two or three months, but at every stage along the way, say, "Is there adjustments we need to be making?' We have been making adjustments. I've seen the adjustments in the three years I've been there. And we need to continue to make adjustments.

But when you say that the solution, as Miss Klobuchar says, is diplomatic and political, you can't negotiate with people that are ruthless and glory in killing innocent women and children. We need to make sure that terrorists can't win so that we can bring our troops home as quickly as possible.

MR. RUSSERT: No matter how long it takes?

REP. KENNEDY: We need to make sure that the terrorists can't win. We cannot let Iraq became a sanctuary for terrorists.

MR. RUSSERT: And you believe this war can be won militarily?

REP. KENNEDY: There's no question that we need to also prod the political forces within Iraq, as we have been. And make sure they address some of the key issues that are, that are causing some of the foment, making sure that we get this federalism issue solved. We understand federalism in America; we have states and federal government. We also need to make sure they get this "Who owns the oil?" I think they ought to take a path where the Iraqi people own the oil, just like they do in Alaska. We also need to make sure that they see the progress on the ground.

But, these are steps that need to be pushed politically, but they can't be done if we're saying, "We're going to pull our troops away and leave a young democracy without the kind of support necessary to make sure it has time to get a political solution."

MR. RUSSERT: You invoked Miss Klobuchar's name; I'll give her a chance to respond.

MS. KLOBUCHAR: Tim, this is just more of the same. More of the same of this administration, more of the same with Congressman Kennedy. And, you know, I just heard Trent Lott a few weeks ago, the press asked him, "What do, what do you think about Iraq?" and he said to the reporters, "You are the only ones obsessing about Iraq. Real people in the real world aren't obsessing about Iraq." Well, I guess he didn't talk to the mom up in Mahnomen, Minnesota, whose child is going on his second tour of Iraq and she can't sleep anymore. Or Claremont Anderson in western Minnesota, who's driven hundreds of miles to come to our events, and every time he cries when someone asks a question about Iraq because his child was killed over there.

These are real people in the real world who are looking for solutions. And the way to get this right for our troops is to give them equipment that they deserve, but also to get this policy right, and to admit that we need to change course—not do anything radical, not bring all the troops home right away—but to pursue a diplomatic and political solution. And I don't think that it's right for Congressman Kennedy to criticize me for that when members of his own party and experts in this area are saying the same thing.

MR. RUSSERT: Well, what question would you ask him?

MS. KLOBUCHAR: I would ask him how come he won't even admit that he was wrong about voting for this war when we are in the situation we're in, when we've spent over $300 billion, when many members of his own party have admitted that this war was not the right direction, that in fact it has fomented terrorism. That we now have 16 agencies of our own government, of President Bush's administration saying that this has added more terrorism in this world.

MR. RUSSERT: Let you answer that question, and ask her one.

REP. KENNEDY: Let's talk about what the 16 agencies said. They said that we are clearly activating terrorists in Iraq, having taken the challenge to them. But they also said we have to prevail. If we don't prevail, it will greatly mushroom this threat, let it grow in size, and come to face our future generations, where we wouldn't be able to ask—answer the question that our kids would say to us, "Why did you let this happen?" They said that if we, if we lose, that's what will happen; if we win, we will greatly degrade what's happening on the other side.

And what I would say—what would—what would I ask my opponent: How can you change your position from saying we ought to ignore commanders months ago, that we ought to have a specific timetable, and call that consistent? How can you say you're going to support our troops in the field during a time of war when you came out against a bill funding body armor for our troops that a majority of Democrats, including Nancy Pelosi, supported? How can you say that you're going to comply by the 9/11 Commission when you came out for weakening the Patriot Act, when you came out against making sure we were paying attention to what al-Qaeda was saying in this country about plotting future attacks, and you came out against a bill for making sure we could get information from those we hold in custody, and call this bill that John McCain, who still bears the marks of torture, call this bill that is critical for our security a torture bill? How can you be so disrespecting? It's, it's consistent with what her own employees said about her, that this is someone who only cares about her career advancement, and nothing else. How can you criticize not just McCain, but also our troops in the field? Last week, she criticized the way our troops were training Iraqi troops. We need to have somebody with a consistent view on bringing our troops home as soon as we're sure the terrorists can't win.

MR. RUSSERT: A lot of questions there.

MS. KLOBUCHAR: Tim, I would say this is why we're in the mess we're in in Iraq, because of this political gamemanship. Congressman Kennedy didn't even answer my question, and instead proceeded to ask many questions. And I will tell you a few of these answers.

I am committed to this war against terror. I am someone who puts people in jail for a living. I am tough on security. And I will tell you this: I believe that the people on the front line have to have the tools to wire-tap, they have to have the tools to do the surveillance that we need. I supported the Patriot Act, I did support some of the changes that were later made to the Patriot Act with library books, library records and things like that. I also believe that we should have gotten that detainee bill right, something like what was originally passed out at the Senate Armed Services Committee. The Supreme Court gave this Congress a duty, and the Supreme Court said to this Congress, "Get this right." Instead, they passed a very broad bill that I don't believe will meet constitutional muster. I didn't have to take this position, but I feel it's the best position because they were putting their short-term political gain in front of the bigger quest of winning the war against terror so that they could go on Sunday morning talk shows like this one and claim that their opponents were weak on security and weak on terror. I think Democrats should welcome this debate on security. And we're having it in our state, and the people are listening.

MR. RUSSERT: Let me turn to a domestic issue where there's a big difference. Mr. Kennedy, Ms. Klobuchar said that we should roll back the Bush tax cut on those making over $200,000 a year, because the federal debt is now $8 trillion, and we have to get our finances in order, and this is a way of raising revenue.

REP. KENNEDY: She's said a lot of things on taxes. Her own proposal says that she wanted to have a trillion and a half increase in taxes...

MR. RUSSERT: But, but specifically, what about rolling back the tax cut on those who make more than 200,000?

REP. KENNEDY: We have had six million new jobs. The economy was flat on its back after 9/11. We passed tax relief to reward, and people—to let them keep more of their hard-earned money. Families, small business, those that take risk and create jobs. Six million new jobs have been created. We cannot be raising taxes, putting this economy back on its back, and also not growing jobs. We have to keep the approach of keeping spending under control. I'm the author of the line-item veto. I don't understand why we want to build a bridge to nowhere in Alaska, a rain forest in Iowa.

MR. RUSSERT: But you voted for both those proposals.

REP. KENNEDY: I voted for every single Jeff Flake amendment to take out these crazy...(unintelligible)...

MR. RUSSERT: But in final passage, those proposals were legislation you voted for.

REP. KENNEDY: They were, because I support roads, because I support making sure that we're moving forward with key programs. But you ought not to hold a whole bill hostage because there's silly stuff in it. We ought to have a line-item veto for the president, whether Republican or Democrat, to cut that junk out of there, hold Congress accountable, keep spending under control.

MR. RUSSERT: But you have a Republican—you have a Republican president.

REP. KENNEDY: So you can keep taxes low and keep building jobs.

MR. RUSSERT: A Republican House, a Republican Senate, you have a $250 billion deficit, an $8 trillion debt.

REP. KENNEDY: There's no question that I would like the president to take a little bit more leadership on spending. There's no question that we have had obstruction in the U.S. Senate that has bogged down not only our ability to take further steps on fiscal responsibility, but many other things as well. We do need to push forward and make sure that we have strong fiscal measures to keep spending under control.

MR. RUSSERT: Ms. Klobuchar, 57,000 households in Minnesota make over $200,000 a year. A lot of small businesses, people who create the jobs. And you want to come along and pound them with a new tax increase by taking away their tax cut. Why?

MS. KLOBUCHAR: Let me talk about why this is important to me and important to the people of our state. Right now we're in a situation where our debt is approaching $9 trillion, where this administration and this Congress took a $200 billion surplus and turned it into $250 billion deficit. Why does this hurt the people in our state? It's not just some chart on a wall. One out of 12 of the federal tax dollars that they're paying goes to interest on this debt.

And this is my solution: I'm the only candidate in this race that has come out with a plan to balance the budget. First of all, let's look at those $70 billion that's being sheltered in the Cayman Islands and Bermuda for multi-millionaires. That report came out August 1. Get rid of those shelters. That takes in 70 billion. Next, look at capital gains. Not changing the rate, but having a third-party validator like brokerage houses post those because there's underpayment. That brings in $17 billion. Roll back the tax cuts to the Clinton levels, to the top 1 percent, the Clinton levels when we had record jobs produced in this country. That brings another $56 billion in.

Then you go to the discretionary spending. I don't agree with the congressman that this is silly stuff. Even if you reduce half of that discretionary spending, it's $15 billion. Get rid of the no-bid contracts so we have competitive bidding, $10 billion. Go back to the pay-as-you-go rules that we had during the Clinton administration and then reduce these oil subsidies and these drug subsidies they give away.

MR. RUSSERT: Discretionary spending, what programs do you cut?

MS. KLOBUCHAR: Well, first of all, we have had a 50 percent increase in discretionary spending. The Cato Institute identified that.

MR. RUSSERT: What, what specifically?

MS. KLOBUCHAR: And you—well, let's start with the one the congressman voted for, the bridges to nowhere, the rain forest in Iowa, the waterless urinals in Michigan.

MR. RUSSERT: But as you know, 60 percent of our federal revenues go...(network technical difficulties)...Medicare and pensions. Will you go after those?

MS. KLOBUCHAR: I believe that if we can shore up this deficit and balance the budget, that we can then start shoring up Social Security. This Congress has raided $925 billion from Social Security. And you go back to the Clinton administration.

MR. RUSSERT: Would you raise the retirement age?

MS. KLOBUCHAR: I don't believe that is the solution.

MR. RUSSERT: Cost of living increase?

MS. KLOBUCHAR: I don't believe that's the solution. Just think back to the Clinton administration, 1995 balanced the budget. By the year 2000, the plan was to put $200 billion, sock it away for Social Security. We had 15 years on what we have now. Social Security was saved for 15 additional years, now it's been moved back. If we can get that balanced budget in place and we can move on this, we're going to be able to secure Social Security for the future. I believe Social Security is the fundamental way that we can protect people in this country.

MR. RUSSERT: With no changes in the system?

MS. KLOBUCHAR: Look, we can have a bipartisan commission look at those changes. They should be options to be looked at, but it would be a hard sell on me because I believe our priority should be to balance the budget. When you talk to an iron ore mine worker up in northern Minnesota, where my grandpa worked and my dad grew up, it's easy for us to talk about adding age to the retirement. For them, it's a lot harder. So if there is a better way to do this by being fiscally responsible instead of giving, you know, billions of dollars in oil giveaways, I don't lose sleep at night about whether the CEO of Exxon, who's retiring and just made $400 million, whether or not he's doing OK. I'm thinking of those workers in Minnesota.

MR. RUSSERT: Congressman Kennedy, one of the issues in this campaign has been your relationship with George Bush. Here's the National Journal: "At his [Minnesota] GOP convention speech ... Kennedy never mentioned President Bush." And yet the Congressional Quarterly says that during your tenure in Congress, you supported the president 92 percent of the time. Here's a news clip which talks about "Kennedy has been considered a strong Bush ally since joining the House in 2000, according to Minnesota political analysts, who say they are surprised by his ads playing down a party affiliation and making no mention of the president. ...

"'This is a party guy,' said political scientist Lawrence R. Jacobs of the University of Minnesota. 'He ran in a district that leaned pretty heavily Republican, and the way to win in that district is to run as a loyal Republican. Now he's running in a statewide race where the president's approval ratings are poor. ... It's an attempt to reinvent himself.'"

Do you belive that George Bush is a great president?

REP. KENNEDY: I belive history is going to make that decision. This is a guy who's human, like all of us. Has made mistakes, we've all made mistakes. You know, there are things...

MR. RUSSERT: Are you running as a George Bush Republican?

REP. KENNEDY: I'm running as Mark Kennedy. I'm running at a guy who believes strongly in values that I was raised with in Minnesota, the vote's based on what's best for Minnesota families.

MR. RUSSERT: But 92 percent of the time, you voted for President Bush.

REP. KENNEDY: There—you know, I don't where they get those statistics, but I can tell you—you know, they, they only take one out of 10 votes. But I can tell you there are things I disagree with the president on, whether it be No Child Left Behind that I voted against my first year in Congress, or ANWR. There are things that I agree with him on, that you get prosperity for our kids not by raising taxes but by keeping it low, and that we keep our families safe by being on the offense in the war on terror.

But let me just address—we keep hearing Amy Klobuchar walking away from what she said before and trying to mislead people. She comes out against oil subsidies. At the state fair debate, she said that she was for the same energy bill that I voted for. She comes out and says in, in an ad that she's going to save $90 billion, $90 billion, by having government-run prescription drug program on a program that only costs 60 billion. How do you save 90 billion on a program that costs 60 billion? And let me tell you, on Social Security, it's going to be a lot more than a hard sell for me to be raising the retirement age. That is not the solution. I will oppose that. That is just one of many differences on Social Security where she wants to give Social Security to illegal immigrants, which would put billions of dollars at risk on a program that is already strained.

MR. RUSSERT: You can respond to that.

MS. KLOBUCHAR: Thank you. I really appreciate that. I will say that the people of Minnesota don't really care if it's 92 percent or 97 percent. What they care about is the effect that these policies have had on them and the effect that this kind of negative attacks and this kind of gamemanship have had on the people of Minnesota. Congressman Kennedy just started to talk about Social Security benefits for illegal immigrants. I suggest your readers go onto the Star Tribune Web site from yesterday and they can see that the newspaper in Minneapolis and St. Paul came out and said that his claims were completely false, and in fact the bill that he's talking about, which was supported by a Republican senator, Senator Coleman, did not contain that provision.

This is the kind of political gamemanship we have been hearing from the beginning. And the reason...

MR. RUSSERT: So you oppose Social Security for illegal immigrants?

MS. KLOBUCHAR: Yes, I do. And the reason, you know, that he has gone off on his attacks again is that he really didn't want to answer your question. He spent the last few campaigns bragging about how close he was with President Bush, and now he's spending this campaign bragging about how independent he is from President Bush.

You know what the people of Minnesota care about? They care about that their gas prices went up to 3 bucks a gallon this summer, and that is—when they got a long way to work, it's hard to do; that their health care premiums went up 60 percent since he's been in office.

MR. RUSSERT: But, but, but you also—let me just ask you—you, you said a couple things about President Bush to the Pulse of the Twin Cities publication I want to ask you about.

MS. KLOBUCHAR: Mm-hmm.

MR. RUSSERT: "QUESTION: Would you vote to support the Russ Feingold resolution to censure President Bush? AMY KLOBUCHAR: No, not now. QUESTION:

Do you favor the impeachment of President Bush? AMY KLOBUCHAR: No, not now," suggesting that you're open to both censure and impeachment.

MS. KLOBUCHAR: I don't think you should ever rule anything out, but I'm telling you, my focus is not impeachment, it's not censure. My focus is to go to Congress and get something done. The questions were "Would you support these?" And I said, no, I did not.

MR. RUSSERT: "Not now." Hillary Clinton is coming to Minneapolis this week to raise money for you. Do you think she'd make a good president?

MS. KLOBUCHAR: You know, I think there are a number of good Democratic presidential candidates. I'm not weighing in on that. I've got enough to do in Minnesota.

MR. RUSSERT: But you'd be proud to support Hillary Clinton if she was the nominee?

MS. KLOBUCHAR: I believe that any of these Democratic candidates would be better than our current president.

MR. RUSSERT: As you know, Mr. Kennedy, there's a lot of concern amongst Republicans about the war in Iraq, about the Mark Foley page scandal, and there is an article—sorry, comments from the Minnesota Public Radio, an interview with Norm Coleman. And it says here, "Documents filed at [Minnesota television stations] KARE-11, KSTP-TV and WCCO-TV show that the National Republican Senatorial Committee has not bought or scheduled any ad time on behalf of [Mark] Kennedy.

"Republican Senator Norm Coleman," a Republican senator from Minnesota, "acknowledges that Kennedy faces an uphill battle. Coleman said he's encouraging the campaign officials to invest in Minnesota but says they may be more concerned about other contests."

Are the national Republicans pulling out of your race?

REP. KENNEDY: They, they are not. We're getting a lot of good cooperation from the National Republican Senatorial Committee. We just had six senators in last week. I won my first race one-on-one, and I'm happy to win any race that way.

But if I may respond to some of the charges that Miss Klobuchar made, saying in the Star Tribune—a liberal reporter in a liberal paper—got it wrong. If you look at it, she voted for a bill, she said she would support a bill, the Senate immigration bill, that would give 12 million people that didn't have benefits benefits. The paper says, $5 billion cost to Social Security. That's—if, if you included Medicare and Medicaid, that'd be 50 billion. If there's 50 billion more costs, how do you have more costs if you're not supporting something? I would have not supported the bill because of that.

MR. RUSSERT: This is the McCain bill?

REP. KENNEDY: The, the bill...

MR. RUSSERT: The same McCain that you're praising on the torture...

REP. KENNEDY: The, the...

MR. RUSSERT: ...you're criticizing him on immigration.

REP. KENNEDY: I'm not criticizing him on torture, and I am saying that I would have voted against that bill.

MR. RUSSERT: You're praising him on the torture bill. The McCain...

REP. KENNEDY: I, I am criticizing...

MR. RUSSERT: ...bill, which is also supported by President Bush.

REP. KENNEDY: I, I also do not agree with Senator McCain on immigration in that case. But let's go back to what—she supported a bill that had—giving Social Security to illegal immigrants. And when you talk about Bush, people aren't going to be focused on Bush, they're going to be focused on issues. And I can tell you, Tim, I've been all over the state of Minnesota. People are finding a lot of support for my policies of keeping spending under control so we can keep taxes low, and making sure that health care's controlled by doctors and patients, not lawyers and big government. And making sure that we bring our troops home as soon as we can, after we're sure the terrorists can't win.

I don't see the kind of support out there for Ms. Klobuchar's, you know, proposals to have a trillion and a half increase in taxes. The long list of taxes she's covered isn't going to cover a trillion and a half. It just tells you, when a liberal says they're going to soak the rich, the middle class gets drenched. They don't see a lot of support out there for giving Social Security to illegal immigrants, for rationing prescription drugs, and for bringing the same policies that has made, and the same bad judgment that's made Minneapolis having twice the murder rate of New York City under her tenure—talk about accountability—to the U.S. Senate.

MR. RUSSERT: I'll consider that a closing statement. I started with you.

I'll give you 30 seconds, and we're out of time.

MS. KLOBUCHAR: OK. I believe that I will be a good senator for the state of Minnesota if they give me that honor. I'm the granddaughter of a miner, I'm the daughter of a newspaper man and a teacher. I'm a mother, I'm a wife, I'm a prosecutor, and I'm an advocate. And I have the determination to make change in Washington. And if the people of Minnesota give me that opportunity, I will get things done for them.

MR. RUSSERT: Amy Klobuchar, Mark Kennedy, big differences on big issues. We thank you for sharing them with our viewers.

Our Senate Debate series continues in two weeks. Another closely watched Senate race, Maryland. Democratic Representative Ben Cardin vs. Republican Lieutenant Governor Michael Steele. Right here in two weeks.

And we'll be right back.

(Announcements)

MR. RUSSERT: That's all for today. We'll be back next week with an exclusive Sunday morning interview with Democratic Illinois Senator Barack Obama. That's next week, right here on MEET THE PRESS. If it's Sunday, it's MEET THE PRESS.

Hang in there, Buffalo, help's coming.

ABC – THIS WEEK

STEPHANOPOULOS: This Week -- October surprise. As North Korea goes nuclear, who will take the blame?

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON, (D-NY): Some of the reason we are facing this danger is because of the failed policies of the Bush administration.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR JOHN MCCAIN, (R-AZ): Now we are facing the consequences of the failed Clinton administration policies.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: And how will the world respond?

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: The message today shows to the leader of North Korea: The world is united.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Our headliner this morning, America's U.N. Ambassador, John Bolton.

Then, we're on the trail.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: So what's the message there? Elect me, I'll enforce the Ten Commandments?

FORD: No, elect me, I know the difference between right and wrong.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CORKER: Congressman Ford continues to distort, continues to mislead, continues to run away from who he really is.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: The surprisingly tight race in Tennessee that could swing the Senate. George Will, Martha Raddatz and Fareed Zakaria debate the week's politics on our roundtable. Plus, Marg Helgenberger on her first time.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP) HELGENBERGER: If something with sexual connotations will get people to vote, why not?

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: And as always, the Sunday Funnies.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

JON STEWART, HOST, THE DAILY SHOW : Let's move on to the good news. As of last night, North Korea has one less nuclear bomb.

(LAUGHTER)

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Good morning, everyone. The U.N. Security Council voted unanimously yesterday to punish North Korea for its nuclear test last week. And we're joined this morning from the security council chamber by the man who led this effort for the United States, America's ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton. Good morning, Mr. Bolton.

BOLTON: Good morning.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Not surprisingly, North Korea rejected this U.N. resolution. They called it gangster-like behavior by the United Nations. Is there any reason to believe that this resolution is going to cause North Korea to change course?

BOLTON: I think that the fact that the security council unanimously condemned the North Korean test and for the second time in three months unanimously said to North Korea, you're pursuing the wrong course in your efforts to obtain nuclear weapons and ballistic missile capabilities is going to have an impact, if not in Pyongyang, in other capitals, specifically Beijing and Moscow. And that the pressure that we hope they will apply on Pyongyang, together with these very significant sanctions that the security council imposed yesterday, could have an impact.

STEPHANOPOULOS: I did notice one potential opening in the North Korean response. In the past they have said that if the U.N. passed a resolution, they would consider that an act of war. They didn't quite go that far this time. Is that an opening, or am I reading too much into it?

BOLTON: It's very hard to say with North Korea. What we have said repeatedly is that if North Korea wants to resolve this peacefully and diplomatically as the United States does, they should come back to the six-party talks. The resolution emphasizes that possibility again, and really at this point, the ball is in Pyongyang's court.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You mentioned how important China is to making this work. Part of this resolution is an authorization for countries to inspect shipments going in and out of North Korea, but China said they're not going to do that. And they have, what, an 880-mile border with North Korea. If they don't join in the inspections, doesn't that mean that North Korea's going to be able to get what they need?

BOLTON: Well, let's remember, the inspections are a tool to effectuate the sanctions themselves. China voted in favor of the resolution. It voted in favor of the sanctions. It made clear even during our negotiations they very strongly believe there should be sanctions on nuclear and missile transactions. They eventually agreed to even broader sanctions.

But this means China itself now has an obligation to make sure it complies with the resolution, and it has full national authority on its side of the border to conduct any inspections it wants. We'll see what actually comes out of Beijing, perhaps when Secretary Rice is there next week. But let's be clear, China voted in favor of that provision.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, they voted in favor of it, but they say they won't enforce it. And they also went even a little bit further and said they feared that these inspections would cause a conflict that would have serious implications for the region.
It sounds like they're not committed to it at all.

BOLTON: You know, that's the statement they made here yesterday. We'll see what they say in further conversations. The main point is that the sanctions themselves are in place, and I can't believe you're really predicting that China's not going to comply with the obligations that it voted for.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, I'm just reading you what they said. I'm not predicting anything, and so far the Chinese ambassador said they're not going to go along with those inspections. Tom Friedman of The New York Times this week wrote that basically unless China says to North Korea, we're cutting off your energy, we're cutting off your food, there's no way that Kim Jong Il is going to give up his nuclear program. Isn't Friedman right about that?

BOLTON: Well, I think if China were to take those kinds of steps, it would be powerfully persuasive in Pyongyang.

They have not yet been willing to do it.

I think that China has got a heavy responsibility here, and I must say, you know, this test by the North Koreans had to have been humiliating to China. After all of the efforts they have made over the years to protect North Korea from international approbation, for the North Koreans in the face of all that to test had to get quite a reaction in Beijing, and I think we're still seeing that play out.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Humiliating. It sounds like you're trying to goad China into enforcing this.

BOLTON: No, no, no, I think if you'll recall, the Chinese used to describe the relationships between the communist parties of China and North Korea as close as between lips and teeth. So that's the way they saw it, and now contrary to what China very expressly told North Korea, they went ahead with that test.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So if China doesn't have control over North Korea and all of our expressions of saying that we're not going to tolerate a North Korean nuclear weapon won't work, what can North Korea respond to short of military action?

BOLTON: Well, I think we need to wait to see what North Korea's more definitive response to the resolution is. Secretary Rice will be traveling in just a few days to China, South Korea and Japan to continue to try and mobilize the other five countries in the six-party talks. We've had very extensive diplomatic activity this week.

I must say in the six days that we were working on this resolution, President Bush was on the phone repeatedly to presidents and other heads of state. Secretary Rice was on the phone. We were very active at all levels of our diplomacy, and that is going to continue even after the adoption of the resolution. So there's a lot in play.

STEPHANOPOULOS: The president was also very active publicly the day after we learned of the North Korean test. He went into -- went to the Roosevelt Room, I believe it was, and laid out a very stern warning. Here it is.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: The transfer of nuclear weapons or material by North Korea to states or non-state entities would be considered a grave threat to the United States, and we would hold North Korea fully accountable, the consequences of such action.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Crack the diplomatic code here. When a president calls something a grave threat, that means that action will be met by a military response, correct?

BOLTON: No, what the president has said repeatedly is that he seeks a peaceful and diplomatic solution to the problem posed by North Korea's pursuit, not only of nuclear weapons, but of chemical and biological weapons and ballistic missiles and other means of delivering them. And by rallying the international coalition that he has, leading to this 15 to nothing vote in the Security Council yesterday, he's made it clear that he's going to do what he can through economic and political pressure to isolate North Korea and to deprive them of the means and technology they need to pursue those programs. And as well, to work with China and others to get North Korea to do what Libya did, to see that they're really much safer giving up the pursuit of nuclear weapons than continuing to go after them.

STEPHANOPOULOS: But Mr. Ambassador, I went back and checked, and from what we've been able to tell, the president has used that formulation, grave threat to the United States, only once before in his presidency. It was in January of 2003, and he was referring to Iraq; two months later, we invaded. Is it the policy of the United States, if North Korea transfers nuclear material, that that transfer will be met by a military response?

BOLTON: Well, I'm not going to speculate on what our response might be to something like that. I think higher authority will make whatever response is appropriate. But let me stress that what we've been trying to do here is exercise multilateral diplomacy, which the president's critics frequently suggest, to accomplish the strategic objective of getting North Korea to back away from its pursuit of these kinds of weapons.

STEPHANOPOULOS: One final question, sir. If North Korea does, indeed, hold on to its nuclear weapons, doesn't buckle to these sanctions, that's going to put tremendous pressure on its neighbors, Japan and South Korea in particular, to develop a nuclear program. How concerned are you about that?

BOLTON: Well, I think it's one reason why the president and Secretary Rice have worked so hard through the mechanism of the six- party talks and through other mechanisms that we've been proposing to resolve the North Korean problem before other countries in the region, out of concern for what this regime in Pyongyang might do, would have to take other steps. So that's our real objective. That's why it's important we succeed.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So it is a fear?

BOLTON: I think that the fear that we have is because of North Korea. There is a problem on the Korean peninsula. It has a name. The name is North Korea.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Mr. Ambassador, thank you very much.

BOLTON: Thank you.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Up next, will control of the Senate be determined in Tennessee? We're on the trail.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

FORD: I don't always live my life perfect, but I try my hardest to follow somebody that does.

CORKER: He's certainly running as somebody that he's not.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

STEPHANOPOULOS: We were back on the trail this week, this time in Tennessee for that spirited and surprising race to replace retiring Senate leader Bill Frist.

The Republican is Bob Corker, a former mayor of Chattanooga and wealthy real estate developer who says he'll bring the Senate the kind of private-sector experience it needs.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CORKER: And what I want to do in this race is take what I've become and working with you all across the state of Tennessee, I want to take that to Washington.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Corker should be coasting in this reliably red state, but right now, the Democrat, Congressman Harold Ford, is in the lead. From the powerful and notorious political family here, Ford would be the first black senator from the South since Reconstruction. And he's selling himself as a different kind of Democrat, guided by God.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

FORD: I started church the old-fashioned way. I was forced to. And I'm better for it. I'm Harold Ford, Jr., and here I learned the difference between right and wrong.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: When we met before a golf tournament in Memphis, I asked Ford about that ad.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

STEPHANOPOULOS: I don't think I've ever seen a politician film an ad in a church. What do you say to those who say that's crossing the line?

FORD: I say I grew up in that church. I was baptized in that church. And the kind of attacks that we're taking in this campaign have been so fierce and so unrelenting that I've relied on my faith a whole lot in this campaign. So it seemed pretty natural to me.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You also hand out these business cards that have your name on the front, candidate for the U.S. Senate, and the Ten Commandments on the back. So what's the message there, Elect me, I'll enforce the Ten Commandments?

FORD: No. Elect me, I know the difference between right and wrong. I don't always live my life perfectly, but I try my hardest to follow somebody that does. And I just don't believe that, from looking at this politically, that Democrats ought to cede any ground to any Republican when it comes to morality and faith.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Republicans put up an ad calling you a hypocrite.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

ANNOUNCER: Harold Ford says...

FORD: I won't let them make me someone I'm not.

ANNOUNCER: Fair enough. So what kind of man parties with Playboy playmates in lingerie, then films political ads from a church pew?

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Churchgoer by day, playboy at night.

FORD: I've never been to a Playboy mansion party. I'm just not going to take morality lessons from a party -- the National Republican Committee is running it -- from a party that took hush money from a child predator. I mean, I'm just not going to sit back and allow them to try to characterize or make me something I'm not.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You're talking about the Mark Foley case.

FORD: They need to deal with their issues as opposed to judging. The Bible makes clear about that: Be careful how you judge, because you'll be measured by that.

STEPHANOPOULOS: The issue of abortion, you describe yourself as pro-life. When do you think life begins?

FORD: Well, let me say this. Abortion, the goal here should be to reduce the number of abortions. We can debate day in and day out when it starts, when it doesn't start.

The reality is we want to reduce the number. And we've done nothing in this country for 50 years other than debate this.

George, the question is irrelevant.

STEPHANOPOULOS: The question is irrelevant?

FORD: Because the issue is abortions. If we agree that it starts three months in, at conception, once the baby is born, if the goal here is to reduce the number of abortions, then why aren't we talking about ways to do that?

If the Republicans believe so strongly against abortions, how come they haven't offered a piece of legislation to do that?

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, they've put out bans to ban what they call partial birth abortion.

FORD: I voted against the ban -- or, I voted for the ban.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You voted against it four times.

FORD: I voted against it seven of the 10 years I've been in the Congress. I had a changed experience about my third year in the Congress.

A doctor here in Memphis called me and said, I want you to see something.

STEPHANOPOULOS: What was it?

FORD: We don't need to get into all of it, but he changed my mind on it. And it was a moment in my political career that I am proud to announce, that I grew or learned something that changed my mind on an issue.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, what is it that you learned?

What did you see?

What did you learn?

FORD: George, it was a personal decision on my part. It had nothing to do with anything other than seeing something that said, You know what? The other side has a point on this.

STEPHANOPOULOS: In the last debate, your opponent raised the issue of your family, of the Ford political machine.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CORKER: We had a Ford running for Congress on the Democratic primary ticket and they lost. And so now there's a Ford on the independent ticket, just to ensure that a Ford is in this seat.

I think that's something that's unusual.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Fair game?

FORD: When you have nothing else to campaign on, I guess it is. I'm sure he wouldn't call the Bush family a political machine, but he has a different standard when it comes to my family.

I make no apologies for the fact that my family's been involved in public service for more than 35 years. And I thank the voters of this city and this state for giving us that chance and I hope that voters will give me a chance to represent the entire state.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Your family has also had run-ins with the law. You've had two uncles who had to resign their legislative positions because of charges of bribery and fraud. Your father was indicted, then acquitted, on similar charges.

What do you say to voters who are concerned that that kind of behavior might run in the family?

FORD: Well, I love my family and nothing you or my opponent or anybody can say will bring any distance between my family and I. But I'm running for the Senate. And until someone comes up with a recipe for picking family, then they should let me run for the Senate.

My opponent has raised this issue, George. And in a lot of ways, it's a Hail Mary pass right here at the end of this race. He doesn't have anywhere else to go, doesn't have any record to defend or any vision to fight for.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Let's talk about Iraq. You told me in 2002 you were proud of your vote for the war.

FORD: Sure.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Still proud?

FORD: Naturally, if I knew then what I know now, I wouldn't have voted for it.

At one point, I didn't think that President Bush would have even brought the resolution, but after hearing Vice President Cheney and others over the last few weeks indicate that they would have gone forward with the war in Iraq even knowing what they know now, it raises serious questions about not only judgment but sanity.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Sanity?

FORD: Well, why would you go forward with an effort in Iraq knowing that they didn't have weapons of mass destruction, knowing that our focus should have remained on bin Laden?

We now have a much more difficult situation on our hands. How do you stabilize it?

The example we see in Bosnia, that Joe Biden and Dick Lugar and Les Gelb and others have promoted, decentralizing the country, three regions -- we're getting closer to that.

The Iraqis actually voted something similar 48 hour ago...

STEPHANOPOULOS: I was talking to James Baker about that last week. He said it's a recipe for an even worse civil war than we're seeing now.

FORD: Well, that's the first time they've admitted that there's at least a civil war going on. And if we all agree there's a civil war, I don't know of any army of any civilization that's been able to referee successfully a civil war. So a new strategy is needed.

If, indeed, the Bush administration -- and I applaud Secretary Baker.

If Secretary Baker is credible, if President Bush believes he is, he should allow the introduction of his plan to come sooner rather than later. And he should reconvene Congress as soon as Mr. Baker makes the recommendation for us to begin debating it before the election.

STEPHANOPOULOS: If you win, you'll be the first African-American in the Senate, from the South, since Reconstruction.

How much of a factor is your race in this campaign?

FORD: How much is race a factor in the race?

I don't know. I mean, I'm who I am. God made me like this and I think voters accept that. I'm proud of who I am. In this race, it hasn't been as much of an issue as some people from outside would view it.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Other African-American candidates from the South --we've seen Harvey Gant four points up a week out, loses by six. Doug Wilder, Virginia, 11 points up a week out, wins by one.

FORD: I like the Wilder model. Everyone always talks about how do you feel about the Doug Wilder model? Remember, he won.

So winning by a point or half a point or a tenth of a point will take it. And I may even ask Secretary Baker to come count these votes for me if things get too tight down here at the end.

You know, I serve a big God and I've said it all throughout this campaign, on paper, we shouldn't be where we are today. I recognize that. And there's some bigger powers at work in this race.

And I just believe, at the end of the day, voters are going to go in that booth and they're going to vote their future.

STEPHANOPOULOS: After ford's quick stump speech by the club house...

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

FORD: I'm going to make you one promise: You will continue to have a friend in the United States Senate.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: ... we crossed the state to Nashville. There, Mayor Corker held a rally with RNC Chair Ken Mehlman, who just poured more money into this race. I asked Corker if this cash transfusion is a sign his campaign is ailing.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

CORKER: It's just a big race. I think the national environment is what it is, and I think people throughout the country have a lot of concerns that make the water a little choppy.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You talk about the national environment. Are you talking about the war in Iraq?

CORKER: No, I think it's more than that. I think just people have a lot of different kinds of concerns.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Is the president dragging you down?

CORKER: No, no, I don't know. He's been the state for us twice. Certainly, you know, we appreciate that. He's helped us raise money. Laura Bush was in the state just the last few days.

Again, I think it's more of a national climate of concern. And I think people on both sides of the aisle have those concerns.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Your opponent has put up a new ad this weekend about Iraq, quoting you saying we need to stay the course.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CORKER: We are in Iraq. Our country is in Iraq. I think we should stay the course. We should stay the course.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Is that what you think we should do right now?

CORKER: Well, again, it's out of context, as are so many things that happen in campaigns like this. But when asked about whether we should leave Iraq before the people of Iraq were able to secure themselves, maybe that statement was made.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So what would you do now?

CORKER: We need to train the people that are there to be able to secure themselves, both as policemen that are there in the neighborhoods, but also the army. And we need to do that with a tremendous sense of urgency.

I don't think there are many people in this state that believe we went to Iraq with enough troops on the ground in the first place, and I think, obviously, we are dealing...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Would you put more troops there now?

CORKER: If that's necessary. And I think that we need to do whatever's necessary for the country to be able to secure itself. And when that happens, I do hope that our men and women come quickly home.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Congressman Ford said he'd have to question the sanity of anybody who still believes that it was the right decision to go into Iraq knowing what we know now.

Do you still believe it was the right decision?

CORKER: Of course, the only person who voted to go was Congressman Ford, who's been there for 10 years. But I think I'd choose -- I know I'd choose to focus on the future. I don't think it does any good for us, as a country, to focus on what shoulda, woulda, coulda.

I think we ought to focus on...

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, but a lot of people are focused on it right now, and they say the fact that there were no weapons of mass destruction, the way this war has been prosecuted, means it wasn't the right decision.

What do you think?

CORKER: Again, I'm going to focus on where we are going forward. I don't think it does us any good to focus on that.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Former Secretary of State James Baker, as you know, is focused on that issue right now. Congressman Ford says he ought to put out his recommendations before the elections, not after. Do you agree?

CORKER: I actually don't. I actually believe a more civil environment would be when everybody settled down, when people are not, like Congressman Ford, trying to make headlines over this really, really tough situation that all Americans face and deal with.
STEPHANOPOULOS: This race certainly has heated up here and one of the ads that the Congressman is running says that you enriched yourself as mayor.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

ANNOUNCER: Bob Corker lives in a 30-room mansion, is worth over $200 million and owns six SUVs. As mayor, he took three pay increases.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

CORKER: Well, that's another ridiculous distortion by the Congressman and, you know, just absolutely absurd and untrue. First of all, the mayor if Chattanooga doesn't vote on his own pay raise. You're tied to another public official by charter. Number two, that's absolutely ridiculous about enriching myself.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, your net worth did go up about 40 percent, according to the local papers.

CORKER: No, that's absolutely not true. Not based on fact, no. Somebody might have speculated, but that's just not true. Congressman Ford continues to distort, continues to mislead, continues to run away from who he really is, what his record has really been, and that's what's made this race as interesting as it has been.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Who is he?

CORKER: He is a person who's way of life is being in politics. He is a person who, upon graduating from Ivy League schools, inherited his father's congressional seat. This is, to him, not about a sense of mission, if you will, about solving our country's problems. His voting record is very, very, very different than the way he portrays himself.

He's running now to try to portray himself as someone who does, in fact, represent the values of Tennesseans, and that has not been the case over the last 10 years.

STEPHANOPOULOS: So he's a hypocrite?

CORKER: I don't use words like that, but he's certainly running as somebody that he's not.

STEPHANOPOULOS: Well, I'm still trying to figure out, then, when you talk about his voting record, what are you talking about specifically? How is his voting record out of step with the people of Tennessee?

CORKER: OK. I think everything from opposing the '01-'03 tax cuts to opposing simple tort reform, which most of our citizens would support, to lessening our focus on intelligence, cutting defense spending 16 percent in his votes.

I think I could list probably 20 ways that he is out of step with Tennesseans.

But I think the race really focuses on something more than just dissecting votes. I think it's really about somebody going to Washington that has been shaped by Tennessee values.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You mentioned way of life a few times now. As you know and we both know, Congressman Ford does come from a political family here in Tennessee. And he says when you raise the question of his family, you're throwing a Hail Mary desperation pass.

CORKER: No, you know, it's ridiculous. You know, first of all, there's never been a comment ever, never a personal comment ever made about the family.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You did criticize his father's actions as a lobbyist in the last few years.

CORKER: Actually, I was criticizing his actions, sitting on Fannie Mae, sitting on the Financial Services Committee, with his dad lobbying for Fannie Mae.

STEPHANOPOULOS: He says his dad didn't lobby him and he didn't take any lobbying from his father.

CORKER: I understand what he said. I think that over time, the records will show differently.

I think that's very relevant, especially with his dad having been a former congressman, to bring up to me -- that's not like -- it's not personal, it's not attacking somebody that hasn't been in the public arena.

Never, never has anything like that been said.

STEPHANOPOULOS: You've got about three weeks left to go here. It's a tight race. What's it going to take for you to win?

CORKER: I think doing what we're doing. I have faith in the voters of our state to see the true differences that exist between us and really to focus on our abilities to work with other people to solve the complex issues our country deals with.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

STEPHANOPOULOS: This one is going down to the wire. The roundtable is next with George Will, Martha Raddatz and Fareed Zakaria.

And later, the Sunday Funnies.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

JAY LENO, HOST, TONIGHT SHOW: The Republicans finally got some good news over the weekend. The North Koreans set off a nuclear bomb. Whew, thank God. It was so powerful, knocked the Mark Foley story right off the front page.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

STEPHANOPOULOS: Our voice this week, Marg Helgenberger.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

STEPHANOPOULOS (voice over): The CSI star has teamed up with other Hollywood leading ladies to get out the vote.

Women's Voices, Women Vote is a nonpartisan movement aimed at the 20 million single women who stayed home from the polls in 2004.

HELGENBERGER: I think the women's vote is very important. I think that the fact that there was 20 million single women in the last election that didn't vote -- when I heard that figure, I was, kind of -- I was saddened by it actually.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: 20 million women...

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: ... the largest group...

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: ... of nonvoters in America.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: We can that.

HELGENBERGER: Voting together...

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: We have the power to decide.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

HELGENBERGER: I think that women do not use nearly as much of their power as they're capable of, and for all different kinds of reasons. I think women, especially if you have a career and children, I think so much of your time is just spent trying to find the balance between those two and prioritizing your life and that whatever your issues or your cause is, kind of, gets lost in the shuffle. The campaign -- it certainly will get people's attention. If something with sexual connotations will get people to vote, why not, you know?

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: You want me to tell you about the first time I did it?

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: I think the best time is in the fall.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: I like to do it in the morning.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: I told everybody. I had such a big mouth about.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: I made a good choice.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

HELGENBERGER: I certainly am not going out there speaking, telling women how to vote or who to vote for. I'm really just saying, just get out there and vote. And it's as simple as that.

And now, the Sunday funnies.

(SUNDAY FUNNIES SEGMENT)

STEPHANOPOULOS: That's our show for today. Starting tonight on World News, ABC takes an in-depth look past the problems in American health care, and presents solutions. The series is called Prescription for Change: Fixing American Health Care, and it continues all week long across all ABC platforms.

Take a look at the new Air Force memorial as we sign off today. And thanks for sharing part of your Sunday with us. We'll see you next week.

FOX – NEWS SUNDAY

WALLACE: I'm Chris Wallace. The U.N. acts against North Korea's nuclear program, next on Fox News Sunday .

Nuclear saber rattling in North Korea, sectarian violence in Iraq, and then there's Iran. What does the U.S. do now? We'll ask the Democrats' once and possibly future presidential nominee Senator John Kerry and the secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice.

Plus, with three weeks till election day, can Republicans put controversy behind them and keep control of Congress? We'll poll our Sunday regulars, Brit Hume, Mara Liasson, Bill Kristol, and Juan Williams.

And our Power Player of the Week brings Hollywood to Washington, all right now on Fox News Sunday .

And good morning again from Fox News in Washington. Let's start with a quick check of the latest headlines. North Korean officials reacted angrily to the unanimous U.N. Security Council vote Saturday that imposed financial and weapons sanctions on their country.

North Korea's U.N. ambassador called the action gangster-like and warned any more pressure from the U.S. would be a declaration of war.

In Iraq, signs that sectarian violence is getting worse. In separate incidents over the weekend, more than 60 people were killed. And in Baghdad, the U.S. military reports five American soldiers were killed Saturday. October is now on pace to be the deadliest month for American troops since January of 2005.

And joining us now is the secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice, who comes to us from the presidential retreat at Camp David.

Secretary Rice, welcome back to Fox News.

RICE: Good morning. Nice to be with you, Chris.

WALLACE: Let's start with those sanctions that the U.N. Security Council imposed yesterday on North Korea. The resolution bans trade in weapons and luxury goods, but it explicitly excludes the use of military force and it does not impose the kind of sweeping trade embargo that Japan wanted.

Question: Do you really believe that preventing Kim Jong Il from getting his cognac is going to stop his nuclear ambitions?

RICE: Well, this is a regime that very much likes luxury for itself while it starves its own people, and so I think it's probably gotten their attention. But there's really much more to this story, Chris.

China, which has never wanted to impose sanctions, particularly on a state with which it has close relations, Russia, the United States, Japan, and the entire international community have now imposed the toughest sanctions on North Korea that have ever been imposed, done it unanimously.

It will allow efforts to prevent proliferation in the weapons of mass destruction that Kim Jong Il is brandishing, and it sends a very strong signal to North Korea that it is now completely isolated.

It of course leaves open the possibility of returning to six- party talks and implementing the joint statement that was signed on September 19 of 2005, but this is (inaudible)...

(AUDIO GAP)

WALLACE: But, Secretary Rice, China -- and we're having some technical difficulties, but I'm going to press ahead while we continue to sort them out. I hope you can hear me.

China, which is North Korea's biggest trading partner and shares an 880-mile border with that country, has already said that it is not going to inspect cargo coming in or out of that country, which certainly leaves the possibility that the North Korean regime can still ship out nuclear material.

You're leaving Tuesday for a trip to the region where you're going to talk with North Korea's neighbors. Are you going to try to get them, especially China, to crack down?

RICE: I think you have to, again, Chris, go to where we are. This is remarkable unity of purpose and unity of message to North Korea. It is also the case that there are many details to be worked out, particularly about how this embargo and interdiction might work.

I understand that people are concerned about how it might work so that it doesn't enhance tensions in the region, and we're perfectly willing to have those conversations, but China signed on to this resolution. It voted for this resolution.

It is a Chapter 7 mandatory resolution, and so I'm quite certain that China is going to live up to its responsibilities. But you cannot underestimate how big a blow it is to North Korea to have all of the neighbors now, including what has been its strongest supporter, China, fully united behind sanctions against its nuclear program.

WALLACE: But to press the point, if I may, what do you make of China already saying that it does not intend to inspect cargo going in or out of North Korea?

RICE: Well, China is signed on to a resolution that pledges cooperation in stopping the proliferation trade with North Korea. And I'm quite certain that China has no interest in seeing the proliferation of dangerous materials from North Korea. This is the toughest action that China has ever signed on to vis- a-vis North Korea, and I think when people say well, the United States should have done this bilaterally, you now see why it is important to have all states united.

There will be details to work out. There will be differences in emphases, but the North Koreans now face a united front that will not allow them to continue to pursue their nuclear programs without consequence, and that's an extremely important step.

WALLACE: Secretary rice, is the U.S. prepared to go outside the U.N. to form another coalition of the willing to act on its own to interdict all shipments in or out of North Korea?

RICE: We are very satisfied with this resolution, and we believe now that this resolution should be fully implemented. It will take some work to talk about the implementation of the resolution. That's part of what I will do when I go out to the region on Tuesday.

We believe that there may be other steps that will be necessary given North Korea's behavior. But we are very satisfied with where we are right now, to get a 15-0 resolution that sanctions North Korea under Chapter 7, and I want to just underscore, a mandatory resolution that brands North Korea now a threat to international peace and security, requires North Korea to do some things, requires member states to do things...

(AUDIO GAP)

RICE: For now, we are very pleased with where we are.

WALLACE: Listen, we're continuing to have some technical difficulties, Secretary Rice. We apologize. So why don't we take a break here? And when we come back, we'll continue our conversation with the secretary of state.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WALLACE: And with the hope that our technical problems are now solved, we go back to Camp David and the secretary of state.

Secretary Rice, I want to take you back to the president's state of the union speech in 2002 where he announced -- listed the axis of evil and made this pledge. Take a look.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: The United States of America will not permit the world's most dangerous regimes to threaten us with the world's most destructive weapons.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Secretary Rice, since then, the U.S. has invaded Iraq, which turned out not to have any weapons of mass destruction, and meanwhile both Iran and North Korea have continued full speed ahead on their nuclear programs.

Hasn't the Bush administration failed to keep the promises pledged that day?

RICE: Chris, let's be accurate with the history here. First of all, everyone thought Iraq had weapons of mass destruction. One thing is certain now. Saddam Hussein's regime will never pursue them again in the way that they did throughout the '90s to the point that they actually used weapons of mass destruction against their neighbors. So Iraq is not a WMD threat.

When you look at Iran, Iran is now under international pressure to give up the early stages of the development of its nuclear program, its enrichment and reprocessing capability. It is a multilateral effort, not just a U.S. effort, and that is extremely important because the United States doesn't need to do this alone and can't do it alone.

Countries have to be committed to sustaining the non- proliferation regime, and with Iran we have six countries, the five permanent members of the Security Council plus Germany, that are pursuing that.

And with North Korea, which has been pursuing nuclear weapons for decades -- this goes back probably to the late 1960s, certainly to the late 1970s and early '80s -- you finally really have a coalition of states that are determined to keep the North Koreans from keeping their nuclear weapons program and progressing.

WALLACE: But, Secretary...

RICE: So this administration has done more than at any other time to make sure that there is really an international coalition to deal with these cases.

WALLACE: But, Secretary Rice, for whatever reasons and whatever the diplomacy, the fact is that compared to 2002 when the president made that speech, Iran has a more developed nuclear program than it had in 2002. North Korea has tested a long-range missile when the president said that would be unacceptable. It has now had a nuclear test.

Aren't two-thirds of the axis of evil more dangerous now than they were in 2002?

RICE: There is no way to suggest that having China, Russia, the entire international community finally unified around a plan, around a program to deal with the nuclear threat from North Korea is somehow less successful than where we were in 2002 when the North Koreans were pursuing a new path to nuclear weapons, where they were breaking out of bilateral agreements with the United States -- where, by the way, just two years before that, they had, in fact, tested missiles.

No, it wasn't a good situation in 2002 -- 2000, and they have continued to pursue their programs, but we finally have the right coalition of states to put enormous pressure on North Korea to reverse its course. We did not have that in 2002 when the president made that speech.

WALLACE: Well, let's talk about how effective diplomacy has been. You appeared on Fox News Sunday back on June 4th and I asked you how long Iran had to respond to an offer to end its nuclear program. Here's what you said at that time.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RICE: I think it's fair to say that we really do have to have this settled over a matter of weeks, not months.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Secretary rice, it has now been 19 weeks, 3.5 full months, since those comments, and the fact is the United Nations has not imposed a single sanction on Iran.

So how effective is the diplomacy, and how much credibility does it give us when we threaten Iran and North Korea?

RICE: Chris, you skipped one step. In July, the United Nations made mandatory the Iranian suspension of its enrichment and reprocessing with a resolution, 1696, that was also 15-0.

We then decided to pursue an option to allow Javier Solana, the E.U. high commissioner for foreign policy, to see if he could find a way for Iran to agree to suspend its program so that we could begin diplomacy. We felt that that was worth it.

But it is now very clear that Iran is not going to take that course, and the work on sanctions has begun in capitals and will begin in the Security Council this week.

So we're moving right along here from February when the IAEA, the International Atomic Energy Agency, said it was not acceptable for Iran to enrich and reprocess, through a resolution in July, to a resolution now within, I think, a few weeks here that will begin to impose costs on Iran for its continued enriching and reprocessing.

And we've done all of that while having put forward a package of incentives that Iran could have taken up and could still take up...

(AUDIO GAP)

RICE: ... its nuclear program. So the international community has achieved a lot. These are not easy matters to handle. But the United States is much better off working with its allies than trying to do this bilaterally and being isolated itself.

WALLACE: Secretary Rice, we continue to have some technical differences there at the end. We want to thank you. Whoops, I think she's gone. Thank you so much for appearing this week and safe travels on your trip overseas starting on Tuesday.

RICE: Thank you.

WALLACE: Joining us now, not by cable line, fiber line, from Camp David, but here in the studio with us is the 2004 candidate for president, Senator John Kerry.

And, Senator, welcome back to Fox News Sunday .

KERRY: Glad to be with you.

WALLACE: Let's start with North Korea. What effect do you think that the U.N. resolution is going to have on North Korea and its effectiveness in trying to stop their nuclear program, and what would you do?

KERRY: Well, let me begin by saying that North Korea is a renegade nation and it's a nation we all understand does threaten.

That said, I think the administration -- and just listening to what I could hear -- I couldn't hear all of it -- of the secretary's comments, they're living in a world of make-believe, Chris. They're living in a complete fantasy with respect to the foreign policy they put in place.

It is a failure. It's a failure in Afghanistan where they have a sort of cut-and-run policy of not completing the job. We have seven times the troops in Iraq.

WALLACE: Well, forgive me.

KERRY: Well, I want to comment, because it's all tied together.

WALLACE: Let's talk about North Korea.

KERRY: Well, this is about North Korea, because the problem with Iraq is that it has diminished our hand and reduced our ability to be able to deal with Iran and North Korea. They are related.

One of the reasons that North Korea can misbehave the way it is today is because the United States has lost its leverage, lost its credibility and doesn't have the capacity to be able to bring countries together in the way that it used to. That's number one.

Number two, with respect to North Korea itself, you hit it on the head. This administration is tolerating. This administration is doing exactly what it said it wouldn't do, which is allowing North Korea to get away with what it's doing.

These sanctions are not the bold, tough sanctions that the secretary talked about. China walked out of there and said we voted for it, but we're not going to enforce the cross-border mechanism, it's too dangerous for our region.

So you have sanctions that are just, by statement of those involved, not going to do the job.

WALLACE: So what would you do differently to deal with this very erratic regime of North Korea?

KERRY: I would do precisely -- I would do precisely what I said for the last five years consistently, which is engage in bilateral, face-to-face negotiations with North Korea, make it absolutely clear to North Korea that we are not intending to invade and have a regime change, and work on the entire set of issues that are outstanding since the armistice with regard to the north.

WALLACE: But, Senator, let me ask you about that. Let's look at what you espoused as your basic foreign policy principle during the 2004 campaign. Here it is.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

KERRY: America is stronger. Our troops are safer. And our success is more certain when we build and lead strong alliances, not when we go it alone.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Alliances, not going it alone. Multilateral, not bilateral. Doesn't it still make sense to engage North Korea in talks with all of its neighbors, including China and South Korea, who have a lot more leverage than we do, rather than just get into a conversation about nothing with them ourselves?

KERRY: But it's not a conversation about nothing, Chris. It's a negotiation. Just as Ronald Reagan was prepared to go negotiate with the evil empire and come to an agreement with Gorbachev, we have to be prepared to go negotiate with North Korea, just as Nixon...

WALLACE: But what leverage do we have?

KERRY: ... was prepared to send Kissinger to China -- the leverage of the stakes between the two nations.

Let me go back in time. Bill Clinton was in office for eight years. When he started out in office, there was enough fuel for bombs for about one to two bombs. They were members -- North Korea was a member of the non-proliferation treaty and North Korea had not tested.

At the end of Bill Clinton's term, they had enough fuel for one to two bombs, they were members of the non-proliferation treaty, and they had not tested. Now they have enough fuel for nine to 10 bombs. They say they're going to build -- get enough for five to six more. They've pulled out of the non-proliferation treaty. We no longer have cameras in the reactor. We no longer have inspectors in the reactor. We no longer know where the fuel rods are. We know that they have now tested.

The United States of America is less safe, and the six-party talks have been a cover to get away from the idea, because George Bush and Dick Cheney decided ideologically in 2002 they would break off the oil trade, they would not build the nuclear reactors, they would not keep the framework that had been agreed on, and from that moment on, it's been downhill with North Korea.

WALLACE: Senator, there are several points you've made that I'd like to ask you about.

KERRY: Absolutely.

WALLACE: But first of all, one, all independent experts say that by 1997, North Korea was cheating on the Clinton agreement.

KERRY: Absolutely. But cheating...

WALLACE: If I may ask my question -- and in fact, had already begun secret uranium enrichment. I think to get to the larger issue...

KERRY: Can I stop you there for a minute? Because it's very important, what you just said. Uranium enrichment -- their bombs are plutonium.

And the fact is with respect to the threat of the United States, while we knew they probably were cheating, we were on a road where we had them in the non-proliferation treaty. They didn't have additional bomb capacity, and they hadn't tested.

And if we had stayed on that road, then we could have perhaps had a better opportunity to be able to curb this.

One other very critical thing. Eisenhower taught us this. I mean, Richard Nixon taught us this. By working through the diplomatic process and doing it in a legitimate way that builds you credibility, you bring people to your side so that if and when it comes to the moment of crisis, they're prepared to be with you.

Nations are not prepared to be with us today because this administration has broken faith with all of that kind of effort.

WALLACE: I mean, some people would say you want to have it both ways. In the case of Iraq, you blister the United States for acting unilaterally, and here you're attacking them for acting multilaterally.

KERRY: No, Chris.

WALLACE: But if I may, let's go to a speech that you made in New Hampshire...

KERRY: No, no, no, you can't make a statement like that and just get away with it. I am not going to let you do that.

WALLACE: I'm going to ask you a question, and then you can answer the whole thing. You made a speech in New Hampshire on Friday night where you blistered the Bush approach to North Korea. Let's take a look at that.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

KERRY: When George W. Bush turned his back on diplomacy, Kim Jong Il turned back to making bombs, and the world is less safe today because a mad man has the Bush bomb.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: The Bush bomb?

KERRY: Yes.

WALLACE: I mean, don't you really think you should blame this on Kim Jong Il, not President Bush?

KERRY: It's a bomb that has been developed because of the unwillingness of this administration to engage in opportunities that every expert says have been there all the time.

President Carter went over there in 1994 and President Carter negotiated an agreement. Now, rather than continue that agreement in 2002, this administration just arbitrarily decided, out of ideological whatever -- anything but Clinton -- they proceed down a different road.

And things have gotten worse. Things have gotten worse in Afghanistan. Things have gotten worse in Iraq. They're not telling the truth to the American people about a civil war in Iraq.

They don't listen to the generals on the ground in Iraq. The generals have said it's a debacle. They've said Rumsfeld doesn't have credibility. They're not standing down while the Iraqis supposedly stand up.

In every aspect of our foreign policy, this administration has misled Americans and misled the world. And they don't have credibility. Chris, this is not political. This is not political.

WALLACE: Well, it's a little political.

KERRY: No, it's not political. No, it's not political. It used to be that foreign policy was something that was done on a bipartisan basis. It used to be that the politics ended at the water's edge.

And the fact is that they have so left people out of this process, so disregarded all the advice that they've been given, even their own advice in their administration, that they've now isolated themselves in the world.

And our troops are paying the price of an administration that has not leveled with the American people and has lost credibility in the world. And that's why Iran is emboldened, and that's why North Korea is emboldened.

WALLACE: Senator, back in 2004 -- and this is the summer of 2004 by which point we all knew that, in fact, there were no weapons of mass destruction in Iraq -- President Bush challenged you on whether you would still have voted for the authority to go to war. Here's what you said.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

KERRY: Yes, I would have voted for the authority. I believe it was the right authority for a president to have.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: But this week you wrote this, and let's put it up on the screen, There's nothing -- nothing -- in my life in public service I regret more, nothing even close. We should all be willing to say I was wrong. I should not have voted for the Iraq war resolution.

Senator, if it was right to vote for the Iraq war resolution in 2002 and it was right in August of 2004, why is it now your biggest policy mistake?

KERRY: Because this administration has made every mistake and abused every authority that it was given to such a degree beyond where we were at that point in time.

And also, we have learned since then, Chris, of the degree to which they misled us, the degree to which they have abused the authority that they were given. At the time...

WALLACE: But you didn't know that in August of 2004?

KERRY: No, we were about one year out from the start of the war then, Chris. A whole series of things that we thought could be done -- I was still saying that I thought we could, hopefully, if they made the following decisions, make it a success.

I went to Fulton, Missouri. I went to New York University. I went to Georgetown University. I gave three speeches in which I laid out what I thought the president needed to do to make a success of Iraq.

In each case, we offered the president the best advice that we could give. The president didn't follow that advice. On the last occasion, I said this may be the president's last chance to get this right. The president didn't do what's necessary. He still hasn't.

You have to resolve the differences, political differences, between Shia and Sunni. And there's nothing our troops can do to do that. General Casey has said this can't be resolved militarily. Condi Rice has said this can't be resolved militarily.

So I ask you, Chris, and I ask the president, where is the summitry? Where is the statesmanship? Where is the diplomatic effort similar to those we've seen in the past in American history to resolve those differences and end the civil war?

And if you don't engage in that, then our troops are going to continue to die with a strategy that is wrong.

WALLACE: But I want to ask you a question which goes to you...

KERRY: Sure.

WALLACE: ... not to President Bush, because this, quite frankly, is a rap against you. Isn't this -- and I'm talking about your vote now for the war resolution and now your recanting of this -- isn't this another case of I was for the $87 billion before I was against it?

KERRY: No. I was for the $87 billion if we paid for it and if we had a plan, and we voted on that in the Senate. And when the vote lost, then I voted against it because I thought it was a matter of conscience and principle. And I should have said that more clearly.

In the same way now, this vote -- look at what the president's done. He said he would go to war as a last resort. He didn't. He said he would exhaust the remedies of inspections. He didn't. He said he would build a legitimate coalition. He didn't.

He now has made every mistake possible so he has isolated our troops, isolated America. This is a civil war. He even continues to mislead Americans about Iraq being the center of the war on terror. It is not now and it hasn't been the center.

We were attacked by Osama bin Laden from Afghanistan. We have seven times the troops in Iraq that we have in Afghanistan, where they're still plotting against American airliners and against Americans. The center of the war on terror is Al Qaida, now distributed in some 65 countries around the world.

And this administration even cut and run and failed to do...

WALLACE: All right.

KERRY: ... what it could have done at Tora Bora to capture or kill Osama bin Laden.

WALLACE: We've got a little over a minute left, and I want to ask you a little about politics, because it's no secret that you are actively considering the possibility of running for president in 2008.

And you said in a recent article, Next time I would campaign in more states, next time I would respond more aggressively to the swift boats. But why shouldn't Democrats say look, here was John Kerry in 2004, he had a great chance, he was running against a president who had gotten us into war for reasons, for intelligence that turned out to be wrong, he had his chance and he blew it?

KERRY: Well, some will ask that question, and they have a right to. But there's an answer to that question. The fact is that in the course of a campaign, you make some judgments.

Our judgment was that the truth was out there, that enough newspapers, enough people had the truth about my record. That was a misjudgment, a miscalculation, but I don't think that a tactical miscalculation necessarily eliminates you from whatever basic policies, basic experience, basic life commitment and ability to be president.

And finally, most importantly, you know, I think the real test is that it was a very different time. We were at war, one year out from the war. Osama bin Laden appeared in the last hours of the campaign, changed the whole debate.

I'm not embarrassed by that campaign. We did a hell of a job. Our people were extraordinary. You know, I'm proud that I won 10 million more votes than Bill Clinton did winning reelection in '96.

We exceeded our vote goals in every precinct in America. We came within 59,000 votes of wining in one state against a president in time of war who lied about my record personally -- the campaigns did -- and who lied about the war.

WALLACE: We have only 30 seconds left. A lot of Democrats, I'm sure, are saying look, a lot of bad things happened over the course of these four years from 2004 to 2008, because you -- it may have been a good campaign, you got a lot of votes -- you lost.

KERRY: That's right.

WALLACE: Why shouldn't you be held responsible and why should you get another chance?

KERRY: Well, Some will, and I'll make the decision based on what happens over the next few weeks. And when I do, I'll make the argument for why I should get a chance.

But look, why should Ronald Reagan have won four times for the nomination and finally on the fourth he won the nomination? John McCain, their leading candidate -- didn't he get kicked around South Carolina by the same president because he wasn't patriotic enough as a prisoner of war? He's now their leading candidate for president.

Richard Nixon seemed to get kicked around pretty badly both running for president and governor, turned around and came back and got elected president.

I think in America, Americans give people a second chance. And if you learn something and prove you've learned something, maybe even more so. Now, I don't know what I'm going to do yet. We'll make that decision down the road.

WALLACE: And you always have a place here at Fox News Sunday to make that announcement, Senator.

KERRY: Oh, thank you.

WALLACE: Thank you so much for coming on and talking with us again. And please, don't be a stranger. Come on back.

KERRY: I'm happy to be here.

WALLACE: Thank you, sir.

KERRY: Thank you.

WALLACE: Coming up, our Sunday regulars on the nuclear standoff with North Korea. Is a diplomatic solution still possible? Stay tuned.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: We are united in our determination to see to it that the Korean peninsula is nuclear weapons free.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: That was President Bush on Saturday talking about the new U.N. sanctions against North Korea. And it's panel time now for our Sunday gang, Brit Hume, Washington managing editor of Fox News, and Fox News contributors Mara Liasson of National Public Radio, Bill Kristol of The Weekly Standard, and Juan Williams, also from National Public Radio.

So, Brit, what do you make of this U.N. Security Council resolution that they passed yesterday? Do you think it will have -- and it's pretty hard to predict when it comes to Kim Jong Il -- an effect on North Korea's nuclear ambitions?

HUME: It's better than nothing. It's not nearly as strong as it could be and perhaps needs to be. The most important provision is the one that calls for the inspection of cargo coming in and out of that country, mostly cargo, I think, comes in and out of that country by sea, which sets up -- it says that all nations can enforce such an inspection regime, which raises the possibility that if, you know, neighboring nations or the U.N. itself is not willing to do this, then the United States with willing allies could do it, or the United States could do it by itself, which I think is probably the best hope for having that be effective.

WALLACE: Although I will say I asked Secretary of State Rice that, and she is not willing to go that far.

HUME: Yet.

WALLACE: Yet, exactly.

HUME: Right.

LIASSON: I think the real question is who's going to execute this. I mean, China -- as soon as we finally got China and Russia on board, at least for this language, China was saying it's not going to do the inspections, it's not -- and a tremendous amount of stuff comes over the border to China, too. I don't know if that's the way they would export nuclear technology, but a lot of this is going to be about execution and how willing countries like China or Russia are to actually do these inspections.

I agree with Brit, better than nothing, got everybody on the same page at least on these sanctions, which on the face of it looked pretty tough, but they have to be enforced.

WALLACE: Bill, in the new issue of The Weekly Standard, you -- and you really know how to hurt a guy -- talk about the Bush foreign policy. You compare it to Clintonian huffing and puffing. Has your opinion changed now with the passage of this resolution?

KRISTOL: No, not really. I mean, North Korea has a nuclear weapon. They've launched a missile. They're going to probably test more nuclear weapons. What happens the next time they put a missile up on a launch pad, incidentally? Are we going to let them test again? I don't think so.

The sanctions are not serious enough to bring down the regime or to cripple their nuclear program. Therefore, we now have -- we are acceding to a nuclear North Korea, it seems to me, and we're going to accede to a nuclear Iran, it looks to me like.

WALLACE: So what should...

KRISTOL: What we should do is go back...

WALLACE: ... the Bush administration do?

KRISTOL: ... to the Bush policy, the Bush policy articulated...

WALLACE: Wait a minute, this is the Bush policy.

KRISTOL: No, it isn't. You played the clip of President Bush. What did he say in that wonderful -- in the state of the union...

WALLACE: 2002.

KRISTOL: ... in 2002? The United States of America will not permit the most dangerous regimes to threaten us with the most dangerous weapons.

What did Secretary of State Rice just say to you? We can't do it alone, we need the international community. That's not what President Bush said in 2002. He said on a matter of this fundamental importance, we will lead, we will not drag ourselves down to the lowest common denominator, of what China will accept in the U.N. resolution.

I'm afraid the president in the last year has -- he's put such -- maybe he feels he has to, but he's putting such great stock in the notion that we can't be separated from our European friends with Iran, we can't be separated from China and Russia with respect to North Korea, that we're acceding to what we once said we would not accept. WILLIAMS: Well, but the change, Bill, is that you've got, you know, 140,000 American troops in Iraq at the moment, and you've got a situation where even, you know, the British are talking now about pulling out, their army chief of staff this week saying, you know, they're going to pull out.

And you have the U.S. Army chief of staff, Peter Schoomaker, saying this week that U.S. public support even for the war in Iraq is tepid. That's his word.

And here you are suggesting well, in fact, what we need to do is be more aggressive, put more boots on the ground and go at the North Koreans in some way without our allies. And even the British, our best allies, are pulling out on -- you know, are suggesting they're ready to leave Iraq. I mean, how many fronts can we fight on?

KRISTOL: More than one. I mean, this is the fundamental question. Has Iraq so weakened us that we can't do anything about North Korea and Iran? Can we accept that? Iraq's more difficult than we thought. Does that mean we accede to a nuclear Iran or a nuclear North Korea? I don't think so.

WILLIAMS: No, but you're going to have to take steps and you have to build. I mean, the key point here is to engage in some kind of meaningful alliance with the Chinese, with the Russians, with other people, especially with the Japanese, I think, to try to hold and contain North Korea. But to suggest you go bomb them...

HUME: Well, Juan, it's pretty hard to argue, it seems to me, that the administration isn't doing exactly what Juan just described, which is to try to engage in a meaningful alliance.

What I think is happening now is that the limits of such alliances are being tested. To have an effective alliance against North Korea, you need China to be a willing and active participant. China is kind of a semi-willing and active participant. Similarly with Iran, you need other nations to be willing to be as tough as you are. We're partway there, but not very far.

At the end of the day, the question really is -- and it's being slowly answered -- is whether the United States is going to have to deal with these threats in whatever way it can ultimately and almost entirely by itself.

WALLACE: But, Brit, let me ask you about this. Let me ask you, in effect, the same question I asked Secretary of State Rice. I mean, when you look at the fact that it's 19 weeks after she said weeks, not months, for cracking down on Iran, and in fact, there hasn't been a single sanction imposed on Iran, and you see what they have come up with, and clearly it was weakened and watered down in the U.N. Security Council against North Korea, does that send a message of strength or weakness?

HUME: Well, it depends on how you look at it. I wouldn't spend too much time worrying about whether it's 19 weeks or 19 days. What matters in the end is -- how much progress they could have made on their nuclear weapon in that period of time, nobody knows.

But at the end of the day, this is likely to be judged by what is actually forthcoming, and then we see what effect that has. This process of doing this diplomatically is not going to be swift. It never has been, and it never will be. So I wouldn't worry too much about the time tables. I'd worry about the results.

WALLACE: Let me ask you, Mara, about the politics of this, because -- kind of an interesting debate this week as to whether the North Korean crisis in effect helps the Republicans because it puts national security and the war on terror back as the top issue, or in fact that it hurts Republicans and helps Democrats because it says look, they have not been able to deal -- to get under control Iran and North Korea while they've been bogged down in Iraq.

How do you think it cuts politically for November?

LIASSON: You know, right now I don't see it helping the Republicans. I don't see it necessarily helping the Democrats a lot. But it's not necessarily a great achievement for the Republicans to show that their policy has so far not been effective.

As Bill has said, you lay down some red lines. The North Koreans walked right up to them and crossed over. I don't think this makes people think the Democrats are going to keep us safer, but I don't think it's the slam-dunk that usually national security events are for Republicans.

WALLACE: Take a drink of water.

Bill, your thoughts on the political...

KRISTOL: Yeah. I mean, national security is supposed to be the advantage for Republicans, and now it's neutral. I mean, John Kerry's recommendations are even more ridiculous than Condi Rice's wishfulness. It reminded me why, at the end of the day, I still prefer the Republicans to the Democrats.

But you can't really -- you know, Bush isn't doing anything -- the advantage Bush had in 2002 and 2004 on national security, the advantage Republicans had, is gone. That's what's going to account for the different outcome this year. That is the big change.

For all the talk about how tough the first term was, unilateral, big problem, Bush won in 2002 -- Republicans won in 2002. Bush won in 2004. He's adopted this wonderful multilateral diplomacy, U.N.- focused policy in 2006, and he's frittered away the advantage he has over the Democrats...

WALLACE: And we've got about 30 seconds left in this segment. So did George W. Bush fall into the Democratic trap by going multilateral?

WILLIAMS: No. I think that it's the right thing to do. But you're in a situation here where, you know, in fact, they've tried to blame the Clinton people, tried to blame... HUME: Who in the administration did that?

WILLIAMS: John McCain.

HUME: Name one person -- McCain is not in the administration.

WILLIAMS: Well, I think McCain was carrying administration water here when he...

HUME: Oh, please.

WILLIAMS: ... tried to blame Clinton, saying it was Clinton policy. But look, the problem is that he's clearly now in a position where the things that were giving him a boost -- the president I'm talking about -- the things that were giving him a boost in September are not working in October.

So unless Karl Rove is going to bring out Osama bin Laden or something, the Republicans have not had a good month so far.

WALLACE: Let's take a quick break here. We can continue this conversation. And in fact, as the rhetoric gets tougher here at the table, it also is getting hotter on the political trail. We'll examine the battle lines for '06 and '08 right after this break.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WALLACE: On this day in 1991, Clarence Thomas won Senate confirmation as a justice of the Supreme Court. He replaced Thurgood Marshall, becoming the second African-American to serve on the court.

Stay tuned for more from our panel and our Power Player of the Week.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CLINTON: Some of the reason we are facing this danger is because of the failed policies of the Bush administration.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

MCCAIN: The framework agreement her husband's administration negotiated was a failure.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Senators Clinton and McCain, the two leading presidential contenders for 2008, threw some punches this week over who's responsible for the mess in North Korea.

And we're back now with Brit, Mara, Bill and Juan.

Well, Brit, I detected more of an edge this week than we've seen generally from John McCain, especially when he went after, as he put it, Senator Kerry and Mrs. Clinton.

HUME: Well, he was responding, obviously, to something that she'd said. You showed it there. And that was an issue in which he was involved at the time, and it was critical, as I recall, at the time of what the Clinton administration did.

The idea that Juan suggested, that he was doing this to carry water for the Bush administration, borders on the ludicrous. McCain speaks for himself, and the Bush administration would love to get him to speak for them more often. It doesn't happen very often, and didn't happen this time.

But it is a symptom of '08 ambitions and possible rivalries as well as anything else. Privately, they're said to get along, Senator Clinton and Senator McCain, rather well, but not for that moment.

WALLACE: But, Mara, let me ask you about this, because Senator Clinton had to apologize to Senator McCain personally this week, I guess on the phone, but called him directly. Talk about that, if you will. LIASSON: Right, for something else. Apparently, somebody, a Clinton advisor -- we don't know who it is -- talked to Maureen Dowd on the telephone, the New York Times columnist...

WALLACE: Maureen Dowd, the columnist for the New York Times.

LIASSON: ... and said that when McCain said that, he looked like he was back as a prisoner of war in Hanoi spilling the names of his comrades.

WALLACE: Right.

LIASSON: Well, first of all, she apologized for that. That was way out of line. The McCain-Clinton rivalry, of course, is great fascination for everybody in the press corps. Also, it's at a fever pitch now, 2.5 years in advance. And I think the two of them are going to be going at this for the next 2.5 years like this.

I think more interesting is how the debate about which administration is more to blame for North Korea is going on right now in the context of the 2006 midterms, and it has become an issue.

WALLACE: Yes?

KRISTOL: Well, Senator Clinton was right to apologize for the alleged comment of her alleged advisor to Maureen Dowd. I mean, it was a ridiculous comment and she was right to apologize.

WALLACE: Let me turn and ask you about something else, Juan, and that was there was a big surprise this week in the presidential race, the 2008 presidential race. Former Virginia Governor Mark Warner, who had raised about $10 million and seemed to be doing pretty well in positioning in the south as the kind of moderate alternative in the Democratic race to Hillary Clinton, suddenly dropped out. Here's how he explained it.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

WARNER: For a while I want a piece of a real life. And as good as things look politically, I'm not going to take the next step.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Are we all incurably cynical to immediately doubt anyone in American politics who says they want to spend more time with their family?

WILLIAMS: Yeah, we probably are. But he's got a lovely family. He really is a family guy.

WALLACE: But we do doubt it, don't we?

WILLIAMS: Well, of course we doubt it, because we've been around for a while. But he has a lovely family, as I said, and you know, now the competition is who is going to be the anti-Hillary, who's going to be the person who comes up and challenges.
And he was in good position, not only former governor of Virginia, but in keeping with the notion of former governors like Clinton and Carter, southern governors coming along.

WALLACE: And is the more effective threat to Hillary Clinton and the Democratic field from the right, as Warner wanted to be, or from the left?

WILLIAMS: Well, now I think there's nobody on the right. I don't know who you would put there, because I...

WALLACE: Evan Bayh, perhaps?

WILLIAMS: Maybe, but I don't see him as having, at the moment, the kind of support, the kind of fund raising prowess, that Warner had.

So what we come down to now is the possibility of Edwards, maybe John Edwards, a southerner, or then you go to the really outlandish possibility, I think, of Barak Obama, or, maybe not so outlandish, Al Gore. Does Al Gore get in? But Al Gore would be coming at her from the left again.

KRISTOL: Al Gore will be a powerful challenger to Hillary Clinton. I think he'll run, and there will be a moment in the debate, which I hope you two are moderating, in late 2007 when Al Gore will, on the stage in New Hampshire or Iowa, will say, With all due respect, Senator Clinton, Senator Edwards, Senator Kerry, Senator Biden, you were all in the Senate and you voted for the war, and I said it was a mistake. I was right.

And for a Democratic primary audience, that is a powerful message that Al Gore will bring, I think. So I think Gore will be competitive against Clinton.

LIASSON: You know, I don't know if Gore will actually run. He might be happier doing what he's doing now. But I agree with you, that's a moment that any politician would really hate to miss.

Look, for a long time, I've said that the debate inside the Democratic Party for the nomination was going to be Hillary vs. some red state governor. But now I'm not sure. I do think there's -- there was always going to be challengers from the left and the right to her.

But she has very effectively, I think, taken up some of the ideological terrain on the right, so that I think the challenge might come from the left. She's also worked very hard to tamp down all that left-wing dissatisfaction with her. She's been a lot tougher on Bush lately. So I don't know if there's actually going to be a credible red state alternative to her.

HUME: Let's talk about this possibility. It seems likely now in almost all cards that the Democrats will get control of the House, which will bring us two years of Speaker Nancy Pelosi, who is not a popular figure or a respected figure nationally. Her behavior will be more visible than ever, more conspicuous than ever.

What effect does that have on the possibility of Hillary Clinton being nominated or elected in 2008? I think it's a very good question. I suspect the effect would not be terrifically positive.

WILLIAMS: Well, I think that if you look at Hillary Clinton, people are going to have enough problems with her as a polarizing figure without going into Pelosi. But I am interested to hear the great Brit Hume say that he now thinks the Democrats will win the House of Representatives, if that's what you're saying.

HUME: If the election were held today, they would.

WILLIAMS: And so you think that's what's going to happen when the election is actually held in November?

HUME: Well, don't ask me to predict.

WILLIAMS: Well, look. I think the Republicans have had a bad time. Bob Ney now is, you know, pleading guilty but he's not resigning. That just keeps this thing -- the Foley thing.

But I mean, it strikes me that what's really telling in this 2008 scenario is that McCain has all along been a key supporter -- this is not ludicrous, Brit, but a key supporter of the Bush administration on Iraq.

And given his military credentials and the fact that, as Bill Kristol, I'm sure, will tell you, Iraq will be the determinative factor in 2008, McCain has been a supporter.

HUME: He's also been a consistent critic of the way the war has been managed and handled. He has been one of the harshest critics of John McCain -- I mean of Donald Rumsfeld, so make no mistake about that. To say that he speaks for the administration is silly.

WALLACE: Let me just ask Bill Kristol, do you share Mr. Hume's pessimism about Republican chances in November?

KRISTOL: Yes. I mean, I've talked to a bunch of pollsters and campaign strategists who are working on real races late this week. Our colleague Fred Barnes did, too. Fred's even more cheerful, usually, than I am, and he thinks the House -- certainly, if the election were held today, the House would be lost.

And there has been real erosion over the last week in a bunch of House polls and even in some Senate polls.

WALLACE: In about 10 seconds, Mara, do you agree?

LIASSON: I think the situation looks worse for the Republicans than it did a couple of weeks ago, and they've only got about 3.5 weeks to turn it around.

WILLIAMS: I've been out on the campaign trail, and boy, I'll tell you, local issues are counting, and those do help Republicans. WALLACE: Help Republicans.

WILLIAMS: Yeah.

WALLACE: All right. Thank you, panel. That's it for today. See you next week. More to talk about.

Time now for some mail, and most of it was about the Mark Foley congressional page scandal. Lou Bauman from Utah writes, The Republicans' reaction to the Mark Foley scandal is yet another issue that illuminates the differences between Republicans and Democrats. The Republicans aren't perfect, but they at least strive to improve.

But Mark Strubhar from Illinois has little patience for the GOP response or charges that Democrats leaked the story. If the Republicans had taken care of the problem in the first place, there wouldn't have been anything to leak.

Up next, our Power Player of the Week.

(COMMERCIAL BREAK)

WALLACE: Ever since the movie classic Mr. Smith Goes to Washington, Hollywood producers have brought their crews to the nation's capital to film their stories, but if you think it happens on its own, just ask our Power Player of the Week.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

PALMER: Last year we did $61 million, which is quite a big deal of money in terms of production.

WALLACE: For 20 years, Crystal Palmer has been head of the D.C. Office of Motion Picture and Television Development, her job to get everything from commercials to documentaries to feature films shot in the nation's capital.

Why is movie-making important to Washington, D.C.?

PALMER: Jobs and revenue. Those are the variables that make us go after this business.

WALLACE: It can mean big money. One movie, National Treasure, brought in $6 million and 1,200 jobs to the local economy. So Palmer is constantly pitching D.C.

PALMER: We read tons of scripts. We submit tons of proposals. Sometimes it works. Sometimes it doesn't. We go to trade shows. We run advertisements.

WALLACE: It doesn't stop there. We caught up with Palmer on the set of The Shooter, a movie starring Mark Wahlberg about an ex-CIA agent. (BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

PALMER: How's the shoot been going?

(UNKNOWN): Oh, the shoot's been going great.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WALLACE: Once the crew is here, Palmer's staff scouts locations and helps with logistics, the most common request to shut down Pennsylvania Avenue for a fake presidential motorcade.

PALMER: And they basically recreate exactly as it exists, and the same offices that are used in the actual one are used in the movies.

WALLACE: Then there are the tougher assignments, like closing down Key Bridge for a scene in the movie Deep Impact.

This is one of the central...

PALMER: Yes.

WALLACE: ... ways in and out of Washington. How long did you shut it down for?

PALMER: Oh, it was probably about 10 hours, 10, 12 hours.

WALLACE: And there are the requests even Palmer can't satisfy, such as when the producers of Legally Blonde 2 wanted to shoot inside the U.S. Capitol.

They literally say we'd like to -- can you shut down the Senate, we'd like to shoot a movie here?

PALMER: Yes.

WALLACE: Do they not take no for an answer?

PALMER: Oh, eventually they do.

WALLACE: Washington has also tried to market itself as the site for world premieres. They recently opened the movie The Guardian here.

And do you make money off a premiere?

PALMER: Yeah, we do. Actually, we made close to $1 million dollars off that event.

WALLACE: Who are more demanding, politicians or movie producers?

PALMER: Movie producers. They just have so much of themselves wrapped up in it.

WALLACE: And they don't always listen to reason? PALMER: Well, I guess the only reason is their reason, and so you just kind of try to help them create what they want.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

WALLACE: Crystal Palmer says it was a big blow when the long- running show The West Wing went off the air. Now she's rooting for another successful T.V. series based in Washington.

And that's it for today. Have a great week. And we'll see you next Fox News Sunday .

CBS – FACE THE NATION

BOB SCHIEFFER, host: Today on FACE THE NATION, the nuclear crisis in North Korea. Yesterday, the United Nations Security Council unanimously imposed sanctions on North Korea in response to a suspected nuclear test earlier in the week. North Korea says it will respond with, quote, "physical countermeasures." What if they do? What will the response of the United States be? Are we prepared to take military action to carry out those sanctions? We'll ask the secretary of state, Condoleezza Rice.

Then, we'll get perspective on this and where we go in Iraq from Senator John Warner, Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and the former chairman of that committee, Democrat Sam Nunn.
David Sanger of The New York Times joins in the questioning, and I'll have a final word on the reassurance of knowing that things don't always work out the way they are supposed to.
But first, the secretary of state on FACE THE NATION.
Announcer: FACE THE NATION with CBS News chief Washington correspondent Bob Schieffer. And now, from CBS News in Washington, Bob Schieffer.
SCHIEFFER: And good morning again.

BOB SCHIEFFER, host:

The story today is North Korea, and we begin with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who joins us from Camp David.

Madame Secretary, thank you. And let's get right to it.

The UN Security Council, of course, in a 15-to-nothing vote, China and Russia going along, impose tough sanctions on North Korea. It bars them from importing and exporting everything from luxury goods to anything having to do with weapons, especially nuclear weapons. I guess my question to you is, how will this be enforced?

Dr. CONDOLEEZZA RICE (Secretary of State): Well, it is a mandatory resolution under Chapter 7, and it is a 15-0 vote, and that is a remarkable evolution, particularly for China, which has had a very close relationship with North Korea. And I just think it shows how really angry the world is with North Korea for doing this, and how concerned.

It will be enforced because member states have an obligation to enforce it. I think there are some matters that will need to be worked out, Bob. This resolution came about more rapidly perhaps than any in recent memory of this--of this magnitude. So there will be some matters to be worked out. There will be a committee to work out some of the sanctions. There will probably have to be some discussions about how interdiction might take place. But this is a really resounding defeat for North Korea, and it's a resounding victory, really, for the international community in its efforts to deal with proliferation matters.

SCHIEFFER: Well, let me just ask you about this interdiction. Let's say, for instance, is the United States prepared to board North Korean ships, or other ships coming into North Korea, to make sure that they're not bringing in some of these materials that this resolution prohibits?

Dr. RICE: Well, it is likely that countries that are receiving these ships in their waters, or in their ports, can request, or can in fact under this resolution demand the right to board. I think that we don't want to get out ahead of ourselves. Obviously, this is a very important tool that the international community can, can use, but will want to use it in a way that does not enhance the possibility for, for open conflict. And we want to have a very serious discussion about how to use this interdiction position.

SCHIEFFER: But what about in international waters? Will US ships interdict ships that are going into North Korea?

Dr. RICE: This is a cooperative arrangement between member states. It is--it relates principally to suspicious cargo through intelligence matters and the like. But again, Bob, I think that we want to work out the details of how this will work. This is a powerful tool, but it's also a tool that needs to be used carefully. And I don't think I want to speculate about how it's going to be used.

SCHIEFFER: OK. Let me just ask you one more question about this. Let's say North Korean ships, are we prepared to stop them as they're leaving, to see what they've got in them?

Dr. RICE: Bob, we are prepared to do what we need to do to make certain that North Korea is not exporting dangerous proliferation materials. And this gives us a tool to do that.

SCHIEFFER: All right.

Dr. RICE: But again, I think it's very important that we take the time to work out the details, because it's a powerful tool, but it's one that needs to be fully understood.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Madame Secretary, I want to bring in David Sanger of The New York Times. He has spent time in North Korea, as you know, and a lot of time in that part of the world. David:

Mr. DAVID SANGER (White House Correspondent, The New York Times): Madame Secretary, as you know, much of what goes in and out of North Korea goes across the very long border with China, a land border. And the Chinese ambassador, leaving the UN yesterday, said that he would not see China enforcing any restrictions that, quote, "would create conflict that could have serious implications for the region." If that's his view, what makes you think they'll enforce the ban along the border?

Dr. RICE: Well, I don't think anybody wants to create conflict. But China is a party now to an international resolution, a Security Council resolution that demands very clear cooperation of member states to make certain that dangerous goods are not getting in and out of North Korea.

North Korea has a long border, as you say, with China. It also has very close relations with China. But China has come a very long way in being willing to sign onto a resolution that makes China now responsible to make certain that North Korea's not trading. So I think that you're going to find China carrying out its responsibility; undoubtedly carrying it out in a way that it believes will not enhance conflict. None of us want to enhance conflict with these measures. We just want to keep North Korea from trading in dangerous materials.

Mr. SANGER: Madame Secretary, when you think back about the period of time that you've had to handle this difficult problem, back in 2003, just as the United States was headed into Iraq, you had a brief moment when the North Koreans had thrown out the inspectors, and had declared that they were going to take their collection of fuel rods that the inspectors had locked down, and were going to turn them into weapons. That may have been your last chance to strike their, either their reprocessing facilities or that fuel, and prevent them from getting the stockpile of weapons. Why did you choose, at that time, not to issue a warning to them on that?

Dr. RICE: David, the view then and now is that this is an issue, this is a problem, that is best handled through diplomatic means. Obviously, the president doesn't take any options off the table. But when you have a situation in which the United States doesn't have either all of the carrots or all of the sticks in dealing with North Korea, you have to build a coalition of states that has the right combination of sticks and carrots. And that's this coalition. And in fact, the six-party talks really come out of that period. The six-party talks then put China at the table, South Korea at the table--states that have real leverage.

And I do not accept that North Korea has an irreversible nuclear program. In fact, I think that you will see that these parties that have real leverage will now put enormous pressure on North Korea to come back to the six-party talks, really willing now to implement the joint statement, which would both reverse the North Korean nuclear program and give North Korea entry into the international system. That's the best possible outcome.

SCHIEFFER: Madame Secretary, the North Koreans have said that they might declare a state of war against the United States if these sanctions were too tough or if one of their ships is interdicted. What do we do then?

Dr. RICE: Well, the North Koreans say a lot of things. The most important thing is that they're again trying to make this an issue between the United States and North Korea. Quite clearly, it's not. Fifteen countries are signed on to this resolution that brands North Korea as a Chapter 7 threat to international peace and security. They're going to have to get accustomed to the fact that this is not a problem with the United States; this is a problem with the world. That is why it is so important not to allow this to become a bilateral negotiation, because the North would like nothing better than to simply deal with the United States so that we are the ones that isolated. They are clearly now the ones that are isolated, and I think that you're--we're going to hear these statements for a while, but there will be enormous pressure on the North to come back to the six-party talks, to negotiate seriously, to implement the joint statement, and to begin to reverse this course that it has been on really for decades.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Well, Madame Secretary, we'll leave it there. Thank you for joining us.

Dr. RICE: Thank you.

BOB SCHIEFFER, host:

And, with us now from Macon, Georgia, the former Democratic Senator Sam Nunn, former chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, the now-chairman of the Nuclear Threat Initiative. Here in the studio, the current chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, John Warner, Republican from Virginia.

Of course, Senator Warner, it struck me that when Secretary Rice was explaining all of this, she kind of gave it kind of a soft start. She didn't say we're going to automatically board these ships, she said we'll work on that down the line. I thought she might've just laid down the law in the beginning and said, `Look, here's what we're going to allow, here's what we're not going to allow, and here's what we're going to do about it.' What was your reaction?

Senator JOHN WARNER (Republican, Virginia; Chairman, Armed Services Committee): My reaction is they've taken the right course. I think the president, President Bush, and his team of Rice and Bolton did a wonderful job here. First place, it's unanimous. All came together. That has enormous symbolism all through Asia that everybody came together on this and stood. Now, as to the provisions, she's going over to work them out.

But that question you asked about China and its reluctance on the border, and here's my reaction to it: China is seeking world recognition, trying to emerge as a power and a strong voice. This is their test. China supplies over 60 percent of the energy and food to North Korea, they have got tremendous leverage through that. South Korea itself is got a program called Open Sunshine and support their trading. Those two nations should be out in the lead, and I think the president and the secretary have struck the correct balance.

Mr. SANGER: Senator, the Chinese have this enormous leverage, but they've been very reluctant to use it. And they've been reluctant to use it because they're more concerned about North Korea imploding.

Sen. WARNER: That massive exodus into their country, people bearing arms and all types of things.

Mr. SANGER: Given that piece of leverage that the North Koreans have--basically, the threat of--of self-destruction--what can we do to convince the Chinese, at this point, that they really need to crack down using this set of sanctions?

Sen. WARNER: You know, I've got a suggestion, and I made it not long ago in the context of Iran. And by the way, how we deal with this situation impacts the serious question with regard to Iran and its desire for--to become a nuclear power. But I said then it's time for that part of the world in the Middle East and now in this part of the world to look at the framework of NATO and how NATO came into being primarily to contain the Soviet Union and its ability to utilize nuclear weapons. It worked. And I think we should transition now from the nonproliferation, trying its best to stop it, into an area of deterrents and containment and downright defense if it's necessary. And bring in all the nations to share. I like the idea that the president has that we're not going to be out there driving the equation, the neighbors themselves should be the principle ones responsible, China and South Korea.

SCHIEFFER: Well, let me go to Senator Nunn and get his take on all this.

Senator, you said this week, I think, that it was more important to get imperfect sanctions quickly than to wait and linger until we could get perfect sanctions. What's your reaction to what's happened and where do we go from here?

Former Senator SAM NUNN (Democrat, Georgia; Co-chairman, Nuclear Threat Initiative): I think the sanctions are timely and I believe they're substantive, and I believe the fact that it was unanimous agreement here is enormously important and, as Senator Warren has said, I think it sends very strong signals. I also think we ought to continue to have a goal of getting rid of all nuclear weapons on the Korean peninsula. I believe that China is the key, as has already been observed here.

I think it would be real breakthrough if the United States and China and South Korea all got on the same wavelength for a change. We have not been approaching this with any kind of unity for the last three or four years. And that has been, I think, a very detrimental aspect of trying to deal with North Korea.

This is a defeat for China in terms of their policy--the tests that North Korea conducted. It's certainly a defeat for the United States policy and also a defeat for the South Korean policy. So getting on the same sheet of music here with our allies is enormously important, and that certainly includes Japan and hopefully Russia and Europe.

Now what can be done? One thing is you don't get a country to give up its nuclear weapons while you're talking about regime change. And I think it's also important to recognize that you don't get China and South Korea on the same sheet of music if they think our policy is to cause a collapse of the North Korean regime, which is going to cause them tremendous economic and humanitarian problems. So we've got to be willing to talk. We've got to be willing to talk about security assurances for North Korea, and we've got to do that not only because North Korea is going to be important in terms of its decision-making, and its security is very important to North Korea, but also because it's important to our allies.

So I agree with strong sanctions. I think we have to reassure Japan and South Korea that they are part of American defense and an attack on them is an attack on us, and I think we have to be willing to talk. All are necessary as a parallel course.

SCHIEFFER: Senator Nunn, back at the beginning of all this, I remember that the North Koreans were saying they wanted a treaty of some sort with the United States guaranteeing that we would not attack them. I don't know anybody in the world who thinks the United States is going to attack North Korea unless they attack somebody else. Should we be willing to talk about something like that?

Sen. NUNN: Well, the one country that may believe we are going to attack is North Korea.

SCHIEFFER: Yes.

Sen. NUNN: Which is a pretty important exception. Most countries do not. And I don't think--I think, as Secretary Rice said this morning--I don't think we have any intention to attack, but when you're paranoid and when you're developing nuclear weapons and when you see the United States has invaded Iraq, and they didn't have nuclear weapons, then it's pretty natural that you are going to develop your own program. And if you're going to give up those weapons, you have to have some security assurances, not just from the United States. And that's the value of the six-party talks. Those assurances have got to be with Japan and China as well as the United States and probably even Russia. But we have to be willing to have those kind of direct discussions. And we also have to precede that by having firm understanding with South Korea who doesn't want a North Korean collapse. And China, who doesn't want a North Korean collapse.

SCHIEFFER: All right. We'll talk about this a little bit more. And we're also going to talk about Iraq. But right now, let's take a break.

(Announcements)

SCHIEFFER: We're back again with Senator John Warner and former Senator Sam Nunn. And before we go to Iraq, Senator Warner, I just want to ask you, is China going to have to enforce that border? Are they going to have to crack down there to make sure that the North Koreans don't import stuff that could--they could use to build nuclear weapons?

Sen. WARNER: Well, it's the old adage, "A chain is no stronger than its weakest link." If that's left as an open border, then all of the rest of the containment and security measures could easily fail.

But there's another extremely aspect about this that I'm worried about. The current group of nations that have nuclear weapons are ones with established governments, and we have confidence in how their military and their civilian officials review all decision-making. Not so with Iran. We have seen nothing by way of its president in trying to encourage the world that he has any real strength. Same with North Korea. So these weapons now moving into hands of countries quite different than the earlier framework. And that concerns me and why I'm pushing to open up the concept of establishing a NATO-type situation both in the Korean environment as well as Tehran.

SCHIEFFER: OK. All right, let's go quickly now to Iraq. You came back from Iraq, Senator Warner, and said `We're going sideways there.'

Sen. WARNER: Mm-hmm.

SCHIEFFER: `And if things don't improve we're going to have to rethink our policy.' What does that mean?

Sen. WARNER: It means just exactly what that statement is, and I stand by it. You cannot see--you can see some movement forward, but a lot of movement back. As we are sitting here today one week out of my trip there, the exponential increase in the killings and the savagery that's going on over there. But bear in mind the morale of our troops is good. They're performing their missions. But we're trying to take a conventional type of military thinking and curtailing an insurgency. And history have shown that's the toughest.

But the bottom line is we cannot--and I said this in my transcript of that press conference--we cannot allow that country to implode and the government fail and those oil wells become a source of revenue for worldwide terrorism.

SCHIEFFER: All right, but, David.

Mr. SANGER: Secretary Baker said--of course he's running the Iraq study group.

Sen. WARNER: Yes, I knew that.

Mr. SANGER: And shortly after you made your statement, Secretary Baker said that we need to find a middle course between "stay the course" and "cut and run." What would that middle course look like and how could you do that consistent with the mission that the president has laid out, which is a fully democratized Iraq?

Sen. WARNER: Well, we--as I said, we have to rethink all the options, except any option which says we precipitously pull out, which would let that country fall into a certain civil war at that time, and all of the neighboring countries would be destabilized. It would be wrong to do that and unfair to the Iraqi people to let their oil become the cash cow for international terrorism. So we're forced, David, to look at what options exist between those two poles. And I think Baker, with whom I speak frequently, put it very clearly. What...

Mr. SANGER: Could that include some deadlines that make it clear...

Sen. WARNER: Well...

Mr. SANGER: ...to the Iraqis when it is that we may have to leave.

Sen. WARNER: I remember in my visits over there--many times I've been--an old Arab told me one time, `Look, the Western world has all the clocks, but we've got all the time.' They'll wait us out.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Well, let's see what Senator Nunn thinks about that.

Where do we go from here in Iraq, Senator Nunn?

Sen. NUNN: Well, I think the Baker-Hamilton report will be very important, and it'll come after the election. I believe that Senator Warner has given us a very sobering assessment in certainly the 60 to 90 day count of timeline he sees for the Iraqi government to get its house in order. I'm outside, and don't get briefed on these matters these days, but from the outside it appears to me that some type phase withdrawal that is negotiated with the Iraqi government, with some timelines for them to comply with what they've got to do to get a federation, and to give assurances to both the Sunnis and the Shiites and the Kurds, particularly on the revenue sharing from their oil money.

Also, I think we need to understand, this is a regional threat now. It was not to begin with, it is now. It is a regional threat with possible Shiite-Sunni conflict, not just in Iraq, but around the region.

SCHIEFFER: All right. All right.

Sen. NUNN: And I think we've got to negotiate and talk directly with the neighbors. That's very important.

SCHIEFFER: All right. Senator Nunn, we are out of time. Thank you, sir.

Sen. NUNN: OK.

SCHIEFFER: We'll be back with a final word in just a minute.

CNN – LATE EDITION

WOLF BLITZER, CNN ANCHOR: This is "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

JOHN BOLTON, U.S. AMBASSADOR TO THE UNITED NATIONS: We think that the fact that North Korea has conducted a nuclear test does amount to a clear threat to international peace and security.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Dealing with a nuclear North Korea. Will diplomacy work with defiant leader Kim Jong Il? We'll ask the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton.

Plus, perspective on North Korea, Iraq and Iran from two top U.S. senators, Democrat Carl Levin and Republican Chuck Hagel.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: We've been giving people the tools necessary to protect the homeland, and our Democrat colleagues back in Washington have taken a very different approach to the war on terror.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: President Bush campaigns to keep a Republican Congress in November. How will the president's foreign policy, the economy and the Foley scandal play at the polls? We'll talk to the chairmen of both U.S. political parties, Republican Ken Mehlman and Democrat Howard Dean.

With just 23 days until election day, Democrats are gaining ground with voters nationwide. Will it be enough to take control of the House and Senate? We'll get insight from our political panel: L.A. Times columnist Ron Brownstein, political analyst Stu Rothenberg, and CNN Senior Political Correspondent Candy Crowley.

"Late Edition's" lineup begins right now.

It's 11 a.m. in Washington, 8 a.m. in Los Angeles, 4 p.m. in London and 6 p.m. in Baghdad. Wherever you're watching from around the world, thanks very much for joining us for "Late Edition."

We'll get to my interview with the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, in just a moment. First, though, let's get a quick check of what's in the news right now. CNN's Fredricka Whitfield joining us from the CNN Center. Hi, Fred.

(NEWS BREAK)

BLITZER: Thanks very much, Fred. Now to the escalating crisis with North Korea. The man leading the charge at the United Nations this week to put the squeeze on North Korea after its declared nuclear test, the U.S. Ambassador John Bolton. I spoke with him just a short while ago.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Mr. Ambassador, thanks very much for joining us. Welcome back to "Late Edition."

JOHN BOLTON, U.S. AMBASSADOR TO UNITED NATIONS: Glad to be here.

BLITZER: Let's get to this resolution, unanimously passed yesterday by the United Nations Security Council. Some loose ends that I just would love you to clarify, if you can.

Does this resolution eliminate the option, at least for now, of military action against North Korea?

BOLTON: Well, it doesn't preclude a later resolution of the Security Council. You know, when we introduced our text for the council to consider on Monday, it didn't include at that point authorization to use force.

So that was never part of our plan for this resolution, which was to impose sanctions largely against North Korea's programs of weapons of mass destruction. And those provisions were adopted essentially as we had proposed them on Monday.

BLITZER: Because the resolution does include this language. I will read it to you. It says: "All the parties should refrain from any actions that might aggravate tension and to facilitate the early resumption of the six-party talks."

Some have interpreted that as meaning that the United States now is making it clear it has no intention or does not plan on using military force.

BOLTON: Well, I think the president has made it clear on any number of occasions that we want to solve the problem posed by North Korea's aggressive pursuit of weapons of mass destruction through peaceful diplomatic means. And that phrase that you have just read is entirely consistent with the policy the president has been pursuing these past several years.

BLITZER: The other outstanding loose end there that -- is whether or not the inspections of cargo coming to and from North Korea, for that matter, the inspections cannot take place on the high seas. They can only take place on the ground or in port. Is that right? BOLTON: No. The resolution doesn't really change the existing authority to conduct inspections, whether it's in territorial waters, airspace, or through land routes, or where it's appropriate, through interdiction on the high seas.

Certainly, our concept is that the overwhelming predominance of the inspections would take place in ports or at land crossings or that sort of thing. But the resolution neither increases nor decreases existing authority to interdict on the high seas.

BLITZER: It doesn't go as far as calling for a blockade of North Korea, that's correct, though?

BOLTON: Right. And we had not proposed that. Japan had proposed stronger measures than we had. We did pick up, actually, one of the proposals that Japan made to bar travel by North Korean officials engaged in their programs of weapons of mass destruction.

Japan, on its own, imposed those sanctions unilaterally earlier in the week, bringing them actually comparable to a kind of comprehensive sanctions the U.S. already has against trade with North Korea.

BLITZER: The Chinese ambassador, after the resolution -- after voting for the resolution, said this, which was a little perplexing to me. I want you to listen to what the Chinese ambassador to the U.N. said, and we'll get your response.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

WANG GUANGYA, CHINESE AMBASSADOR TO UNITED NATIONS: For China, our political position is, we are not in favor of inspections because for a number of years we -- as a general principle, we feel that it will lead to negative consequences.

So I do hope that with the watered-down language in the draft -- in the resolution itself that this has to be exercised with great care.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Now if the Chinese are not going to engage in inspections, it doesn't look like the resolution will have a lot of teeth, because, as you know, most of the trade between North Korea and the rest of the world goes through China.

BOLTON: Right. Well, the Chinese did vote in favor of the resolution. They did vote in favor of it as the Council acted under Chapter 7, which their own legal interpretations over the years have taken to mean that it's binding, binding on China as it's binding on the rest of the U.N.

And the guts of the resolution is to prohibit trade in weapons of mass destruction-related materials and high-end conventional military equipment. And I'm sure, sure that China is going to abide by the very resolution that it voted for. How it accomplishes that, I'm sure we'll have discussions about. But let's be clear, they voted in favor of the resolution that provides for an inspection regime.

BLITZER: But they're saying they are not going to engage in those inspections.

BOLTON: Well, the burden is on China to comply with the resolution. I'm sure there are a lot of different ways to do that. And I wouldn't want to think within just hours after the resolution that China was saying that it wasn't going to abide by what it had just voted for.

BLITZER: The resolution calls for an arms embargo of heavy equipment, but not necessarily light equipment, which, you wanted a total arms embargo. You didn't get it. Is that fair?

BOLTON: This was a compromise with China and Russia. What we cover here are warships, combat aircraft, battle tanks, high-end artillery equipment, many of the mechanisms by which nuclear or chemical or biological weapons could be delivered. So we were satisfied with this outcome.

BLITZER: Here is what the Russian defense minister, Sergey Ivanov, is quoted as saying this morning. He said: "Russian and China agree that means of political pressure on North Korea by the U.N. Security Council mustn't last indefinitely, that is, if the DPRK," the Democratic People's Republic of Korea, "returns to the six- party talks and progress is reached at those talks, sanctions must end automatically."

Is that the U.S. assessment as well?

BOLTON: Well, that's not what the resolution says. If you look at paragraph 15 of the operative section of the resolution, it says that in light of North Korean compliance with the terms of the resolution, the sanctions could be increased, modified, suspended or lifted, so that we've left open all of the possibilities depending on how North Korea itself behaves. That is why the ball is really in North Korea's court to see what direction we go in here.

BLITZER: So it sounds like there could be a split between the U.S. and Russia on this issue?

BOLTON: Well, again, Russia voted in favor of that paragraph, too. So I don't there is any split in terms of what they committed to.

BLITZER: The Russians were upset about a comparison that you made after the resolution was adopted, referring to that empty chair where the North Koreans had bolted right after the resolution -- after making the statement, the North Korean ambassador left, and you made a comparison between that empty chair and Khrushchev's appearance at the United Nations many years ago.

The Russian ambassador, Mr. Churkin, said, even in an emotional state, not to use an inappropriate -- not to use inappropriate analogies. He was critical of you for comparing, in effect, Russia to North Korea. Do you want to revise or amend that statement?

BOLTON: Well, I wasn't comparing Russia to North Korea. I was making a statement about the Soviet Union, which is gone now.

And I think -- I'm revealing myself as a child of the Cold War, I suppose, that I even remember that, but what it reflected, with Krushchev's shoe and North Korea, now, twice within three months, getting up and walking out of the Security Council is their attitude toward this body. And I think people can draw their own conclusions.

BLITZER: So you're not going to revise the statement?

You're standing by what you said?

BOLTON: Right.

BLITZER: And just ahead, the blame game: Who's more responsible for the current crisis with North Korea, the former president, Bill Clinton, or the current president, George W. Bush?

And what lessons should Iran learn from the current crisis with North Korea?

More of my interview with the U.S. ambassador to the U.N., John Bolton. That's coming up.

Also coming up, I'll speak live with two key U.S. senators about what used to be called the axis of evil, Iraq, North Korea, and Iran.

And later, how will all this play out on election day here in the United States, just some three weeks away?

I'll ask the party chairmen, Democrat Howard Dean and Republican Ken Mehlman.

Remember, for all the politics all the time, you can sign up for the CNN political ticker. Just go to CNN.com/ticker. Stay with "Late Edition." We'll be right back.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington. Ambassador John Bolton is the face and the voice of U.S. policy at the United Nations on issues of global policy, from North Korea to Iran and beyond.

More now with my conversation this morning with the ambassador, John Bolton.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: All right, let's talk a little more about the reaction from North Korea. Listen to what the North Korean ambassador said after this resolution was unanimously passed. (BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

PAK GIL YON, NORTH KOREAN AMBASSADOR TO UNITED NATIONS: It is gangster-like for the Security Council to have adopted, today, a coercive resolution, while neglecting the nuclear threat and moves for sanctions and pressure of the United States.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: All right. They are totally rejecting this resolution. What do you think?

What is going to happen, now, because it looks like the North Koreans are standing adamantly firm in going forward with their nuclear program?

BOLTON: Well, let's look for a moment at what he said again. He called the action of the Security Council "gangster-like." He said the United States had manipulated the rest of the council to vote for the resolution, which I can tell you, from my own experience, doesn't bear any resemblance to the reality we live in up here.

And most of his speech was a long attack on the United States, essentially saying that, if it weren't for the United States, they wouldn't be developing nuclear weapons, proving that North Korea is part of the "blame America first" crowd.

But I just -- I think that it's instructive -- people ought to watch the entire North Korean speech, and they would get, I think, a good indication of what their attitude is. Now it is possible that that speech will not reflect the considered judgment in Pyongyang after they consider the terms of the resolution.

We certainly hope that's right. We want them to come back to the six-party talks and pursue a diplomatic solution to the crisis. But we'll have to wait for a definitive response from Pyongyang.

BLITZER: I listened to the entire speech from the North Korean envoy -- North Korean ambassador, and you are right, most of it was directed at his anger, toward the United States, including this. Now let me play another clip for you, because he had -- this is a strong threat that he's making.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

PAK: If the United States increases pressure upon the Democratic People's Republic of Korea persistently, the DPRK will continue to take physical countermeasures, considering it as a declaration of war.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Your response?

BOLTON: Well, I hope that's just rhetorical excess on their part, but it's not untypical of the way North Korea conducts its diplomacy, through threats and bullying and attempted intimidation, hoping that others will back down.

And the Council, I think, by sending a very swift, very strong, unanimous response to the nuclear test of last Sunday, demonstrates, I think, it's not going to succumb to that kind of rhetoric or intimidation.

BLITZER: Has the U.S. government definitively concluded that the North Koreans, this past week, did engage in a nuclear weapons test?

BOLTON: Well, I don't think all the evidence is in, or a conclusive judgment has been made. Others can address that. I think it is interesting that the North Koreans themselves unambiguously claimed it was a nuclear test and that the Russian Federation has said publicly, through their own national technical means, that they believe it was a nuclear test as well.

BLITZER: The president has made some strong statements warning North Korea to slow down and not go forward with, first, a missile test back in July, and now a nuclear test. I want to play a few clips of what the president of the United States has said.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: A clear message to the North Korean leader that, first of all, launching the missile was unacceptable.

A clear message to the leader in North Korea: Your behavior is unacceptable.

The proclaimed actions take by North Korea are unacceptable.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: All right. He keeps saying everything is unacceptable. The North Koreans don't seem to be overly concerned about that.

BOLTON: Well, I think they need to be concerned, in light of the unanimous passage of this Resolution 1718, combined with the unanimous 1695 a few months ago, that their isolation is growing.

And their ability to finance their leadership's luxurious lifestyle and to finance their programs of weapons of mass destruction in ballistic missiles are now imperiled by the sanctions that we have imposed, not just in the trade of the materials and technology of weapons of mass destruction but going after their financial networks too, going after their illicit activities: counterfeiting American money; selling illegal narcotics through diplomatic pouches. If we can cut off their hard currency earnings, we can put a severe crimp in their lifestyle, and more importantly -- of the leadership -- more importantly do considerable damage to their financial ability to carry on the weapons of mass destruction programs.

That's what our objective is. And I think, if we can get these sanctions implemented effectively, it will make a big difference. BLITZER: The president and you and other top officials have said you will engage in direct talks with North Korea. And you have engaged in direct talks with North Korea through the six-party dialogue but not outside of that six-party framework.

And some are asking, in order to prevent this crisis from escalating, what would be wrong with going outside the six-party dialogue and just having the United States and North Korea do what the North Koreans want and have that direct exchange of ideas?

BOLTON: Fundamentally, because we have had that direct exchange of ideas. When we say within the context of the six-party talks, the way this has worked out is that there have been meetings between North Korean and American representatives, just those two countries, in a room, alone, but at the same time that the six-party talks are also being held, which is entirely appropriate, so that the countries of the region -- South Korea, which shares a border with North Korea, Japan, which is within missile range, China and Russia, which also share borders, are fully aware of the conversations that we're having with the North Koreans.

We don't think that the neighbors should be excluded from these talks. We don't think that the talks should go on as if this were a problem between North Korea and the United States. It's obviously not. As this recent 15-0 vote by the Security Council shows, this is a problem between North Korea and the rest of the world.

BLITZER: I want your quick reaction to what Senator Hillary Clinton said earlier in the week on Monday. Listen to this.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR HILLARY CLINTON, D, NEW YORK: Some of the reason we are facing this danger is because of the failed policies of the Bush administration. And I regret deeply their failure to deal with the threat posed by North Korea.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: All right. You want to respond to her?

BOLTON: Well, not directly. But I'll say that when President Bush came into office, he found increasing evidence that the North Koreans were violating an agreement that they had struck in 1994, in fact, had probably been violating it almost before the ink was dry.

And he took steps to confront the North Koreans with this evidence that they were pursuing nuclear weapons through a completely separate route than had been thought before. The situation had been changing even before President Bush took office. So he was confronted with the reality that he had to deal with and that he's been attempting to deal with since then.

BLITZER: The argument, though, that Clinton administration officials will make is that there was a framework -- there was a formula to deal with that kind of violation within that existing 1994 agreement that the Bush administration unilaterally abandoned. Your response?

BOLTON: Well, of course, there was not such a framework. Let's be clear who abandoned the Agreed Framework. North Korea formally renounced it. Of course, they had shredded the agreement already by their persistent violations.

And there are a variety of other issues that you could get into. But the real fact that we need to address is that North Korea, for some 15 to 20 years, has been pursuing a nuclear weapons capability. And ignoring what was happening as they pursued it through the uranium enrichment route in the late 1990s was something that President Bush had to try and turn around, that he did turn around by sending a delegation to Pyongyang and saying to the North Koreans, you have been violating your commitment.

And the North Koreans quite forthrightly said, you are right, we have been violating our commitment. So that was a new fact that the president had to consider, and he did consider.

BLITZER: One final question, Mr. Ambassador, before I let you go. No one is watching this whole crisis more closely than the leadership in Iran, which is pursuing its own nuclear program.

The Iranian president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, said on Tuesday, the Iranian nation will continue its path of dignity based on resistance, wisdom, and without fear. What message do you hope that the Iranians will learn, will accept from the North Korean crisis?

BOLTON: I hope the lesson they learn is that if they continue to pursue nuclear weapons, they will face the same kind of isolation and restrictions that we've just imposed on the North Koreans. The Iranians as well could have dialogue with the United States. They could enjoy a completely different relationship with the United States if they would suspend their uranium enrichment activities.

This is an unparalleled offer that President Bush's administration has made that the Iranians spurned because they seemed to be obsessed with the idea of getting nuclear weapons. And as long as they pursue that course, we'll have to respond accordingly.

BLITZER: Mr. Ambassador, thanks very much for joining us on "Late Edition."

BOLTON: Glad to be here.

(END VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: And up next, I'll ask two key U.S. senators, Republican Chuck Hagel and Democrat Carl Levin, about the current crisis with North Korea and the escalating violence in Iraq.

But up next, we'll have a quick check of what's in the news right now. And this vote for our North American viewers, only about 90 minutes away or so, "This Week at War." CNN's John Roberts checks in with our correspondents in Baghdad, Tokyo, the Pentagon and the White House. Stay with "Late Edition." We'll be right back.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington. A North Korean nuke, new warnings about the risks in Iraq, scandal in the U.S. Congress, all in the spotlight this week.

Helping us sort it all out, two powerful U.S. senators: in New York, Democratic senator Carl Levin of Michigan; he's the ranking member of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

And with us here in Washington, Republican senator Chuck Hagel of Nebraska. He's a member of the Senate Foreign Relations and Intelligence Committee.

Senators, welcome back to "Late Edition."

And Senator Levin, let me start with you. Do you have a problem with anything you heard from the U.S. ambassador of the United Nations, John Bolton?

SEN. CARL LEVIN (D), MICHIGAN: Yes, I have a problem with just about everything that he said, frankly. He thinks the U.N. resolution is a strong resolution. I'm afraid it's not. I wish it were. But the Chinese already said that they're not going to enforce inspections against goods going into North Korea without total Chinese support. There's no way a sanction regime can work.

And then, near the end, he said that, well, we have no problem sitting down with the North Koreans, just one-on-one; well, we've done that. Wolf, I really have got to tell you, I am utterly amazed to hear our U.N. ambassador say that, when just a few months ago, the president repeated what he has said over and over again.

And here's the way the president the way put it. He said "One thing I'm not going to let us do is get caught in the trap of sitting at a table alone with the North Koreans."

Now, it's incredible to me that our ambassador would make the representation that he did on your show. It's also a mistake, in my judgment, not to sit down bilaterally with the North Koreans, providing our allies want us to do that, and they do.

They've been urging us -- the South Koreans have urged us, repeatedly, to sit down, one-on-one, with the North Koreans.

Instead, the president presents this false choice, that we're either going to go it alone or do this with allies. There's a third choice, which is to have bilateral talks with the North Koreans, providing our allies want us to do that, which they do.

BLITZER: Let me let Senator Hagel respond. Go ahead, Senator.

SEN. CHUCK HAGEL (R), NEBRASKA: Great powers engage, Wolf. We do need to engage the North Koreans, as we need to engage the Iranians and the Syrians. A U.N. sanctions resolution is fine. It is limited. As Carl said, it is weak. We heard on your program about 15 minutes ago what the Chinese ambassador said. Essentially he said we're not interested in enforcing that resolution. And China is the most important country in dealing with the North Koreans, with that sanction, because they share a 900-mile border.

But the United States must, now, find a resolution to this issue. We're not going to resolve the issue with North Korea through a sanction.

BLITZER: Let me get this straight, Senator Hagel. You think the United States should engage in direct discussions with the North Koreans outside the framework of what's called the six-party negotiations?

HAGEL: Well, obviously, you keep your allies and your friends together. That six-party talks format is important; there's no question about it.

But the fact is, we are the great power here. We are the adult power in the world. It is because of the United States, our action or inaction, that there will be a resolution here.

And it is rather clear to me, part of the process in getting to that resolution is a bilateral conversation. Now, I know what Ambassador Bolton said about we do talk; we have talked, but those are side talks. Those are part of the six-party talks.

We have got to get to the core of the issue. If we do not do that, we are going to find the world, daily, in a far more dangerous situation.

And it does include the Iranians, and it does include the Syrians. Yes, North Korea is separate in this case, but we have a wide scope here that we're dealing with.

And just as Jim Baker said last week, we always must engage our enemies, because that is the only sure way to drive toward the core of a resolution.

BLITZER: James Baker, the former secretary of state, during the first Bush presidency, Bush 41, as it's called.

Your colleague, John McCain, was very tough this week, Senator Levin, in saying, you know what, there were a lot of direct bilateral talks between the U.S. and North Korea during the Clinton administration, and look what it got the world. Listen to what McCain said.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

SEN. JOHN MCCAIN (R-AZ): Every single time the Clinton administration warned the Koreans not to do something, not to kick out the IAEA inspectors, not to remove the fuel rods from their reactor, they did it. And they were rewarded every single time, by the Clinton administration, with further talks. (END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: He was speaking in your home state of Michigan. You want to respond to Senator McCain's charge?

LEVIN: Well, the Clinton administration succeeded at least partially. They succeeded in keeping the plutonium canned, under inspections, so it could not be used. And they succeed in doing that for eight years.

When the North Koreans broke out, they broke out in a way which is obviously unacceptable, but in a less dangerous way, which is trying to figure out how they could upgrade their uranium. So there was partial success.

And by the way, that's not just me saying that. Colin Powell, former secretary of state, gave the Clinton administration credit -- even after the uranium discovery was made, he gave the Clinton administration credit for at least partial success with North Korea.

Compare that to the total failure of the Bush administration relative to North Korean policy.

BLITZER: Well, let me read to you what Madeleine Albright, who was the secretary of state during the Clinton administration, said this week.

She said, "During the two terms of the Clinton administration, there were no nuclear weapons tests by North Korea, no new plutonium production and no new nuclear weapons development in Pyongyang. Through our policy of constructive engagement, the world was safer. President Bush chose a different path, and the results are evident for all to see."

Do you blame the president of the United States, Senator Hagel, for the current crisis with North Korea?

HAGEL: Well, I think we should put all this behind us. I know this is a political season. I know both parties, and candidates everywhere, are trying to score as many points as they can over the next three weeks.

But the fact is, this is far too important to be held captive to a political agenda. The Clinton framework of agreement they negotiated in 1994 did score some very successful and important points. Carl noted those. And the fact is, and we now know this, the North Koreans cheated on some of those. But we've got to move forward now. We are where we are, and it further divides our country and the world and our allies, and it makes us look a little silly, and we isolate ourselves, if we hold this captive to a political debate in this country.

We've got to find a resolution...

BLITZER: The blame game is in full force...

HAGEL: It is.

BLITZER: ... here in Washington.

HAGEL: Well, it is. And again, I understand that. I'm part of the political process, and I have a clear appreciation of that.

But the fact is, some consensus of purpose and focus has to be brought together with our allies. And we are the leaders of that. And we have got to take what's worked and understand what's not worked.

Both administrations have had failures on this. There is no question about that. But there have been some successes, too. Let's build on those. Let's bring some bipartisan focus together. I hope, after the voters speak on November 7, we'll be able to do that.

BLITZER: All right, and we're going to take a quick break, but we have a lot more to talk about, Senators. Please stay with us. We're going to talk about the upcoming election. Is it a referendum on President Bush?

The war in Iraq, scandal in Congress, much more coming up with these two United States senators.

And for our North American viewers, don't miss the "War of Words" segment with John Roberts coming up on "This Week at War." That airs at 1:00 p.m. Eastern.

And this additional programming note: Tomorrow night on Larry King live, he captured the world's attention with false claims about JonBenet Ramsey. You've heard all the theories. Now John Mark Karr tells his story. That's coming up tomorrow night, 9:00 p.m. Eastern on Larry King live.

We'll take a quick break. We'll be right back.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

GEORGE W. BUSH, PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: I want to thank you for what you have done, and I encourage you to continue to work to turn out the vote, come this November.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: President Bush this week rallying the party faithful to boost Republican turnout on election day, now only about three weeks away. Welcome back to "Late Edition." We're continuing our conversation with Democratic Senator Carl Levin and Republican Senator Chuck Hagel.

Senator Levin, you just got back from a visit to Iraq. And I wonder if you agree with what the new British Army commander, Sir General Richard Dannatt, said this week. Among other things, he said, it's time to "get ourselves out sometime soon because our presence exacerbates the security problems. Whatever consent we may have had in the first place has largely turned to intolerance."

Is that your bottom line as well?

LEVIN: It has been for a long time, and we have to find a way out of there sooner rather than later. He spoke up, and I think it's great that we have top professional officers like him, whether here or in Britain, that do speak out, because they know best.

They've been to war. They understand. And what our leaders in Iraq, our uniformed leaders in Iraq, tell us is basically the same thing. There is no military solution to this conflict. Now, either the insurgency or the sectarian violence requires a political solution, and that we've got to put pressure on the Iraqis to take over their own country.

If they're going to have a civil war, they're going to have to do it without us, and what the leaders, our uniformed leaders in Iraq, really tell us is that we've got to find a way to put some pressure on the Iraqis to make these tough decisions. And what they're going to do by the end of the year, and I'm talking here about General Casey and others, is they're going to take a review of our whole situation and come up with some recommendations, relative to transferring authority to the Iraqis. This is long overdue. We've got to focus Iraqi leadership attention on this by telling them we need to begin a phased redeployment of American troops from Iraq within the next few months.

BLITZER: You know, Senator Levin was in Iraq, Senator Hagel, with John Warner, the chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, who came back also with a rather gloomy assessment of what he saw and heard from U.S. military commanders and others in Iraq. Listen to what Senator Warner, Republican of Virginia, said.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR JOHN WARNER, R-VIRGINIA: In two or three months, if this thing hasn't come to fruition and if this level of violence is not under control and this government able to function, I think it's a responsibility of our government internally to determine, is there a change of course that we should take?

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: I don't know about you, but I was pretty surprised by Senator Warner's comments, given the fact that from day one he's been an ardent supporter of the Bush administration's strategy in Iraq.

HAGEL: Well, I agree with Chairman Warner's assessment. Carl essentially said the same thing. We are going to have to find a new strategy. Let's start with this very clear understanding, and Carl noted it. The future of Iraq is going to be determined by the Iraqi people. It will not be determined here in Washington.

Now, that is a fact of life as far as I'm concerned, and we are now in a situation where we have very few options. Our options are limited. The American people are not going to continue to support, sustain a policy that puts American troops in the middle of a civil war.

Let's also examine what the Iraqi parliament did about three days ago, when they voted to go ahead and allow the 18 provinces in Iraq to start thinking about breaking up into autonomous regions. Now, they can't activate that for 18 months, but these are the kind of political decisions that are going to have to be made by the Iraqis. We do need to change some kind of course here.

Jim Baker and Lee Hamilton's commission is going to come back in by the end of the year with some new recommendations. That's a hopeful sign, finally, that we're getting another point of view. Also, this issue is going to be forced upon us by the U.N. because by the end of this year, coalition forces, the legal mandate to have U.N. forces in there, including the United States, is up.

So we need to find a new strategy, a way out of Iraq, because the entire Middle East, wolf, is more combustible than it's been probably since 1948, and more dangerous, and we're in the middle of it.

BLITZER: You know, Senator Levin, the president describes your policy for Iraq, other Democrats' policy, as simply one of cut and run. Listen to what he said this past week.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: If we were to abandon that country before the Iraqis could defend their young democracy, the terrorists would take control of Iraq and establish a new safe haven from which to launch new attacks on America.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Whether it was like this to begin with, it is now, he says, the central point, the central front in the war on terror, and the United States can simply not abandon Iraq. You want to respond to that?

LEVIN: Yeah, we're on a downward spiral in Iraq. And we're not succeeding in Iraq. And the way that, hopefully, that we can succeed is by pressuring the Iraqis to make the political compromises relative to resources and relative to power-sharing, which only they can make. Chuck Hagel's absolutely right, the Iraqis have got to make these decisions. They're political decisions.

The current course is a course which is not working. And when that is true, you try to change that course, change the direction, to try to get to something that will work. The only thing that will work here is pressing the Iraqis to make those difficult decisions and compromises that only they can make.

BLITZER: You're a Republican, Senator Hagel, and clearly, you're probably worried about going from the majority status to the minority status in the U.S. Senate. If you lose six seats, you're going to be a minority senator as opposed to a majority senator.

Here's some recent polls that we've had that could explain why Republicans are in deep trouble right now in the Senate and the House. How is President Bush handling Iraq? Thirty-two percent of the American public approve of the way he's doing it. Sixty-six percent disapprove. Has the war in Iraq made the U.S. safer from terrorism? Thirty-six percent say yes, 53 percent say no. Did the Bush administration deliberately mislead the public about how the Iraq war is going? Fifty-eight percent of the American people say yes, 41 percent say no.

You add up those polls, and a lot of other poll numbers, and you as a Republican have to be deeply concerned about what's going to happen on November 7th.

HAGEL: Democracies force events and actions in leadership. The Republican Party is the majority party. We have controlled government almost six years, in the Congress almost 12 years, so we're accountable. We're all accountable, each of us. And this business is about accountability.

I hope that the Republicans win enough seats that we stay in the majority on November 7th. It's up to the people. And that is the essence of a democracy and the strength of a democracy. If the people of this country think we need to change course in every way and change leadership, they'll make that determination.

We're accountable. And yes, I'm a Republican, and yes, I want to stay in the majority. But we have to earn the trust and the confidence of the American people.

And I don't think in a political way or in any substantive way, the Democrats have produced clear alternatives to some of these big problems. Are we going to have to take this responsibility for governing? Yes, we are.

But that's a democracy. And I would hope that after November 7th, Wolf, whatever happens, whether Carl becomes the new chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee or not, that this country can come back together with some consensus over the next two years, and deal with these big problems that we face.

BLITZER: We're going to have to leave it on that note. Senator Hagel, thanks very much for coming in. Senator Levin, thanks to you as well.

And coming up on "Late Edition," I'll explore more of the political landscape with the two party chairmen. Howard Dean gives us the Democratic strategy to regain control of Congress. Ken Mehlman has the Republican plan to try to hold on to the majority in the House and the Senate.

(BEGIN VIDEOTAPE)

BLITZER: Ban Ki-moon, what's his story? The South Korean diplomat is set to become the United Nations' next secretary general, succeeding Kofi Annan. Ban is currently South Korea's foreign minister and has played a prominent role in the six-party talks to stop the standoff in North Korea. Fluent in English and French, the 62-year-old Ban holds a graduate degree from Harvard University. As the head of the U.N., he'll oversee a $5 billion budget and over 90,000 peace-keepers.

People close to Ban say his goal in life is to be the world's best diplomat. He's scheduled to assume the U.N. secretary general duties on January 1st. Anna Politkovskaya, what's her story? Hundreds of mourners paid respects to the Russian journalist, who was buried this week after being gunned down in her Moscow apartment building. One of Russia's most outspoken writers, Politkovskaya was a fierce critic of the Russian President Vladimir Putin and Russia's war in Chechnya. Her work won her many accolades, including Amnesty International's global award for human rights journalism. Politkovskaya was shot four times at close range, and there are indications that her death was a contract killing.

BLITZER: Let's take a look at what's on the cover of this week's major news magazines here in the United States. Newsweek has a look at how for 50 years, North Korea plotted to go nuclear. Time magazine features a story on why Barack Obama could be the next president of the United States. And U.S. News and World Report looks at science and the soul and how new research is challenging our cherished ideas of self and the human spirit.

Time now for your e-mail. Jeff from Las Vegas visited the CNN Election Express Yourself and writes this: "It seems that Bush is planning on an attack in the near future by gaining alliances with China and going on the news with a list of reasons why we should go into North Korea. When we go into North Korea, will our military be too thinly spread?"

The CNN Election Express Yourself gives people a close-up political experience as it visits more than 13 American cities. It is now on its way to Kansas City, Missouri and will arrive on Wednesday the 18th. As always, we welcome your comments. The e-mail address, lateedition@cnn.com.

There's much more ahead coming up on "Late Edition." Will the latest sex scandal on Capitol Hill topple the speaker, Dennis Hastert, and the Republican Party? We'll ask the party chairmen, Howard Dean and Ken Mehlman. They're standing by live.

And I'll follow up with Ron Brownstein, Candy Crowley, Stu Rothenberg. They've been keeping a close eye on the upcoming elections. And don't forget, for our North American viewers, right after "Late Edition" at 1 p.m. Eastern, John Roberts hosts "This Week at War." Stay with us. "Late Edition" will be right back.

BLITZER: This is "Late Edition," the last word in Sunday talk.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: But the GOP is struggling to regain footing after the Mark Foley scandal. Could it lead to a shift in the balance of power on Capitol Hill?

The party chairmen join me, Republican Ken Mehlman and Democrat Howard Dean.

How will it all play out at the polls?

Expert analysis from our panel, Ron Brownstein of the Los Angeles Times, Stuart Rothenberg of the Rothenberg Political Report and CNN's senior political correspondent, Candy Crowley.

Welcome back. We'll be speaking live to the two major political party chairmen here in the United States, Howard Dean and Ken Mehlman. That's coming up in just a few moments.

First, though, let's go to CNN's Fredricka Whitfield for a quick check of what's in the news right now.

(NEWSBREAK)

BLITZER: In Iraq, deadly attacks, as Fred just pointed out, continue against U.S. forces and Iraqi civilians, with apparently no end in sight.

One key insurgent group, though, has now broken its usual silence. Our correspondent Michael Ware is joining us with an exclusive report. He's joining us from Baghdad.

Michael, tell our viewers in the United States and around the world what you are picking up, now, for the first time. MICHAEL WARE, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Well, Wolf, what we have here is, amidst this wave of dreadful violence during the holy month of Ramadan offensive by the insurgents, we have one of Iraq's leading insurgent groups, part of one of the most powerful homegrown alliances of guerrilla organizations, reiterating its offer to negotiate with U.S. forces for what effectively would be a truce or a cease-fire.

What we have is the Islamic Army of Iraq, one of the backbones of the insurgency. In an interview conducted by what's purported to be its spokesman, Ibrahim al-Shimary (ph), with CNN.

CNN forwarded a number of questions through known Islamic Army channels to the leadership of the insurgent group. And their response to CNN came back in a professionally produced videotape with the spokesman answering CNN's questions. On the issue of negotiations, he says that the Islamic army is again prepared to negotiate with U.S. forces.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

UNKNOWN (THROUGH TRANSLATOR): We in the Islamic Army, as we have announced many times, do not reject the principle of negotiations with the Americans, but only if the Americans are serious.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

WARE: In this wide ranging interview, Wolf, he sets two condition conditions for those negotiations, a time-table approved by Congress for the withdrawal of U.S. forces and a formal recognition by the U.S. of the Iraqi insurgency.

It was a wide- ranging interview, where the Islamic army canvasses the role of Al Qaida, the civil war here in Iraq and, most pertinently, what it considers to be the driving force behind the Sunni insurgency, which is Iranian influence in Iraq.

The speaker talks directly to the American people, urging them to question President Bush's record on Iraq. Wolf?

BLITZER: I take it that the Iraqi insurgents blocked out this insurgent leader's face. That wasn't what we were doing. Is that right?

WARE: Absolutely, Wolf. We sent written questions. We have known channels of communication with this very powerful insurgent group, which has been on the guerrilla radar, here in the war in Iraq since 2003.

So it's one of the oldest, strongest and most active groups, representing a key faction within the insurgency.

And the video that came back, much like their propaganda videos that we've seen, is rather slick. It has a setting akin to a studio. It's professionally lit and it has the group's logo or watermark on the screen. So this is the form of the answers that they sent back to CNN's questions. Wolf?
BLITZER: All right, Michael Ware, doing some excellent reporting for us. Michael, we're going to check back with you, so stay tuned for that, Michael Ware, doing some exclusive reporting for us, as he so often does.

Let's move on, though, to some other important issues we're following here, only about three weeks to go before election day in the United States.

Is it a popularity contest for the president, a referendum on the war in Iraq?

Is it reaction to the congressional page scandal or is it just local to the core?

We're talking today to the chairmen of both political parties. First, let's speak with the Democratic party chairman, the former presidential candidate Howard Dean, also the former governor of his home state of Vermont.

Governor, thanks very much for coming in.

HOWARD DEAN, DNC CHAIRMAN: Thank you, Wolf.

BLITZER: Let me get your quick reaction to what Michael Ware was just reporting exclusively.

Should the U.S. be doing what this insurgent leader is demanding, offering a timeline, a withdrawal schedule to get out of the Iraq?

DEAN: Well, here's the problem. What are we doing in a country where terrorists think that, in order to end this civil war, they have to negotiate with the United States?

It kind of implies that we're really the problem there and that that's what most Iraqis believe, which, in fact, unfortunately, is true.

So you know, I do believe what Jim Baker says, that we ought to talk to our adversaries. But I think that we've seen these propaganda videos in the past. We don't know if this is real or not.

The real problem with the Iraq policy is not that we are not negotiating with the terrorists; it's that the Iraqi government, which we're propping up, is nonfunctional and that we're in the middle of a civil war.

BLITZER: But the bottom line -- forget about this propaganda video, if in fact, that is what it is -- should the U.S. have a hard and fast timeline for pulling out its troops from Iraq?

DEAN: The U.S. should establish some sort of a timeline. This is not what the president calls cut and run. This is what the president refuses to acknowledge, that we cannot stay there forever.

The president has said that we ought to stay there and leave this problem to the next president. I think that is not only irresponsible and doesn't show leadership; it also doesn't make any sense.

That was the approach, in Vietnam, under Nixon and Agnew, which this administration reminds me of a great deal. All it did was resulted in 10,000 more deaths of American soldiers, who were doing the best they can over there.

If we really want to support our soldiers, we'll do what the military wants to do, which was put in more troops when we went, and now, many military people believe that we can't sustain what we're doing over there. And I agree with the military.

BLITZER: It's only a little bit more than three weeks to go before the elections November 7. The Republicans are putting out their best lines right now.

I want you to listen to what the vice president, Dick Cheney said, to his conservative Republican base this year, warning of what would happen if you and the Democrats were to assume the majority in the Senate and House.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

RICHARD B. CHENEY, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES: If the Democrats take control, American families could face an immense tax increase and the economy would sustain a major hit. As the president has said, this nation needs more than a temporary economic expansion. So we need more than temporary tax relief.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: The bottom line is that, if Democrats are elected, the warning goes out to the American people: get ready to pay higher taxes.

DEAN: That's nonsense. We have no interest in doing that. In fact, 80 percent of Americans have seen their income go down. The reason the economy doesn't work for the president is only his friends have benefited from increased earnings and corporate earnings and so forth.

What we're interested in doing is building a health care system that works for everybody.

Initially, I think what we'll do is raise the minimum wage, which the president refused to do without giving tax breaks to his contributors.

We're not going to be the party of tax breaks to oil companies and insurance companies. We're going to be the part of middle class tax fairness. That does not include any increases of taxes on middle- class Americans of any kind.

You know, we always see the Republicans coming out -- your country's going to be blown up if the Democrats take over; your taxes are going to go up. They're desperate. The truth is we believe that we ought to increase the pay of average middle class Americans and working class Americans. We believe we ought to do something about their health care.

And we also believe there ought to be real ethics reform in Congress, which the Republicans refused to do.

BLITZER: Which tax cuts the Bush administration implemented do you want to see eliminated or just allowed to run its course and go away?

DEAN: You know, we may not need -- the principal tax cuts that we need to eliminate are the tax breaks that the president gave to ExxonMobil and the other oil companies, and the secret tax breaks they gave in the middle of the night to HMOs and insurance companies. That would save us $36 billion a year. We plan to make sure that middle- class people pay less taxes, not more, and that they make more money.

BLITZER: What about the tax cuts for the upper-income brackets?

DEAN: Well, you know, I'm not interested in raising anybody's taxes. What I'm interested in is ethical reform and honesty in government. I'm interested in balancing the budget, which we haven't -- which the Republicans have made a mess of. I'm interested in restoring moral values to the Congress of the United States. Those are the things that I think you're going to see high on the Democrats' agenda, should we win three weeks from now.

BLITZER: Here's what the president's top political advisor Karl Rove said this week. Take a listen.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

KARL ROVE, PRESIDENTIAL ADVISER: The problem for them is that their views have consequences. And their policies would make America more, not less, vulnerable. In war, weakness emboldens your opponents, and it's an invitation for disaster. You cannot will the end without willing the means to an end.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: All right. That's another strategy that Republicans have, to go after Democrats on the issue of homeland security, national security. That they're better at fighting terrorists than Democrats are.

DEAN: I think the American people have been lied to by this group just one too many times. Here's the president's and the Republicans' record on defense. The president came in and identified three countries as a problem. Iraq, Iran and Korea.

Six years later, we're in the middle of a civil war in Iraq we can't get out of. We're in the middle of a testing program by North Korea for nuclear weapons. Not one additional nuclear weapon was added when Bill Clinton was president. But now George Bush comes along, and they're testing nuclear weapons, and Iran is about to get nuclear weapons. Osama bin Laden, who is responsible for the murder of 3,000 Americans, is at large.

I would argue that the Democrats are likely to be much stronger own defense than Republicans. I think they're weak on defense. They talk tough to scare the American people at election time, and in the meantime don't do anything.

Look at the U.N. resolution. Big thing I saw on all the talk shows this morning, Josh Bolten, oh what a great U.N. resolution. The Chinese have already, before the ink is dry, said they're not going to search any North Korean trucks going into North Korea.

This a toothless administration. They have not defended the United States of America, and we need a tough and smart defense policy, not just talk tough at election time.

BLITZER: John Bolton, the U.S. ambassador to the U.N., not Josh Bolten. Josh Bolten...

DEAN: Oh, pardon me.

BLITZER: ... is the White House chief of staff. They are not related...

DEAN: That's true.

BLITZER: ... although their last name is the same. I want you, though, to hear what the president said this week about the Democrats also harping on this issue of national security.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

BUSH: There's a difference of opinion in Washington, if you listen closely to some of the leaders of the Democrat Party, it sounds like, it sounds like they think the best way to protect the American people is wait until we're attacked again. That's not the way it's going to be under my administration.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Is that the strategy of the Democratic party, wait to be attacked...

DEAN: Of course not. Of course not.

BLITZER: ... and then simply respond?

DEAN: That's George Bush having been basically incompetent in managing the budget, incompetent in managing natural disasters, incompetent in -- his party being incompetent in managing attacks on children -- or seductions of children in the Congress. And now incompetent in defending America.

They talk big at election time. They don't deliver. We want is the policy of Harry Truman, Franklin Roosevelt and Jack Kennedy: Be tough on defense, but be smart. Be able to tell the difference. And listen to -- between a situation where we can win and a situation we shouldn't get involved in, such as a civil war in Iraq.

Listen to our military, which nobody in the administration did other than Colin Powell, who was fired for his trouble. We can do better than this, and we will do better than what's been going on in the last six years, both in defending America, in having a real economy where 80 percent of the Americans benefit, not get hurt. And in responding to natural disasters the way Bill Clinton and James Lee Witt would have, had they been in power when Hurricane Katrina hit.

BLITZER: We're almost out of time, Governor. But I want you to respond to Senator John McCain, arguably the front-runner, at least one of the front-runners for the Republican presidential nomination in 2008. He really slammed the Democrats, the Clinton administration hard this past week on the issue of North Korea.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR JOHN MCCAIN, R-ARIZONA: We had a carrots and no sticks policy that only encouraged bad behavior. When one carrot didn't work, we offered another. Now we are facing the consequences of the failed Clinton administration policies.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: Is he the Republican you fear most in 2008?

DEAN: Not if he keeps talking like that. He's clearly pandering to the right-wing base in the Republican Party. The truth is, and Senator McCain knows this very well, is that not one nuclear weapon was added to the North Korea arsenal while Bill Clinton was president. Under this president, we believe the number of nuclear weapons have quadrupled, and they have now set off a test.

The truth is, you can't trust Republicans to defend America because of just exactly like statements of the kind Senator McCain just made. They're willing to say things for election purposes but not willing to stand up and do the hard work every single day of making the tough decisions where you have to defend America. The smart decisions, not getting involved in civil wars but standing up in places like Afghanistan and North Korea where it really matters.

BLITZER: Howard Dean is the chairman of the Democratic Party. Governor, thanks very much for coming in.

DEAN: Thanks so much for having me on, Wolf.

BLITZER: And up next, we'll cross the aisle to the Republican side and ask the chairman of the Republican Party, Ken Mehlman, whether his luck and hard work will pay off one more time.

And will a disgraced congressman in the congressional page scandal make a difference? I'll ask our political panel, Ron Brownstein, Candy Crowley and Stu Rothenberg. And at the end of the hour, our special "In Case You Missed It" segment takes a closer look at who said what on the other Sunday morning talk shows here in the United States.

For our North American viewers, coming up in the next hours, John Roberts takes a special "This Week at War" look at the election impact of the North Korean nuclear test. Much more "Late Edition" right after this.

BLITZER: Now, the final weeks of campaign 2006. Both national parties pushing hard to try to get control of the U.S. Congress. We just heard from the Democratic Party chairman, Howard

Dean. Let's get a different perspective now. The chairman of the Republican National Committee, Ken Mehlman, is joining us. Ken, welcome to "Late Edition."

KEN MEHLMAN, RNC CHAIRMAN: Thank you for having me. I appreciate the opportunity.

BLITZER: Let's talk a little bit about one reason why the Republicans are in deep trouble, as you well know, in the House and the Senate going into this election.

How have the GOP leaders handled the Mark Foley matter?

Seventeen percent of the American public, according to our CNN poll, say "appropriately." Seventy-five percent say "inappropriately."

The widespread assumption is that there is some sort of cover-up going on for Mark Foley.

How do you deal with that kind of issue, only a few weeks before the election?

MEHLMAN: Well, Wolf, I think you answer with the truth. The fact is the speaker and our leadership could not have been more aggressive. The moment they found out about this, they gave Mark Foley the political death penalty.

They said, get out of Congress or we're going to throw you out. They called in the FBI and the Department of Justice to investigate.

They tried to bring in Louis Freeh to make sure the program was appropriate in the future. I think when people find this out, they're going to appreciate it.

I traveled around the country this past week, to a number of competitive states. What people were talking about there was whether their tax cuts were going to stay in place or taxes were going to increase.

BLITZER: Let me interrupt for a second. Because there are Republican aides on the Hill who are now testifying, suggesting that it was at least years a ago and maybe even six years ago that Foley's behavior toward these young congressional pages was a problem.

MEHLMAN: Well, I think -- there's an investigation. I trust the Ethics Committee. I trust the Department of Justice. I trust the FBI to look into this. If people knew about it, they should be held accountable. Mr. Emmanuel was on another of the shows last week...

BLITZER: Congressman Rahm Emanuel.

MEHLMAN: Congressman Emanuel was asked about it. And he said, "I didn't see it." He didn't say whether he knew about it or not. Let's find out what everyone knew, what everyone saw. And let's make sure there is total accountability.

BLITZER: But if Republican leaders knew that there were inappropriate contacts, whether e-mail or whatever, between Mark Foley and these 16, 17-year-old boys, these individuals should go as well, I guess?

MEHLMAN: I think that we need to let the investigation go forward. I think anybody that knew, anybody that had information that that was going on, which is outrageous and unacceptable, needs to be held accountable.

BLITZER: Let me read this, from an editorial: "The Republicans were wrong. They really ought to have acted like Republicans from the first signs of questionable conduct. They should have pushed Foley out long ago. His district is so Republican, any Republican could win it. Instead, needlessly, the Republicans behaved too much like the other party, not the way their own base would have wanted them to act. They did not grasp the peril they were in."

That was not the New York Times. It was not The Washington Post. Do you know what publication wrote that?

MEHLMAN: The National Review.

BLITZER: The National Review, a very good conservative publication. They make a good point.

MEHLMAN: They make a very good point. I disagree with the premise, though, that Republicans knew about it. i can tell you, as the Republican chairman, this is a seat that we have unquestionably would have won.

I think we still have a chance to win it because it's a 54 percent Bush district.

But the fact is, it was in nobody's interest to, as soon as this information was out there, not to provide it. We need to get to the bottom of it. We need to let the investigation go forward.

And we need to remember that what this speaker did and what this Congress did was, the moment they found out about it, they gave the individual in question, who's responsible, the political death penalty. BLITZER: Maybe you can help explain this e-mail that, now, has surfaced, between Mark Foley, the former congressman, and the governor of Florida, Jeb Bush.

Before you became the party chairman, you worked for the Bush- Cheney campaign. You were, before that, the political director inside the White House, during the first term.

Let me read to you from this e-mail. "Have I done something to offend the White House... I am always getting the shaft... The came to Ft. Pierce a few weeks ago and said I was not allowed to attend, yet Joe Negron is there -- Joe Negron is the new Republican candidate for that district -- Tomorrow POTUS (President Bush) is in Martin County and I am told I am not allowed to be there, either. I can't quite figure out what I have done, but this is a continuing pattern of slights. I have constantly put the president in the best possible light on everything from Haiti to hurricanes. Sorry to trouble you and I wouldn't if this wasn't so frequent."

What was the problem?

Why was he getting a snub by the president and the White House before the election?

This is at the end of the September 2004.

MEHLMAN: I don't recall Mr. Foley getting the snub. I, at the time, was the campaign manager for the re-election campaign. I wasn't focused on those issues.

But I think it sounds like -- I don't know the specifics of it -- he was worried about it. My understanding is that Governor Bush replied back that there's nothing to worry about. So I'm not exactly sure. I can't explain it.

BLITZER: Was it, potentially, the fact that he was gay, even though he had never acknowledged it, that it was widely assumed by a lot of people that he was gay?

Was that a potential reason why he might have been snubbed?

MEHLMAN: Absolutely not. The fact is -- again, I don't know the specifics here -- a lot of congressmen sometimes think, because they're not at this event or if they are at this event, they might be snubbed.

I can assure he wasn't being snubbed, as far as I know. And I think the e-mail probably was inaccurate.

BLITZER: There's a story in the Los Angeles Times today that directly involves you. And I want to give you a chance to respond to it.

It suggests that an official at the State Department was fired, a man named Allen Stayman, who was involved in the tiny Pacific Island nations of the Northern Mariana Islands. He was fired because Jack Abramoff, the disgraced Republican lobbyist, now confessed felon, came to you and basically said, fire this guy; he's not allowing the policies in the Northern Mariana Islands that Abramoff and his clients wanted.

"Newly disclosed e-mails," the L.A. Times reports, "suggest that the ax feel after intervention by one of the highest officials at the White House: Ken Mehlman, on behalf of one of the most influential lobbyists in town, Jack Abramoff."

You were then the political director.

MEHLMAN: I was.

BLITZER: Is that true?

MEHLMAN: It is not true. And I'm not sure that those e-mails suggested that. First of all, I did not have the authority, as the political director, to fire anybody. It wasn't my decision.

As political director -- now second of all, I also don't recall the specifics of this matter involving Mr. Stayman. But as a matter of course, and certainly the first term, I had, frequently, people come to see me with political issues they wanted talked about.

BLITZER: Including Jack Abramoff?

MEHLMAN: Or personnel issues that they wanted talked about. And when they would come see me, what I would do...

BLITZER: Jack Abramoff, also?

MEHLMAN: Again, I don't recall that specific matter that he came to me for, but I had a way of dealing with all these matters, which is to let the policy-makers or the personnel deciders know exactly what people said. And they made the decisions.

What's interesting about this, though, Wolf, while I don't recall it specifically, I have seen some articles since then, since this came out. And what they suggest is that Mr. Stayman violated the Hatch Act, which is a federal law that prohibits employees of the government engaging in politics on their official clock.

And it also suggests he may have been working with the DNC on some things. So while I certainly didn't have the authority to fire anybody and I don't recall this specific matter, it does appear, from what other news reports indicate that there was apparently cause for Mr. Stayman to be removed.

BLITZER: Because, in the L.A. Times, it quotes an e-mail from one of Abramoff's associates, as saying, "Mehlman said he would get him fired.

MEHLMAN: Yes, Mehlman didn't have that authority. Mehlman wouldn't say he had that authority. And remember, you're dealing with individuals who, as we know, have pled guilty to defrauding their clients by saying they did things they weren't able to get done.

My job as a political director, and any job as a political director, is to hear from people, whether it's about personnel or about policy, and make sure that the policy-makers understand their concerns.

BLITZER: When you were the political director, did you work with, did you know David Kuo?

MEHLMAN: I did.

BLITZER: David Kuo has now written a book. He's going to be on CNN tomorrow, in our program, "The Situation Room." Among other things, it says this: "National Christian leaders received hugs and smiles in person and the were dismissed behind their backs and described as "ridiculous," "out of control," and just plain "goofy."

That's from his book, "Tempting Faith: An Inside Story of Political Seduction."

He was the deputy director of what was called the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives."

He says that the president, Karl Rove said one thing in public to try to get that religious conservative base on board, but behind their backs they were ridiculing them.

MEHLMAN: That's ridiculous. Anyone who knows the president and Karl Rove and others at the White House know that's ridiculous. Someone said to me, don't you think that the president is a conservative Christian and someone who has a strong philosophy, based on his faith and based on, also, his politics?

I've seen some of the stuff that was alleged in Mr. Kuo's book is just not true. You know, Wolf, the first place this president started his campaign was at a faith-based event in Indianapolis, Indiana.

And one of the reasons people like myself so strongly supported this president was because we loved his vision that said, we as conservatives, as compassionate conservatives can help people in need. But the best way to help them may not be bureaucracy but may be a church or a synagogue or a mosque or the Salvation Army.

This was essential and is essential to this president's philosophy and his agenda. It's something he's very proud of. And I can tell you, being part of his team, I'm very proud that we've worked hard and pushed that issue very strongly.

BLITZER: Here are some poll numbers, getting back to the election, only a little bit more than three weeks away.

Who does a better job on the economy?

According to our CNN poll, Democrats get 54 percent. Republicans get 35 percent.

Who does a better job on Iraq?

Democrats 51 percent, Republicans 34 percent.

And this, perhaps most worrisome for you as a good Republican: Who does a better job on terrorism? -- which should be, at least has been a very strong issue for Republicans: 45 percent for the Democrats; 40 percent for Republicans.

What's going to happen November 7, given those poll numbers?

MEHLMAN: I'm confident we're going to maintain our majorities in the House and the Senate. And here's why. What the American people are going to vote on -- they want the economy; wonder where the economy is. Democrat have said that they will raise taxes, across- the-board tax increases.

BLITZER: You've just heard the chairman of the Democratic party say "not on the middle class."

MEHLMAN: Well, that's what he says. But the guy that writes the tax laws, a guy named Charlie Rangel, the week they got out of town, said across-the-board tax increases.

Nancy Pelosi, who'd be speaker, has a record of being in favor of across-the-board tax increases.

The war on terror -- if American believe we're at war, think about what we saw this last week. North Korea tests a nuclear device, tests long-range missiles.

Republicans stand in favor of missile defense to protect us. Even after 9/11, most Democrats voted to cut missile defense, just like they voted against the Patriot Act, just like they voted against the interrogation effort, just like they voted against the surveillance program, and just like they want to set an artificial deadline, which people like James Baker and Senator Warner and others have acknowledged would surrender Iraq to terrorist enemies.

It's the wrong approach, and the American people aren't going to say in the face of war we need to be weaker, and in the face of economic challenge we need higher taxes and more regulations and more lawsuits. The Democrats have promised both.

BLITZER: All right. We're going to leave it right there because we're out of time.

MEHLMAN: Thanks a lot.

BLITZER: Ken Mehlman, you're going to be a busy guy...

MEHLMAN: I am.

BLITZER: ... the next three weeks. We'll talk early and often, as they say.

MEHLMAN: Looking forward to it. BLITZER: Thanks for coming in.

And when we come back, we're still on the political beat. I'll be speaking to Ron Brownstein, Candy Crowley, Stu Rothenberg for the inside story on these final weeks before the election here in the United States.

But up next, we'll get a quick check of what's in the news right now, including the latest on today's deadly violence in Iraq. And remember, another way to keep up with all the election news, sign up for the CNN political ticker. Go to cnn.com/ticker. Stay with "Late Edition." We'll be right back.

(NEWS BREAK)

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." Joining us now to discuss what they think the voters will be thinking November 7th, three expert political observers. Stu Rothenberg of The Rothenberg Political Report, Candy Crowley, our senior political correspondent, and Ron Brownstein of the Los Angeles Times. Guys, thanks very much for coming in.

Ron, let me start with you and just ask you this question. We have our most recent CNN poll asked likely voters their choice for Congress. Democrats get 58 percent to Republicans' 37 percent. That's a huge spread, but how significant is that generic, general number?

RON BROWNSTEIN, LOS ANGELES TIMES: Well, that's larger than most of the other polls, but clearly consistently now in October, we're seeing double-digit advantages for the Democrats on that generic question in polls across the board. And what that means, Wolf, is the playing field is broadening as we speak. Races that were not expected to be competitive are becoming competitive. Incumbent Republicans...

BLITZER: In other words, what you're saying is Republican races...

BROWNSTEIN: Republican incumbents.

BLITZER: Republican incumbents...

BROWNSTEIN: Who did not think they were going to be having a nervous and difficult October, suddenly find themselves in races.

I was searching around the Internet this morning looking at papers in different states. Colorado, Ohio, the same story. Safe Republican district suddenly under siege. The president is under 40. Sixty percent of the country thinks we're on the wrong track. You have a double-digit generic advantage. And what happens? What happens is that Democrats are able to expand the battlefield, and the question is whether they can bring some of those races home in difficult terrain. BLITZER: Is this 1994, shaping up to be 1994 in reverse, 1994 when the Republicans all of sudden became the majority and a lot of Democrat incumbents didn't even think they had a problem? They wound up after that election losers.

STU ROTHENBERG, POLITICAL ANALYST: In a word, yes. The problem from the handicappers' point of view is we know the playing field is getting bigger. The Republican risk is bigger. The question is, how big?

So there is no doubt that this is going to be a terrific, Democratic year. They're going to make major gains in the House and the Senate. We still don't know exactly how high. But there are races that, six months ago, three months ago, I would have laughed off as not competitive, that could indeed bow down to the wire.

BROWNSTEIN: Can I just point out one difference -- two differences from '94? One difference is that Republicans, by and large, although there are some who are clearly being surprised now, by and large have been more aware of this problem than Democrats were and have gone out earlier to try to insulate themselves.

But the bigger difference is the terrain. And that's the real challenge for the Democrats. If you look back at '94, Republicans picked up 52 seats. About three-fifths of them were districts that had voted presidentially Republican only two years earlier. This year, both in the Senate and in the House, Democrats have to win districts that have been voting Republican. And that is still the challenge. In the end, can they bring those voters over the line?

CANDY CROWLEY, CNN CORRESPONDENT: Then there's redistricting between the Gingrich revolution and now, where Republican territory has been made more Republican and Democratic territory more Democratic. And also...

BLITZER: So there are less seats theoretically at play?

CROWLEY: Well, no, I don't want to argue against that there are a lot of seats in play.

BLITZER: No, since 1994.

CROWLEY: Yes. And I think you have to look at the candidates, because in '94 what we had was a number of freshmen candidates who weren't that well-known in their districts who got booted out. We're looking at old bulls here who have, you know, been to the rodeo a couple of times.

ROTHENBERG: All right. Well, let me just respond then. Two things, two other things in particular. First of all, this president's job approval, this president's numbers, they're worse than Bill Clinton's, much worse. President Clinton's...

BLITZER: In '94.

ROTHENBERG: ... ranged between 44 percent and 48 percent right before that disastrous midterm election. Second, this is a six-year election into the presidency. There have been two years of bad news. I think the environment is actually as bad -- I'll bet you it is, I think it's worse for the Republicans now than it was in '94.

BROWNSTEIN: You know, I agree. I agree the environment is worse. The structure is more stable than it was. And that really is the challenge.

BLITZER: Because of the gerrymandering.

BROWNSTEIN: Because of the gerrymandering, and also because we're seeing a growing parallel between the way people vote for president and the way they vote for the House and the Senate. Republicans under Bush have been winning Senate and House seats in the places where he's popular and losing them in the places where he's unpopular. And what Democrats have to do this year, especially in the Senate, is reverse that trend. To take back the Senate, Wolf, they have to win places like Missouri, Ohio, Montana, Virginia, Tennessee, that voted for Bush both times and where Democrats have had a hard time winning.

BLITZER: I want to get to the Senate in a moment, but let's talk about the House a little bit more. And just to remind other viewers what's going on, there are 231 Republican incumbents, 201 Democrats right now. One independent, three vacancies. The Republicans need 15 seats to become -- the Democrats, that is, need 15 seats to become the majority. We've estimated at least a week or so that there are about 25 seats at play, all of them Republican-held right now. You believe that there are more.

BROWNSTEIN: Probably today. I think there are more. I mean, I'll defer to Stu as the person who watches this more closely than almost anyone, but yes, I mean, as you go around the country, Republicans are worrying about and Democrats are seeing opportunity in place that were not on the map earlier in the year.

BLITZER: How many seats are in play right now? How many seats are Republicans really, really nervous about?

ROTHENBERG: Well, we're watching between 50 and 60 Republican- held seats right now. If you want to give me an exact number, we have it at 52 they're watching. There are a handful more that I think are, I've got to keep an eye on.

But, no, it's the second- and even third-tier districts, Wolf, that are coming into play now that we are seeing polls that show Republicans have reason for concern. Doesn't mean the Republicans are going to lose all those districts, but it means that those seats are certainly in play.

BLITZER: One moderate Republican, Chris Shays in Connecticut, he's fighting for his life right now against the Democratic challenger, Diane Farrell, Connecticut 4th District. Chris Shays said this this week, told the Hartford Courant, "I know the speaker didn't go over a bridge and leave a young person in the water, and then have a press conference the next day. Dennis Hastert didn't kill anybody." Those were strong words in reacting to the congressional page scandal, reviving the whole Ted Kennedy Chappaquiddick affair back in the '60s. This is not typical of Chris Shays, who's been a very moderate Republican.

CROWLEY: But you're seeing a guy up against the wall here. I mean, you know what happens when somebody is in a tough, tough fight. I mean, it's not first time he's said something, you think, whoa. I mean, he also talked about Abu Ghraib this week and said, well, it was really a sex ring. I mean...

BLITZER: It wasn't torture, it was sex.

CROWLEY: ... it wasn't torture, it was about a sex ring of National Guard. So there's a lot of things coming out of there that tell you this is a guy in real trouble.

BLITZER: But very quickly because I want to take a break, that's not going to help him with his constituents in Connecticut.

BROWNSTEIN: It's a Democratic-leaning district. His current ad on television starts, I'm not a partisan politician. He was way off message. He was a truck running right into his message.

BLITZER: Is he in trouble in Connecticut? Who's going to win that race?

ROTHENBERG: Oh, of course. I mean, we have this race as toss- up, tilting, actually, to Chris Shays. One thing that that comment showed is this is a much more combative, confrontational Chris Shays. In the past, he used to allow himself to be a punching bag. He'd be attacked and he wouldn't respond. He's running a pretty good campaign. This wasn't the best message of the entire cycle.

I think he's got a fighting chance, but look, he is in a competitive race, and he knows it.

BLITZER: And Connecticut is a blue state to begin with.

All right, guys, stand by. We're going to talk about the Senate. Our political panel is going to be with us. We'll get much more on the election countdown in just a moment. Stay with us. We'll be right back.

BLITZER: Welcome back to "Late Edition." I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington. As we tick off the days to election day, we're continuing our conversation with our special "Late Edition" political panel: Stu Rothenberg, Candy Crowley and Ron Brownstein.

Candy, the Mark Foley impact on these elections this year, I've heard various estimates. It's going to be huge, it's not going to be huge. The speaker, Dennis Hastert, clearly is concerned. I want you to listen to what he said this week. We don't have it, but he said, basically, in 20/20 hindsight, we would probably do everything better, but if there was a problem, if there was a coverup, then we should find that out through the investigation process. What is going on? The political impact from the congressional page scandal on these elections, especially in the House.

CROWLEY: Clearly, it puts something more toxic into the groundwater. So, yes, there is an effect. Certainly if we believe the polls, there's been an effect nationwide. It obviously affects some races more than others. Reynolds in New York. It obviously affects Foley's district.

So there are some specific districts that really are hurt by it, but I think it adds that whole -- this not a Foley issue, this a leadership issue. And it just fits right, dovetails so nicely with what the Democrats are out there saying.

BLITZER: All right. Let's talk about the Senate. Ron, let me pick your brain a little bit. A lot of people assume, maybe correctly, maybe incorrectly, that the Democrats are going to be the majority in the House of Representatives.

Let's see what the challenges are for the Democrats in the Senate. Fifty-five Republicans right now, 44 Democrats, one independent who almost always votes with the Democrats. That means the Democrats need to capture six seats in order to have a 51-49 majority. If its 50-50, the vice president of the United States, who's the president of the Senate, he breaks the ties, and then the Republican is the majority. Eight seats in great danger right now. Seven of them Republicans-held, one Democratic-held. What's your assessment right now?

BROWNSTEIN: Well, look, as I said, the basic trend under George Bush is Republicans have been winning Senate seats in the states that vote Republican for president, and then losing them in the states that vote Democratic for president. That's generally been a good trade for Republicans, because there are 29 states that voted Republicans in the last two elections for him, and only 18 that voted for Kerry and Gore.

Democrats have two targets in those 18 blue states: Lincoln Chafee in Rhode Island and Rick Santorum in Pennsylvania. Even if they beat both of them, Wolf, to win back a majority, they have to reverse the trend and win Senate seats in the red states. So what have you got? Montana, they've got a very strong chance. Ohio, they've got a very strong chance. And then it really comes down to them for three border states that are tough states for Democrats, especially in rural areas: Missouri, Virginia and Tennessee.

Assuming they can hold New Jersey, which is the one Democratic- held seat that's in play.

If they can win two out of three in Virginia, Tennessee and Missouri, hold New Jersey and win those other four, they get the majority. But the challenge is getting socially conservative voters, especially in rural areas, enough of them to vote Democratic. I saw today in that Washington Post poll that had Jim Webb crushing George Allen in the northern Virginia suburbs but losing in the rest of the state badly enough to give Allen a lead. That's what they have to get over the hump.

BLITZER: So it comes down to the Republicans have been exceedingly well in 2000, 2002, 2004. And we'll see what happens in 2006. Get the turnout, get that base excited and get them to the polls.

ROTHENBERG: Turnout is a huge unknown. It's a huge question mark. You ask political analysts, journalists, reporters about turnout. We go on and on about how important it. We have, actually, we really have no idea how to measure it, how to project it. All we can say, Wolf, is that you talk to Republican strategists and operatives, they see it as a hope but also a danger. They're very concerned about Republican enthusiasm or lack thereof, and a whole number of races could turn on turnout.

BLITZER: Who's more excited, the Democratic base or the Republican base?

CROWLEY: Well, the Democratic base is angry. And the Republican base is at best sort of noncommittal at this point. And if you had your choice between a superior turnout machine, which the Republicans have, and anger, which the Democrats have, I'd take anger any day.

BROWNSTEIN: The Republicans have a great turnout engine, but the engine needs fuel, and the fuel in '02 and '04 was passionate support for President Bush. Right now, the passion is on the other side. If you look at the national polling, twice as many Americans say they strongly disapprove of his performance as strongly approve.

There was a poll put out this week by veteran Democratic pollster Stan Greenberg and James Carville. And they found even in four dozen Republican-held districts that there was twice as much strong disapproval as approval. So the challenge for Republicans is, can they make this machine go without what has powered it in the past, which is a strong attachment and support for the president?

BLITZER: And I'll just put these numbers up to wrap this up, Stu. In terms of the president's job approval numbers in our so- called poll of poll, CNN had him at 39, USA Today/Gallup 37, ABC at 39, CBS/New York Times 34. The average 37 percent. Not a good number to go into this election.

ROTHENBERG: A disastrous number. Now this election still, in spite of the Mark Foley discussion and questions about weapons of mass destruction, it's about George W. Bush. His overall performance, particularly in Iraq, but overall.

BLITZER: We've got to leave it right there, guys. Thanks very much. A great discussion as usual.

Up next, in case you missed it, we'll bring you the best of the other Sunday morning talk show sounds. Stay with us.

BLITZER: Up next, in case you missed it, "Late Edition" Sunday morning talk show roundup. And coming up at the top of the hour, "This Week at War." Stay with us.

BLITZER: In case you missed it, let's check the highlights from the other Sunday morning talk shows.

The main topic on CBS and Fox was the United States response to North Korea's nuclear tests.

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

CONDOLEEZZA RICE, U.S. SECRETARY OF STATE: They're going to have to get accustomed to the fact that this is not a problem with the United States. This is a problem with the world. That is why it is so important not to allow this to become a bilateral negotiation, because the north would like nothing better than to simply deal with the United States so that we are the ones that isolate it.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

(BEGIN VIDEO CLIP)

U.S. SENATOR JOHN KERRY, (D-MA) They've pulled out of the Non- Proliferation Treaty. We no longer have cameras in the reactor. We no longer have inspectors in the reactor. We no longer know where the fuel rods are. We know that they have now tested. The United States of America's less safe. And the six-party talks have been a cover.

(END VIDEO CLIP)

BLITZER: That's your "Late Edition" for this Sunday, October 15th. I'm Wolf Blitzer in Washington. For our North American viewers, "This Week at War" just ahead, right after a quick check of what's in the news right now.

MEMORANDUM FOR THE ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE DEPUTY ATTORNEY GENERAL

THROUGH: THE ASSOCIATE ATTORNEY GENERAL

FROM: Sue Ellen Wooldridge
Assistant Attorney General
Environment and Natural Resources Division

NEXT WEEK

Nothing to report.

THIS WEEK

- Council on Environmental Quality Meeting on Northwest Forest Plan

On Wednesday, October 18, 2006, the Division will participate in a meeting that the Council on Environmental Quality is hosting to discuss legal and policy options for improving the Northwest Forest Plan.

LAST WEEK

- Favorable Decision in Northern Alaska Environmental Ctr. v. Kempthorne (9th Cir.)

On October 12, 2006, the Ninth Circuit denied a petition for rehearing of a favorable decision issued on July 26, 2006. This is an action by environmental groups against the Bureau of Land Management and the Fish and Wildlife Service, challenging a plan for oil and gas leasing in the northwest part of the National Petroleum Reserve-Alaska for alleged violation of the National Environmental Policy Act and the Endangered Species Act. This result contrasts with the decision last month in National Audubon Society v. Norton (D. Alaska), in which the district court issued a decision for plaintiff environmental groups, vacating an amendment to the oil and gas leasing plan for the northeast part of the National Petroleum Reserve-Alaska under the National Environmental Policy Act and the Endangered Species Act.

- Adverse Decision in Ilioulaokalani Coalition v. Rumsfeld (9th Cir.)

On October 5, 2006, the Ninth Circuit held that the Army's environmental analysis under the National Environmental Policy Act for its 2004 decision to upgrade the 2nd Brigade, 25th Infantry Division, to a "Stryker Brigade Combat Team" was inadequate. The Army's upgrade of the 2nd Brigade was part of a larger effort by the Army to transform its fighting units from a "Cold War" military to a more responsive, modern military. The upgrade would involve additional land acquisition, construction of additional training facilities, and upgrading the types of military equipment. Despite the fact that this brigade has long been stationed in Hawaii, the Ninth Circuit held that the Army's NEPA analysis was inadequate because it did not evaluate an alternative of moving the 2nd Brigade to a different location for its training. The court ordered a remand for the Army to complete the additional analysis, but did not address whether any activities should be halted in the interim. The 2nd Brigade is scheduled to be deployed to Iraq and Afghanistan in the near future.

TUESDAY'S EXPECTED NEWS STORIES:

Attorney General Delivers Remarks before International Association of Chiefs of Police (OPA)
Today, the Attorney General announced the Initiative for Safer Communities, an effort to combat violent crime, before the annual conference of the International Association of Chiefs of Police in Boston.

Talking Points

- The Department of Justice is committed to making sure that every American city and town can share in the success of low violent crime rates.

- The Initiative for Safer Communities will help us find and use the tools that work most effectively to fight violent crime and keep our communities safe.

Media Reports FBI Search of Congressman Weldon's Daughter's Home (OPA)
Today, the media reported the FBI raided the homes of Congressman Curt Weldon's daughter and her business partner as it investigates whether Weldon improperly helped the pair win lobbying and consulting contracts. The Department is not commenting.

Department Of Justice Announces Funding To Public Safety Officers for Bulletproof Vests (Office of Justice Programs)
Today, the Department of Justice announced nearly $29 million in funding to over 4,500 law enforcement agencies across the nation for the purchase of bulletproof vests through the Department of Justice's Bulletproof Vest Partnership Program. The grant awards are expected to fund the purchase of over 213,000 vests for public safety officers nationwide.

Talking Points

- Law enforcement is a difficult and dangerous profession. The safety and well-being of our public safety officers is fundamental to effectively administering justice in the communities they serve.

- Providing this support to state and local agencies is essential to protecting those who are charged with confronting some of our country's most violent criminals.

Attorney General Issues Report to The President Regarding the Administration of the Freedom of Information Act (Office of Information and Privacy)
Today, Attorney General Alberto R. Gonzales submitted to President Bush the Department's report regarding the government-wide administration of the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA). Today's report is the result of the first of three Justice Department reviews required under Executive Order 13392 titled, "Improving Agency Disclosure of Information." The executive order, signed by the President on Dec.14, 2005, directs agencies to ensure citizen-centered and results-oriented agency FOIA operations. The order directed federal agencies to develop and implement plans in order to improve the performance of their FOIA programs. The order also established, for the first time ever, a Chief FOIA Officer for every agency, FOIA requester service centers and FOIA public liaisons.

Lynne Stewart Sentenced to 28 Months in Prison (USAO–Southern District of New York)
Today, Attorney Lynne Stewart was sentenced to 28 months in prison by U.S. District Judge John Koeltl for helping an extremist Egyptian cleric pass messages from prison urging his followers on the outside to launch terrorist attacks. Stewart was charged with aiding a terror organization, the Islamic Group, wage a murder and kidnapping conspiracy by smuggling messages from her former client, the blind sheik, Omar Abdel Rahman. Michael Garcia, U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of New York, announced he is exploring appellate options.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Stewart Sentenced To 28 Months In Prison, Much Less Than Prosecutors Wanted. USA Today/AP (10/17, Neumeister) reports, "A firebrand civil rights lawyer who has defended Black Panthers and anti-war radicals was sentenced Monday to nearly 2 1/2 years in prison -- far less than the 30 years prosecutors wanted -- for helping an imprisoned terrorist sheik communicate with his followers on the outside." Lynne Stewart "smiled, cried and hugged supporters after US District Judge John G. Koeltl pronounced the sentence of 28 months." The judge "said Stewart was guilty of smuggling messages between her client and his followers that could have 'potentially lethal consequences.' He called the crimes 'extraordinarily severe criminal conduct.'" But "in departing from federal guidelines that called for 30 years behind bars, he cited Stewart's more than three decades of dedication to poor, disadvantaged and unpopular clients."

Newsday (10/17, DeStefano) notes that Koetl "cited her years of advocacy for the poor and down-trodden as a reason for a more lenient term behind bars. 'Ms. Stewart performed a public service, not only to her clients but to the nation,' said Koeltl, who refused a prosecution request to sentence Stewart, who is battling breast cancer, to a 30-year term." The New York Post (10/17, Cornell, 608K) adds, "A grinning, gloating Lynne Stewart declared 'victory' yesterday after" the sentencing.

The Washington Post (10/17, A3, Powell, 748K) reports, "Koeltl's decision to mete out a comparatively mild sentence amounted to a slap at federal prosecutors in a case that former attorney general John D. Ashcroft repeatedly had hailed as a nationwide model." US Attorney Michael Garcia "released a statement expressing disappointment and held out the possibility of appealing the sentence. It is not unusual for a federal appeals court to reverse a sentence handed out by a lower court." The Post adds, "More than a few legal observers divined a message in the judge's sentences. 'There's no doubt the government has tried to use this case to chill effective advocacy in terror cases,' said Neal R. Sonnett, a former federal prosecutor, past chair of the American Bar Association's criminal justice section and current chair of the association's task force on the treatment of enemy combatants. 'I'm delighted the judge was not swayed by the frenzy over terrorism.'"

The New York Times (10/17, Preston, 1.21M) reports, "Michael J. Garcia, the United States attorney in Manhattan, attended the sentencing yesterday. He and his prosecutors left the courtroom without comment. 'The government is disappointed in the sentences imposed today,' Mr. Garcia said in a statement later. 'We will be exploring our appellate options.'" The Los Angeles Times (10/17, Barry, 918K) runs a similar report.

AFP (10/17) reports, "Ever since she was charged, Stewart has insisted she was being unfairly targeted for her unorthodox choice of clients over a 30-year career that has seen her represent mobsters and political radicals. … US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said at the time the verdict was an 'important step' in the Department of Justice's 'war on terror'."

The New York Law Journal (10/17, Hamblett) reports, "The sentences came 4 1/2 years after Attorney General John Ashcroft announced the indictment of Stewart, Sattar and interpreter Mohamed Yousry in a plot to pass messages to and from the Egyptian-based Islamic Group to imprisoned Sheik Omar Abdel-Rahman. Yousry was sentenced Monday to 20 months in prison. … Sheik Abdel-Rahman, considered the spiritual leader of Islamic Group, was serving a life sentence for a terror plot against the United States. He had been placed under Special Administrative Measures (SAMs) by the Bureau of Prisons to prevent him from communicating with his followers in the group." The Journal adds, "Stewart was convicted of defrauding the government by signing attorney affirmations promising to abide by the SAMs and of providing material support along with Yousry by helping the sheik send and receive messages in prison. … Her most 'potentially lethal' action, Judge Koeltl said, was in June 2000, when she read a press release to a reporter indicating that the sheik was withdrawing his support for a 'cease-fire' or cessation of attacks against the Egyptian government."

WSJournal Criticizes Stewart's Sentence. In an editorial on Stewart's sentencing, the Wall Street Journal (10/17, A14, 2.03M) says, "In an age when courts routinely impose five-year prison terms for drug offenders, and life sentences on former CEOs, 28 months may not seem an appropriate sentence for a terrorist accomplice." Stewart "certainly had the sympathy of" US District Judge John Koeltl.

DOJ_NMG_0081973

While "a case could be made for leniency" given Stewart's age and her breast cancer recovery, "remorse is also a prerequisite for mercy, and Ms. Stewart shows none, either for her crime or for the arc of a career which flows too naturally from championing the 'liberation' movements of the 1960s to the Islamists of the present day. What her clients have in common is that they loathe America." The Journal concludes, "Now she basks in the pity and praise of her fellow radical travelers, who haven't seemed to spare much thought for the victims of" Al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya's 1997 Luxor bombing. "It says everything about her, and about them."

The New York Daily News (10/17, 729K) also laments the sentence, under the headline "Judge Goes Soft On Terror Lawyer."

Jury Seated For Salah Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (10/17) reports, "A jury was chosen Monday for the federal trial of two men accused of supplying money and recruits to the Palestinian terrorist organization Hamas. Opening statements were set for 9:30 a.m. Thursday at the trial of suburban Chicago grocer Muhammad Salah, 53, and former university professor Abdelhaleem Ashqar, 48, of Alexandria, Va. U.S." The AP notes, US District Judge Amy J. St. Eve "overruled objections from federal prosecutors that defense attorneys had acted to keep whites from serving on the jury." St. Eve "held that in each case there was a non-racial explanation."

Allies Blocking Return Of Gitmo Detainees. The Washington Post (10/17, A1, Whitlock, 748K) reports in a front page article that Britain and "other European governments, which have been equally vocal in assailing Guantanamo as a human rights liability, have ... balked at accepting prisoner transfers." The US faces a conundrum: "But those whom the Pentagon wants to free often have nowhere to go. In many cases, their native countries don't want them or have challenged their nationalities. Also slowing the process is a U.S. policy stipulating that prisoners cannot be transferred to nations with a record of human rights violations unless there are written assurances that they won't be mistreated."

Skelton, Hoyer Defend Democrats' Position On Detainee Bill. In a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (10/17, 2.03M), Rep. Ike Skelton (D-MO) and Steny Hoyer (D-MD) write, "Your assertion ('Democrats on al Qaeda,' Review & Outlook, Oct. 2) that Democrats will not be tough on terrorism because many of us opposed the Republicans' Military Commissions Act is offensive and untrue. ... Our national security interests are best served when we interrogate and try terrorist suspects in a manner that comports with our American values; produces convictions that will withstand appeals; and honors our international commitments, thereby protecting our troops who fall into enemy hands."

Legal Challenges Expected. The Christian Science Monitor (10/17, Richey, 58K) reports, "The new law rejects at least five key holdings by the liberal wing of the court and sets the stage for what many analysts believe will be yet another historic showdown between the courts, the president, and Congress. ... The sharp divide at the Supreme Court is driven by a fundamental disagreement over the proper level of judicial oversight of the war on terror."

Military Commissions Act Comes Under Fire. Stephen Rickard, director of the Washington office of the Open Society Institute, writes in the Washington Post (10/17, A21, 748K) that President Bush today will sign the Military Commissions Act, "while claiming 'clear' authorization from Congress for 'enhanced' CIA interrogations. Many critics claim the bill authorizes torture. Fortunately, both sides are wrong. … The bill's language on torture is far from perfect, and it has many other objectionable provisions. It should have been rejected. But on its face it criminalizes cruel treatment. An interrogator can go to prison if a court finds that the techniques used caused 'serious' mental or physical 'suffering,' which need not be 'prolonged.'" Rickard adds, "The administration is trying to convince CIA officers that they won't be indicted -- or at least convicted. But the CIA demanded clarity, not more ambiguity and 'plausible deniability.' At the end of the day all the president can honestly tell CIA interrogators is this: 'The law has some loose language. We'll give you another memo. Don't worry.' Sure."

Kristof Denounces Detention Of Al Jazeera Cameraman. In his New York Times (10/17, 1.21M) column, Nicholas Kristof writes, "There is no public evidence that Sami al-Hajj committed any crime other than journalism for a television network the Bush administration doesn't like. But the U.S. has been holding Mr. Hajj, a cameraman for Al Jazeera, for nearly five years without trial, mostly at Guantánamo Bay. ... Mr. Hajj is the only journalist known to be there, and, of course, it's possible that he is guilty of terrorist-related crimes. If so, he should be tried, convicted and sentenced. But so far, the evidence turned up by his lawyers and by the Committee to Protect Journalists — which published an excellent report on Mr. Hajj's case this month — suggests that the U.S. military may be keeping him in hopes of forcing him to become a spy."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

DOD To Require Anthrax Shots For Troops, Contractors. The Washington Post (10/17, Lee, 748K) reports, "The Defense Department will resume mandatory anthrax vaccinations for more than 200,000 troops and defense contractors within 60 days, a Pentagon official said yesterday, rejecting the concerns of some veterans and service members who say that the vaccine has not been proved safe or effective. The vaccinations will be required for most military units and civilian contractors assigned to homeland bioterrorism defense or deployed in Iraq, Afghanistan or South Korea, said William Winkenwerder Jr., a physician and the assistant secretary of defense for health affairs." After a lawsuit by service members, the FDA "granted the vaccine final approval last December, clearing a legal path for the Pentagon to resume the controversial program."

Luck Seen As Primary Factor In Low Death Toll From 2001 Anthrax Attack. Roll Call (10/17, Kane) reports that the "ex-staffers and health experts who dealt with the medical issues involved in the immediate aftermath of the anthrax attacks largely attribute the fact that those exposed to the deadly biological agent avoided long-term health problems to a single factor: luck." Roll Call adds that "a series of actions taken along the way — some well-thought-out, others largely accidental — combined to allow for a relatively happy ending rather than a deadly outcome. … 'The luckiest thing was we saw the powder, unlike the postal workers. That's the critical difference between our people living through it and those two postal workers not living through it,' said Laura Petrou," then chief of staff to former Majority Leader Tom Daschle.

TWIC Expected To Expose US Ports' Reliance On Undocumented Workers. The Wall Street Journal (10/17, A1, Jordan, 2.03M) reports in a front page article that the Transportation Worker Identification Credential program, which will require workers with unescorted access to secure US port areas to prove that they are legal residents and pass a background check, "is expected to leave thousands of undocumented drivers without jobs in ports across the country. That would undermine the flow of goods to US consumers, highlighting the crucial role immigrants…play in the nation's economy." Darrin Kayser, manager of strategic initiatives for the Transportation Security Administration says the agency is aware of the ID program's potential impact on port work forces and "will continue to work with industry, port authorities and workers to address" the issue. Meanwhile, "Immigrant advocates and port experts say truck drivers rank far down the list of potential security threats."

Critics Blast Ashcroft Over Criticism Of 9/11 Panel. The AP (10/17) reports, "Former U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft has been blasted by fellow Republicans for his new book criticizing the 9/11 Commission's investigation of the 2001 terrorist attacks." The AP continues, "Republicans who served on the commission told the St. Louis Post-Dispatch that Ashcroft's behavior as a witness and as an author is 'underhanded' and 'outrageous.'" The AP adds, "In his book, 'Never Again,' Ashcroft accuses the commission of 'assessing blame and grandstanding' instead of finding the truth and protecting Americans. … He alleges that the hearings 'disintegrated into show trials' and that the Republican-chaired panel was 'dangerously out of control' and 'obsessed' with blaming President Bush for not preventing the terrorist attacks while 'absolving' President Clinton's administration. … Ashcroft's spokeswoman said he stands by the accounts in his book." The AP notes, "Former Sen. Slade Gorton, R-Wash., said Ashcroft was the least interested in helping the panel get at the facts of what had happened before Sept. 11, 2001, so another terrorist attack could be averted. … 'John was the least cooperative of all the witnesses we had,' Gorton said. 'He was the only one who refused to submit his written testimony in advance, he probably came with the largest entourage of any of the people we talked to, and he engaged in a disingenuous and partisan attack' on the committee. … Former Illinois Gov. James Thompson said Ashcroft's behavior as a witness was so bad that Bush privately apologized to commission members."

Louisiana Man Says FEMA Trailer "Did Its Job" Sheltering Him From Tornado. The New York Times (10/17, 1.21M) relates the story of Jack Melancon, who, after losing "his shrimp nets and his roof to Hurricane Katrina last year and the rest of his house to flooding from Hurricane Rita," faced "the groan of a tornado advancing on his government-issued trailer" in Leeville, Louisiana Monday. The tornado "hurled debris against Mr. Melancon's trailer, provided by the Federal Emergency Management Agency. Short-lived banshee winds strained to pull the trailer from the soggy earth, but metal straps held it firm. … 'It rocked and it rolled and it shook and it blew,' Mr. Melancon said. 'The trailer did its job. I would recommend one of these to anybody.'"

WAR NEWS:

Bush Assures Maliki He Has Full US Support. CNN's The Situation Room (10/16, McIntyre) reported, "The White House says President Bush called Iraq's prime minister, Nouri Al-Maliki, who was troubled by rumors the US might be losing patience with him and could impose a time line for bringing the violence under control. … The White House says President Bush reassured Nouri Al-Maliki that he enjoys the full support of the United States government and that there are no timeliness for the withdrawal of US troops. In return, Al-Maliki is said to have reassured President Bush that he is opposed to the idea of partition. Rumors about that, he said, were also undermining confidence in the government." Fox News' Special Report (10/16, Huntsman) reported, "White House officials say the President initiated the call after reports that Maliki was concerned about US support for him."

CBS Evening News (10/16, story 4, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) mentioned Bush's call to Maliki, "to assure him there is no timetable for pulling out," as part of a short report on violence in Iraq, while NBC Nightly News (10/16, story 2, 3:10, Gregory, 9.87M) showed Tony Snow, the White House Press Secretary, saying about Iraq, "The violence level's absolutely unacceptable." NBC added, "But during his phone call with Maliki today, the President denied there was any deadline for the Iraqi government." Snow: "The President said, the rumors are not true, we support you." Despite "such assurances, even some top Republicans want change. Senator John Warner has said the Administration should wait no longer than two to three months to change direction. Today Nebraska Republican Senator Chuck Hagel insisted during an interview with Tom Brokaw, Americans will not continue to commit US troops to a civil war." Hagel: "I don't want the outcome of Iraq to be a repeat of the outcome of Vietnam and if we're not careful, that is exactly where this is going to go."

The Washington Times (10/17, Curl, 88K) quotes Snow saying that al-Maliki "said that rumors sometimes can undercut confidence in the government and also its ability to work effectively in fighting terror." The White House "did not know where Mr. al-Maliki picked up the rumors, but the prime minister may have been referring to comments by Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner, Virginia Republican."

USA Today (10/17, 2.27M) reports Snow also "challenged a story published Monday by USA TODAY that said al-Maliki will not force militias to disarm immediately. 'There is no mention…that he's not going to force militias to disarm until later this year or early next year. As a matter of fact, he says he's in the process of doing it now.'" USA Today adds, "A transcript of the interview showed Al-Maliki had told USA TODAY, 'The initial date we've set for disbanding the militias is the end of this year or the beginning of next year.' He also said a government committee was formed Oct. 8 'to work on disbanding militias and give them a deadline by which they have to lay down their arms.'"

The AP (10/17, Flaherty) reports Bush "told Nouri al-Maliki that rumors of a withdrawal of troops in two months were untrue," while the New York Times (10/17, Stolberg, 1.21M) says the story "reflects the delicate line the White House is walking as it tries to shore up the Maliki government while reassuring an increasingly skittish American public that it remains flexible in its approach to the war."

Bush Rejects Dividing Iraq Into Three Autonomous Regions. Last night, Bush was asked on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/16) about the possibility of dividing Iraq into three regions; a Kurdish autonomous region, a Sunni autonomous region and a Shia autonomous region, and paying them oil revenues to stop killing each other. Bush said, "I don't think that's the right way to go. I think that will increase sectarian violence. I think that will make it more dangerous -- and so does Prime Minister Maliki with whom I spoke today. I had an interesting conversation with him. I said we expect you to make tough political decisions to move forward. And he assured me he would continue to make tough political decisions necessary to move forward. One of those tough decisions is what do you do with the oil revenues. I happen to believe the oil belongs to the people and to the extent that they understand that it will help unify the country. Prime Minister Maliki also debunked this notion that he's not going to go after the criminal elements and or militias that are killing innocent people. He knows he has got to provide the security necessary for this country to move forward."

Bush Concerned About Iranian Involvement In Iraq Insurgency. Also on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/16), the President was asked if US forces in Iraq are now fighting an insurgency fueled by Iran. Bush said, "I think the enemy is more complex than that. We are concerned about some Iranian involvement. Particularly in the delivery of certain kind of weapons. But the violence that the American people see on their screens is some sectarianism, some criminal activity and al Qaeda. And we're dealing with all three. And the strategy in Iraq - or the tactics in Iraq is changing constantly. So obviously, if we see more Iranian involvement, we'll adjust our tactics to meet that threat."

CNN Poll Finds 64% Of Americans Oppose Iraq War. CNN's The Situation Room (10/16, Blitzer) reported that the latest CNN poll "shows only a third of Americans now favor the US war in Iraq. Sixty-four percent oppose the war. That's the highest number of opposition in that CNN polling so far, since the war started three and-a-half years ago." The President was asked on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/16) about the polling data. Bush said the American people "want us to win. They believe -- they are wondering whether or not we have the plans in place to win. They want to know whether or not we have the flexibility on the ground to constantly meet the enemy. And I can understand why there's frustration, because the enemy knows that killing innocent people will create a sense of frustration and they know that they know America. They know we are a conscience-driven people that value life. And the more people they destroy and the more innocent lives that are destroyed, the more likely it is we will retreat in their way of thinking. This is what Osama bin Laden and Zawahiri had plainly stated, that it is just a matter of time that America loses her nerve and leaves."

Bush Says Extremists Could Gain Control Of Middle East Within Decades. Bush was asked on Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor (10/16) about the "anti-Bush press" which says he has no strategy in Iraq and he refuses to listen to dissent. Bush said, "I'm disappointed that people would propagandize to that effect because the stakes are too high for that kind of illogical behavior. We have got a plan - first of all a stated goal. And I have said to our commanders on the ground, you achieve that goal and we'll give you the tools necessary to do it." Bush added, "Here's the stakes, as far as I'm concerned. It is conceivable that within decades, the Middle East will be a place where moderate governments have been toppled, extremists and radicals will have gained control of oil resources and then will use to create a blackmail situation against the West and Iran will have a nuclear weapon, to complicate the mix. And 20 or 30 years from now if that is the case, people will say what happened to them, how come you couldn't see the threat as a generation of Americans are dealing with something much more violent than we are seeing today. And so to the critics who say we don't listen, of course we listen. I listen to the most important people of all, the people on the ground who are actually in Baghdad making the difficult decisions necessary to help this government succeed."

Sunni Insurgent Faction Offers To Negotiate With US Forces. CNN's The Situation Room (10/16, Ware) reported, "The Islamic Army of Iraq is…one of the largest and most powerful factions within the Sunni insurgency. These are the people who are responsible for the bulk of the day to day attacks against US forces, from roadside bombs to deadly sniper attacks to all manner of ambush and roadside bombings. These people offered us an opportunity to forward questions to their leadership, which we did in writing. They responded to those questions in videotaped answers, putting forward their official spokesman, Ibrahim al-Shimmari, to answer and respond to CNN. And what he outlines is fascinating. He renews the insurgency's long-running offer to negotiate with US forces."

US Officials Said To Show Ignorance Of Sunni-Shiite Differences. In an op-ed for the New York Times (10/17, 1.21M), CQ national security editor Jeff Stein writes, "For the past several months, I've been wrapping up lengthy interviews with Washington counterterrorism officials with a fundamental question: 'Do you know the difference between a Sunni and a Shiite?'" He concludes, "Most American officials I've interviewed don't have a clue. That includes not just intelligence and law enforcement officials, but also members of Congress who have important roles overseeing our spy agencies. How can they do their jobs without knowing the basics?"

Sectarian Violence Continues In Iraq. ABC World News (10/16, story 3, 2:15, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In recent weeks, there has been a horrific surge in religious violence, Iraqis killing Iraqis in unprecedented numbers. Today was no exception. And it is happening not just in one area of Baghdad but around the country."

The Los Angeles Times (10/17, Daragahi, 918K) reports, "Ministry of Interior spokesman Abdul-Kareem Khalaf blamed the latest outburst of violence on insurgents hitting random targets and 'seeking to incur as much damage and death as possible.'" But "the rhythms of the ongoing violence coincide with the country's political impasse. Once-dominant Sunni Arabs are waging an insurgency against the Shiite and Kurdish-dominated government as well as its US backer. Ascendant Shiites struggle to enforce their will politically as well as through violent death squads that kill dozens of innocent Sunnis every night."

The Washington Post (10/17, A1, Knickmeyer, Aldin, 748K) reports "the escalating violence in the Tigris River towns in many ways serves as a microcosm of the daily violence roiling Iraq. Sectarian attacks have increased more than tenfold since the start of the year and now claim more than 100 victims a day, according to the Iraqi government." The violence in Balad "was unusual because of the sustained deployment of the militias on the streets, and the killing seemed particularly vicious."

Iraqis Ask Why US Did Not Stop Balad Massacres. The New York Times (10/17, Luo, 1.21M) reports, "In the aftermath of the reprisals, some residents of Balad asked why American troops had not intervened when the killings began in earnest on Saturday. One of the largest American military bases in Iraq, Camp Anaconda, which includes a sprawling air base that serves as the logistical hub of the war, is nearby." American commanders "concluded that the situation in Balad was best dealt with by the Iraqi armed forces, a senior American military official said." The bloodshed in Balad illustrates "the dilemma for American military commanders at a time when they are hastening the transfer of wide areas of the country to Iraqi forces. ... It also highlighted yet again the powerlessness of the Iraqi forces to stand in the way of such sectarian violence."

Christians Fleeing Iraq. The New York Times (10/17, Luo, 1.21M) reports, "Muslim fury over Pope Benedict XVI's public reflections on Islam in Germany a month ago — when he quoted a 14th-century Byzantine emperor as calling Islam 'evil and inhuman' — has subsided elsewhere, but repercussions continue to reverberate in Iraq, bringing a new level of threat to an already shrinking Christian population. ... Over the past three and a half years, Christians have been subjected to a steady stream of church bombings, assassinations, kidnappings and threatening letters slipped under their doors. Estimates of the resulting Christian exodus vary from the tens of thousands to more than 100,000, with most heading for Syria, Jordan and Turkey."

DOJ:

Los Angeles US Attorney To Leave For Gibson Dunn. The Wall Street Journal (10/17, B11, Lattman) reports, "In the latest example of a government prosecutor jumping to a high-paying law firm, Debra Wong Yang, the U.S. Attorney in Los Angeles, has resigned her post and will join Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher as a partner at the beginning of the year." The Journal continues, "During Ms. Yang's tenure, her office has spearheaded several high-profile corporate-crime cases, including the indictment earlier this year of law firm Milberg Weiss Bershad & Schulman LLP, which is accused of paying individuals to file suits. Milberg Weiss has denied the allegations and vowed to fight the charges. … Ms. Yang, 47 years old, serves on the Justice Department's Corporate Fraud Task Force, an interagency group created in July 2002 amid white-collar scandals."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Senior KLA-Tencor Employees Lose Jobs In Options Backdating Scandal. The Wall Street Journal (10/17, A2, Tomsho, Bandler) reports, "Two senior employees at a Silicon Valley company lost their jobs yesterday, and another technology company said that former top executives misled its board as the stock-options scandal continued to gain traction. In the latest personnel shakeups, Stuart J. Nichols, general counsel of KLA-Tencor Corp., and Kenneth L. Schroeder, a former chief executive who had remained with the company in an advisory role, left following an internal probe that found backdating of options at the company." The company "also said it was canceling all outstanding backdated stock options held by Mr. Schroeder and repricing all backdated options held by Mr. Nichols."

Bloomberg (10/17, King) reports, "KLA-Tencor is among more than 140 companies to disclose internal or federal investigations of stock-option practices to determine if grant dates were manipulated to enrich employees. The U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission, the Justice Department and Internal Revenue Service are looking for evidence that companies broke securities or tax laws by backdating grants to coincide with days when share prices were low."

The AP (10/17, Liedtke) reports, "With Monday's announcement, San Jose-based KLA joins a lengthening list of companies facing up to the consequences of stock option chicanery that went undetected for years. … The repercussions are erasing a substantial chunk of past profits and spurring efforts to clean out executive suites and boardrooms as federal regulators and prosecutors explore possible civil penalties and criminal charges." The AP adds, "In the past week alone, more than a dozen executives and directors at six companies nationwide have either resigned or been fired. Four of those companies are based in Silicon Valley, which has become the focal point of the latest scandal to rock corporate America."

Altera To Restate Earnings After Options Probe. The San Jose Mercury News (10/17, Harris, Blitstein) reports that Altera, "a leading maker of programmable semiconductor chips … would restate its earnings by $47.6 million after an investigation by board members found grants to former executives of back-dated stock options." The News continues, "A special committee of independent board members of Altera found seven instances between 1996 and 2001 where recorded grant dates for stock options were different from the actual grant dates, the company said. … In a separate statement, Altera said Chief Financial Officer Nathan Sarkisian has retired. Previously, the company had said he planned to retire by the end of 2006."

USA Today (10/17, Krantz, Farrell) reports, "Computer-chip maker Altera said Monday that chief financial officer Nathan Sarkisian left the company prematurely after a review of its options-granting practice pinpointed problems. The company said it will need to restate earnings to reflect $47.6 million in costs pertaining to options grants." USA adds, "As of Monday, the number of companies losing an executive or director in the scandal hit 23."

UnitedHealth Shares Suffer With CEO's Departure. The AP (10/17, Freed) reports, "UnitedHealth Group Inc. will lose the CEO that built it into a health insurance powerhouse, but on Monday, Wall Street yawned. UnitedHealth shares traded in a narrow range and analysts said that they had expected the departure of Chairman and CEO William McGuire because of apparent stock options backdating." The AP continues, "With McGuire gone from the boardroom immediately, and set to retire as CEO by Dec. 1, the company's board promoted President Stephen Hemsley to CEO. … UnitedHealth shares slipped $1.21, or about 2.5 percent, to close at $47.54 on the New York Stock Exchange. They're off from a high of $64.61 in December, with much of that loss since questions about the company's stock options timing arose in March." The AP adds, "By making Hemsley CEO, UnitedHealth's directors signaled they would keep the company headed in the same direction, which has boosted UnitedHealth's stock price exponentially over the past 15 years and transformed it into the nation's second-largest health insurer. Hemsley has been at the company since 1997 and has run its day-to-day operations since 1999. … UnitedHealth said on Sunday that McGuire would step down after a company-commissioned report found widespread, systematic backdating was probably the explanation for his extraordinary good fortune in receiving stock options priced at the lowest possible point in eight different quarters."

UnitedHealth Options Episode Raises Questions About Hemsley. The New York Times (10/17, Dash) reports, "When Stephen J. Hemsley joined UnitedHealth Group after 23 years with the accounting firm Arthur Andersen, he was greeted with a grant of 400,000 stock options dated shortly after he started in June 1997. There was just one thing: the options carried a stock price based on the market price five months earlier, when he did not yet work for UnitedHealth, one of the largest health insurers in the country. The difference in dates effectively created a built-in gain of $7.26 for every share. Mr. Hemsley, who was chief financial officer at Andersen, said that he 'didn't recall focusing at the time' that his options carried a discounted price and that there was not enough evidence to determine if the grant was actually backdated. But the episode, recounted in a 14-page report into UnitedHealth's option practices, does raise some questions about Mr. Hemsley, who has taken the reins at UnitedHealth from Dr. William W. McGuire, who was forced to resign Sunday amid criticisms of how stock options were awarded."
